New Conservative Strength Holds Key to 90th Congress

To Aid Elderly:

20% Boost Urged In Social Security

The 90th Congress faces the challenge of modernizing and improving the social security system so older Americans can live out their retirement years in dignity and self-respect rather than in poverty and despair, says Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Social security legislation has been on the statute books since 1935, he points out in an article in the January 1967 American Federationist, but last June the average retired beneficiary received only $82 a month, or $984 a year, and the average retired couple $144 a month or $1,728 a year.

"Minimum progress in social security," Seidman writes, "should include, first and foremost, a significant rise in social security benefits averaging at least 20 percent as the first step toward an eventual rise of 50 percent. The higher benefit levels should be kept up-to-date by an automatic adjustment arrangement.

"In addition, the disability and medicare programs should be broadened and improved to meet more adequately the needs of the disabled and the sick."

The last AFL-CIO convention in December 1965 called for an increase in benefits of at least 50 percent in steps over the next few years, Seidman recalls, but recognized that such an improvement could be accomplished only if contributions from the general federal revenues were made—"extremely difficult" legislation to push through

Credit Sale Guidelines Proposed

A "truth-in-credit" regulation to curb deceptive practices in selling consumer goods on the installment plan has been drawn up by the staff of the Federal Trade Commission.

The FTC said the goal is to give buyers information needed "to make meaningful price and credit comparisons between competitive products."

The proposed guidelines would require retailers to disclose the total cost and the finance charges on all installment plan sales. They would not apply, however, to ordinary charge accounts or to automobile sales, which are covered by separate regulations.

A final decision will be made by the FTC after Feb. 24, the deadline for comments by interested parties and the public.

The proposed guidelines call for retailers to furnish customers with

Over 10-Year Period:

$500 Billion Cost Set On Needed Facilities

It will cost $500 billion over the next 10 years to give the country the education, health, transportation, recreational and cultural and other facilities it needs to do an adequate job of meeting the peoples' needs.

That's the projection of the first of three precedent-setting studies by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress on the nation's public facility needs.

The 700-page analysis published by the committee covering 42 different types of public facilities discloses that their estimated value today is about $500 billion, "the approximate size of the estimated capital requirement for such public facilities during the decade 1966-75."

Current outlays for public facilities are running at a rate of $31 billion a year. By 1975, the study declares, this figure will be virtually doubled. Two-thirds of the facilities are supplied by state and local public agencies, the rest by non-profit organizations or investor-owned companies.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the congressional committee, said the study prepared by the committee staff with the help of a number of experts and specialists is based on the best estimates available of what should be required to do an adequate job. The projections, he said, assume that construction will be sufficient to meet a desirable standard of adequacy. The study does not include staffing or servicing the facilities.

In an introduction to the study, Arnold H. Diamond, consulting economist to the committee, writes that up to now "there is no single source to which one can turn in order to obtain a comprehensive picture of the nation's public facilities . . . this study . . . endeavors to fill this void. . . ."

He notes that the largest capital needs in the next decade "are for basic community facilities and for transportation facilities."

3 Messages To Set Tone For Session

By David L. Perlman

The 90th Congress gets under way Jan. 10, with 80 newcomers among its 535 members and a strengthened conservative coalition trying to carve out a bigger role for itself.

Republican election gains were concentrated in the House and will bring greater GOP representation on legislative committees. In some cases, the changed party ratio will mean a switch from liberal to conservative control.

Anti-Filbuster Move Set

In the Senate, less changed by the election, a bipartisan group of liberals has served notice of a new attempt to adopt a cloture rule which would make it easier to cut off a filibuster.

The first month of the session will see the formal unveiling of the Administration's legislative program—and the initial congressional reaction to the President's proposals.

First will come the State of the Union message, which will paint in broad strokes Pres. Johnson's goals for the first session of the 90th Congress.

It will be followed by the Budget Message and the Economic Report —the blueprints which will allocate the nation's resources between its military and domestic needs and evaluate the health of the economy.

Finally, as the session progresses, a series of single-issue special legislative messages can be expected. One of the earliest is likely to be the promised specific proposal for

Oil Workers Sign New Gulf Pact; Job Security, Wage Gains Hailed

Denver—A "breakthrough" contract with the Gulf Oil Corp. covering 3,100 workers at its Port Arthur, Tex., refinery was unanimously approved by the National Oil Bargaining Policy Committee of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

It provides immediate wage and fringe benefits valued at 29 cents an hour, with an additional 15-cent raise the second year of the contract. It also provides what the union views as "significant progress" towards the OCAW's key job security goals.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron said he hoped the Gulf settlement will pave the way for agreements on nearly 400 contracts now being negotiated with oil companies throughout the nation. More than 55,000 OCAW members are working beyond year-end contract expiration dates while negotiations continue against a Jan. 9 strike deadline.

Grospiron said the bargaining policy committee's approval extends to all contracts on the Gulf pattern.

The Port Arthur agreement, which will be voted on for local ratification shortly, contains these main provisions:

Job security—The company stipulated that it does not intend to lay off employes. In the unexpected event that it should seek to do so, it will provide advance notice and agree to cancellation of the contract, leaving the union in a position to strike to prevent layoffs. The OCAW said the company gave an oral assurance that at the Port Arthur plant a permanent employe will have a job until retirement, excluding discharge for proper cause and barring a major catastrophe at the plant.

The company also agreed that if any employe is demoted through no fault of his own, he will continue at his higher rate of pay for at least 18 weeks, plus one additional week for each year of company service if he had more than 15 years of service.

Wages—A general increase of 14 cents an hour as of Jan. 1, 1967, with an additional 4 percent — averaging 15 cents an hour—next January. The evening shift premium goes up immediately 2 cents an hour; the midnight shift 4 cents.

Fringes—The company will pay a larger percentage of the hospital and medical insurance for workers

Loyalty Oath Out In Medicare Law

Elderly Americans no longer have to sign a loyalty oath to qualify for medicare benefits.

The Justice Dept. informed the Supreme Court that it would not appeal a federal court ruling in California which barred as unconstitutional a question asking medicare applicants if they belong to any Communist organization. Congress had barred benefits to members of subversive groups.

U.S. Solicitor Gen. Thurgood Marshall said a Supreme Court decision last April voiding a similar loyalty oath for Arizona teachers made it clear that the medicare requirement was similarly unconstitutional.

Agreement Set Ending Strike By Plumbers

New York—Members of Plumbers Local Union 2 voted a resolution of confidence in their newly-elected officials and returned to work Jan. 5, ending a strike that started July 25.

Pres. Michael Papalardo read to the members a memorandum of understanding from Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, signed by Papalardo and four business agents; by William B. F. Drew, chairman of the negotiating committee of the Association of Contracting Plumbers of the City of New York, and Lawrence Felder, president of National Master Plumbers, Inc.

Members of Local 2 will receive a wage increase of 15 cents an hour effective last June 30, and an additional package increase of 20 cents an hour effective Jan. 5 to June 28, 1967.

The memorandum of understanding also called for an improvement in the present agreement concerning job stewards, establishment of an unemployment office and a separate division of journeymen plumbers that will seek to recapture maintenance and repair work.

8,000 Loggers Win Pay Hike In Ontario

Toronto, Ont.—Basic wage increases of 50 cents an hour plus other pay gains and improvements in welfare, health and pension benefits have been won for 8,000 Ontario loggers in a new two-year contract negotiated by the Lumber & Sawmill Workers and seven pulp and paper companies.

Pact a Patternsetter

The agreement won by the union, a unit of the Carpenters, also is expected to set a pattern for 6.000 additional woods workers for whom it bargains.

Hourly-paid workers receive 25 cents an hour retroactive to Sept. 1 and another 25 cents a year later. The labor rate under the old agreement was $2.12 an hour, but most hourly-paid workers had a rate of $2.54.

Day workers in cutting operations get another 5 cents an hour, and skilled workers additional boosts ranging from 10 to 17 cents. Piecework workers who have been averaging $3.84 an hour get pay increases of 6.25 percent each year. The health, welfare and pension improvements are worth an estimated 12 cents an hour, the union said.

The employers agreed to extend coverage of the contract to all outside contractors doing work for them. The union expects this to restrain the farming out of work and to help protect wage scales.

Solien Heads NLRB In St. Louis Area

St. Louis, Mo.—Joseph H. Solien, acting regional director of the National Labor Relations Board office here since August, has been appointed regional director. A career NLRB employe, he succeeds the late Salvatore Cosentino.

Eugene Spector Named NMU Research Director

New York—Eugene P. Spector, research analyst with the American Merchant Marine Institute and a specialist in the economics of the maritime industry, has been appointed research director of the National Maritime Union.

'Shelter' Plans Offered Top-Bracket Taxpayers

New York—Executives whose salaries are so large they can't afford 'em are offered relief from Internal Revenue Service pressures in an outline of plans made available by the Research Institute of America for a modest two bucks a month.

It's entitled "10 Ways to Draw Tax-Sheltered Money from the Company," and it's included in the institutes's weekly "Recommendations" service.

"Few people judge their business success by salary alone," the institute says. "They know that under our present tax setup it isn't tax-wise to draw all the money you can in the form of salary.

"Instead, most successful businessmen have found the tax law allows them other ways to get money from their companies—with little or no tax. This shelters their incomes from the high tax brackets. . . .

"There are many ways to do this. But 10 of them are extraordinary—they stand out as the best. They are 100 percent legal . . . amount to big money and are readily available to most every company owner and executive."

The chapter headings tell the story:

- How compensation from business can be capital gains.
- When non-taxable "fringes" can supplement your salary.
- This "unfreezes" cash from a corporation, tax-free.
- "Private arrangements" with your company can lower tax rates.
- How to remain in a lower tax bracket when income jumps.
- Tax-free health or life insurance for executives.
- One kind of life insurance bypasses new $50,000 ceiling.
- Tax breaks in stock options (including closely-held firms).
- What others draw in salary—and other forms of compensation.
- How to combine business with vacation for tax-free expenses.

N.Y. City Workers Win $900-$1500 in Raises

New York—Contracts yielding pay raises ranging from $900 to $1,500 over two years have been won for some 37,000 New York City employes by District 37, State, County & Municipal Employes.

An "historic first" contract covering office employes was ratified at separate meetings by 17,500 non-supervisory workers and by 2,500 supervisors.

An agreement covering 17,000 nurses', dietary, housekeeping and institutional aides in city-operated hospitals also was given enthusiastic approval.

A negotiating committee headed by Victor Gotbaum, Daniel Nelson and Richard Puglisi recommended acceptance of the city's offer of wage increases for office workers ranging from $925 to $1,200 over a 30-month contract term, plus a welfare fund, retroactive to July 1, maintenance of membership and dues deduction plan. The pact includes a $350 guaranteed increase on promotion from the entrance level to the senior level.

Nearly 60 classifications of workers, from messengers to skilled data processors, are covered. The supervisors won similar benefits, including wage hikes of $900 to $1,300 and a guaranteed promotion increase of $450.

District 37 built up a membership majority—department by department—over a period of several years. It now is the exclusive bargaining agent for all city clerical employes, a spokesman said. Next year it will bargain on fringe benefits such as holidays, vacations and overtime provisions.

The hospital employes' agreement yields cash raises of $900 a year, establishes promotion titles for about 3,000 workers who receive an additional $240, and institutes a welfare fund that begins at $60 per employe per year and is increased to $85 on the first anniversary date.

Psychiatric and contagion differentials were established for the first time—$180 to $240 a year for nurses' aides and $180 for the other classifications. The uniform allowance for nurses' aides was boosted from $45 to $50 and was extended for the first time to male employes.

Transit Union Sets Greyhound Vote

The Eastern Council of the Transit Union has reached a new two-year settlement with Greyhound Bus Lines, which will be voted on by members. The ballots are to be counted Jan. 23.

The settlement narrowly averted a walkout authorized by the membership.

The union's Central Council is still in negotiations with Greyhound in Chicago. Both councils rejected earlier settlements in referenda.

New Pamphlet Lists Record of Congress

"Labor Looks at the 89th Congress," a 92-page AFL-CIO legislative report covering both the first and second sessions, is now available for distribution.

The pamphlet, prepared by the federation's Dept. of Legislation, records the step-by-step action on major bills of interest to labor.

Its foreword is a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council describing the 89th as "the most progressive Congress in history" and stressing the need to protect and broaden its accomplishments during the 90th Congress.

Single copies are free; additional copies are 15 cents each or $13.50 for 100. Listed as Publication No. 77H, it can be ordered from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Congressional Study Shows:

$500 Billion Needed For Public Facilities

lic facilities, Diamond writes that not only are many facilities used beyond their normal life span but in many instances they are "utilized more intensively than was originally contemplated.

"Additional school children are frequently handled by installing more desks in classrooms; hospital overflows are accommodated by placing additional beds in rooms, or even in corridors; and college facilities are more intensively used by afternoon or evening classes and through trimester and four semester school years.

"Crowded highways are manifested by slow-moving, bumper-to-bumper traffic; overtaxed bridges and tunnels are evidenced by long waiting lines for use; overcrowded airports are mirrored by the stacking of airplanes waiting to land; and during rush hours subway passengers are 'packed like sardines.' "

10-Year Budget Projected

The study projected necessary increases in expenditures over the next 10 years in the following areas:

Water and sewer—actually spent in 1965, $3.9 billion; needed in 1975, $9.2 billion.

Electric and gas—$6.5 billion in 1965; $10.2 billion in 1975.

Transportation—$9.2 billion in 1965; $19 billion in 1975.

Education—$5.9 billion in 1965; $10.2 billion in 1975.

Health—$2.5 billion in 1965; $5.5 billion in 1975.

Recreational and cultural—$2.5 billion in 1965; $6.6 billion in 1975.

Other public buildings—$500 million in 1965; $900 million in 1975.

The total annual expenditure would rise from $31 billion in 1965 to $48.6 billion in 1970 to $61.6 billion in 1975. The 10-year cumulative total from 1966 to 1975 would be $499.1 billion.

UAW Wins Bitter Fight In California

Azusa, Calif.—The Auto Workers won bargaining rights at the Gilfillan plants of the Intl. Telephone & Telegraph Corp. in the face of a bitter anti-union campaign waged by management.

William Gilbert, director of the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange County organizing Committee, said the vote was 351-261 for the UAW despite "a whole range of anti-union techniques" by management and a "labor consultant" employed in an effort to keep the union out.

The election was the second try in two years by the UAW and the AFL-CIO committee. The union lost its first try in 1965.

UAW Rep. John Allard directed the campaign and three AFL-CIO staff members besides Gilbert took part in the drive. The Gilfillan plants are considered key installations in size and importance in the ITT manufacturing complex in the Los Angeles metropolitan area and were major targets in labor's cooperative organizing drive in the area.

Rail Clerks Ask Ruling On Pan American Vote

The Railway Clerks will ask the National Mediation Board—and the courts if necessary—to rule that the Teamsters have failed in their attempt to take over a 6,900-worker unit of Pan American World Airways clerical employes.

The Teamsters received less than 45 percent of the potential vote. If write-in ballots, which the Clerks say were the result of fraudulent letters and leaflets, are excluded, the raid attempt would have been defeated under mediation board rules which require majority participation in any election to change a bargaining representative.

The Railway Clerks, who presently hold bargaining rights, asked their supporters to boycott the election and the union was not listed on the ballot. An earlier vote last fall was thrown out by the mediation board because of fraudulent letters, including one with a forged signature of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, calling on BRC supporters to write in the union's name.

BRC Pres. C. L. Dennis said the 137 write-ins for the Railway Clerks in the second election, along with nearly 300 others, should be discarded.

Earlier, the BRC had protested the action of the mediation board in calling a second election so soon after the first contest, which the board said was "tainted" by fraud.

When the board proceeded with the election, the BRC sought a federal court injunction to void the vote. A three-judge U.S. Court of Appeals said it had no authority at that stage to halt the vote count. But the court sharply criticized the mediation board's haste in calling a second election and Judge Warren E. Burger warned that a Teamster victory would be "the fruit of gross fraud, forgery and chicanery."

He indicated the BRC might have grounds to have the election set aside if it should be against them.

Canadian Pact Hikes Wages 47-83 Cents

Thompson, Manitoba — Wage increases ranging from 47 to 83 cents an hour effective three months before expiration of the old contract were won by Steelworkers Local 6166 in a new three-year agreement with the Intl. Nickel Co. of Canada.

The contract was the second the union has negotiated on behalf of its 1,700 members and yields pay increases, effective Dec. 1, 1966, rather than Mar. 1, 1967, of 26 cents on the old base rate of $2.265 an hour, 30 cents for miners and 49 cents for top craftsmen.

Further pay boosts on Mar. 1, 1968, and Mar. 1, 1969, will be 9.6 and 11.6 cents in the base rate; 12 and 14 cents for miners, and 16 and 18 cents for tradesmen.

Shift premiums are raised from 5 and 10 cents an hour to 10 and 15 cents, and the Sunday premium from 15 to 25 cents an hour.

The company also agreed to the extended vacation plan under which employes get an additional five weeks for every five years of service after the first five years and to base vacation pay on earnings rather than the hourly rate.

The basic pension plan is raised from $3 to $3.50 per month per year of service and the supplementary pension from $1 to $2.50.

Breakthrough in Baltimore:

Building Trades Win First Contract

Baltimore, Md.—The Baltimore Building & Construction Trades Council scored a major breakthrough in the ranks of anti-union contractors here by signing a three-year contract with Henry A. Knott, Inc., one of the state's oldest and largest general construction firms.

The company has not employed union members since 1931 and its officials were active in organizing Associated Builders & Contractors, Inc., an open-shop trade group prominent in seeking enactment of so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Charles A. Knott, president of the company, said the signing of the agreement grew out of the directors' decision that it would be good for the firm.

Union Subcontractors

The contract requires the Knott company to engage only union subcontractors and pledges the unions to forego jurisdictional strikes by resolving all disputes through arbitration.

It also calls for company payments into health and welfare, pension and education funds, and for the checkoff of 1 cent an hour for the council from employes' wages.

"This agreement will prove to be mutually beneficial," said Pres. Guido Iozzi of the council. "It will provide the Knott company with the most highly-skilled craftsmen available and it will increase job opportunities for union members.

"Consummation of this agreement has broken through non-union contractors' opposition to the organization of the industry. We believe more and more open shop general and subcontractors will find it advantageous to sign our agreement and thus benefit from the availability of union craftsmen."

Building trades unions have overcome strong opposition to union organization among general contractors in the Baltimore area and now have agreements with more than 30 firms, Iozzi said.

The BBCTC also is seeking to increase job opportunities by sponsoring two pieces of legislation. One, pending in the Baltimore City Council, would amend an existing minimum wage ordinance covering public construction to include the cost of employer-paid fringe benefits in computing wages. The other, to be introduced in the Maryland Legislature, would require the payment of prevailing wages on public construction throughout the state.

MEMBERSHIP SWEEPSTAKES brought more than 12,000 new members to the Postal Clerks and prizes to scores of old members. For each new member an old member signed up, his name went into the big box from which AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler is picking out those of the winners—first prize of an auto for Michael M. Maloof, Local 51-100, Boston; $500 bonds for William F. Davis, Oklahoma City, and Charles R. Geilfuss, Baltimore; and $25 bonds to scores of others. At the ceremony were (from left) Legislative Dir. Patrick J. Nilan of the Postal Clerks; Gail Patterson; Pres. E. C. Hallbeck; Schnitzler; Exec. Vice Pres. Don E. Dunn; Michel Cochran; Organization Dir. Joseph F. Thomas; Sec.-Treas. Owen H. Schoon and Administrative Aide Francis S. Filbey.

L. S. Buckmaster Dies, Former URW President

Henderson, Ky.—Leland Stanford Buckmaster, president of the Rubber Workers from 1945 until his retirement in 1960 and a vice president of the AFL-CIO from the merger in 1955 until 1962, died here after an extended illness. He was 72.

His "tremendous contribution" to bringing about the merger of the former CIO, of which he was a vice president, and the AFL was hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a speech at the URW convention in 1958, when he ran for the last of his 11 terms.

"It was with deep sadness that I learned of the death of your husband and my good friend," Meany wired Mrs. Buckmaster. "Throughout the years we served together on the Executive Council I knew him to be a great trade unionist, a real leader and a fine gentleman. He contributed much to the labor movement and all who were his friends will miss him sorely. You have our deepest sympathies."

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito mourned "Buck," as he was called by thousands, as one "dedicated to service for others."

"He gave of himself so that a better way of life would become a reality for others," said Bommarito.

Buckmaster was born in Geneva, Ind., attended Tri-State College in Angola, Ind., and taught school in Geneva before entering the Army in World War I. He went to work in the Akron, O., plant of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. after his discharge, was one of the first to join the union movement in the 1930s and was a delegate to the Akron convention in 1935 at which the URW was founded.

He was elected first president of Firestone Local 7 the same year, a member of the URW executive board in May 1936 and URW vice president in 1941. He became president in 1945 upon the resignation of his predecessor, Sherman Dalrymple.

Surviving in addition to Mrs. Buckmaster are two sons, Dr. George A. Buckmaster and Edward Buckmaster, a lawyer, both of Henderson; and two daughters, Mrs. Richard H. Shoemaker, Cuyahoga Falls, O., and Mrs. Philip Gregory, Las Vagas, Nev.

Graveside service were held at Geneva, with Dir. F. J. McCartney of AFL-CIO Region X, Indianapolis, Ind., representing the AFL-CIO.

Murder of Socialists Recalled by Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged that labor will never forget the murder of the Polish Socialist leaders, Alter and Erlich, by "Communist assassins." He sent the pledge in a message to a special meeting in New York called to memorialize the 25th anniversary of their deaths.

"In murdering Alter and Erlich 25 years ago the Soviet-Communist assassins committed a shameful and unforgiveable crime against liberty and human decency," he wrote. "Inspired by the ideals for which these fighters for freedom gave their lives, American labor will continue its unswerving devotion to democracy and individual dignity and firmly maintains its unmitigated opposition to communism and every other form of dictatorship. We will never forget their martyrdom."

Swaity Named Aide To TWUA's Pollock

New York—Vice Pres. Paul Swaity of the Textile Workers Union of America, the union's southern director with headquarters in Charlotte, N.C., has been named administrative assistant to Pres. William Pollock and will work out of the international union office here.

Halls Barred But Workers Vote for Union

Crane, Mo.—All public meeting-places in town were unavailable when the Clothing Workers started an organizing drive here last August at the plant of the Wood Garment Mfg. Co. But union backers solved that problem and helped the ACWA win a National Labor Relations Board election by a vote of 203 to 54.

At the start of the organizing effort, the union rented the American Legion hall in Crane for a public meeting. But when ACWA organizers came early to set up the chairs, they found the hall closed and no other available for renting.

The problem of the vanishing meeting-place was met by moving the first organizing meeting to the court house in Galena, 15 miles away, with the help of a friendly judge. When Wood Garment employes voted to do their shopping out of town, word soon came that local halls would, after all, be available to the union.

The Wood Co. refused a consent election on the ground that the bargaining unit excluded a number of eligible employes. The union had been told these were supervisors and office employes, but yielded in order not to delay the election. The company tactic then backfired when the office workers went to a union meeting and signed ACWA membership application cards.

During the campaign, the ACWA reported, the company announced that it was giving employes their first paid vacations in more than 20 years. The union got the credit for the sudden change in management thinking.

In another move to halt the organizing drive, the company held question-and-answer sessions for groups of employes, five or 10 at a time. The sessions were abandoned when the workers, thoroughly briefed by the ACWA, fired some questions that the bosses couldn't handle.

An organizing committee of 65 Wood Garment workers was credited with helping the ACWA win bargaining rights by a margin of nearly 80 percent of those voting. The victory was the third in recent months in this area. Others were at the Bolivar Mfg. Co. in Bolivar, Mo., and the Ozark Garment Mfg. Co. in Ozark, Mo.

Major Gains Scored In Gulf Oil Contract

and their families, equal to an additional two-cent hourly raise. Pension improvements were made at a cost to the company of 12 cents an hour.

In addition, 900 of the 3,100 employes will receive pay adjustments of from 4 to 38 cents an hour above the general increases. The union did not count these raises in arriving at the 44-cent value of the settlement since they were locally-negotiated adjustments, not considered a part of the OCAW's national goals.

The Port Arthur Gulf refinery is the second largest under OCAW contract. The largest is a Texaco refinery in the same city.

Although oil companies have insisted on local negotiations covering each plant, the OCAW has for years closely coordinated its bargaining and past experience has been that a contract with a major oil company sets a pattern for similar agreements elsewhere.

The Port Arthur contract provides a wage package slightly above the bargaining goals set last spring by the union's rank-and-file oil policy committee. The job security provision, a key one because of heavy cutbacks from automation over the past decade, was short of the union's goal but OCAW leaders considered it an important step towards the no-layoff guarantee sought.

2-Coast Operation Set By Congress of Strings

New York—Rockefeller Foundation grants totaling $60,000 will help the American Federation of Musicians expand its annual Congress of Strings program for talented young people interested in careers as symphony musicians.

AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin said foundation grants of $30,000 each have been made to establish an East Coast program at the Saratoga Springs, N.Y., Performing Arts Center and a West Coast program at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles.

The two centers, each with 60 students, will replace the single 100-student program which has been held for the past five summers on the campus of Michigan State University. The program, launched by the AFM in 1959, gives young string instrumentalists aged 16 to 23 an opportunity to study and perform under leading instructors and conductors.

Students are chosen at open auditions sponsored by AFM locals in the United States and Canada and are provided with transportation, housing and meals as well as instruction.

The eight-week programs are scheduled to begin June 25 at Saratoga Springs and July 2 in Los Angeles.

Kenin said the Rockefeller Foundation grants were made to help defray expenses in establishing the two new centers and will not diminish the union's sponsorship and support of the program.

The AFM said the change in the organization was designed to enable a greater number of students to participate in the program. Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard, director of the program, said it has already helped meet the shortage of symphony string instrumentalists. Nearly every major symphony orchestra in the nation now has at least one graduate of the Congress of Strings, Ballard said.

Leo Cluesmann, AFM Officer, Dies

Newark, N.J.—Leo Cluesmann, secretary of the Musicians from 1942 to 1959 and an active Democrat here, died in St. Michael Hospital after a brief illness. He was 85.

Graduated in 1904 from the National Conservatory of Music, New York, he joined AFM Local 16 here in 1905 and was its president in 1911-12 and 1922-32. He was graduated from the New Jersey Law School here and admitted to the bar in 1927, and became AFM secretary after three years of service as secretary to the president.

He was a member of the international union's executive board and editor of its publication, the Musician, and also was a director of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. There were no survivors.

The New Congress

THE 90TH CONGRESS is opening its two-year stand in a political atmosphere disturbingly marked by excessive attention to "slow down" and "caution" signals.

The Republicans, bouncing back from the depths of the 1964 Goldwater disaster, are interpreting their gains as a signal to halt or slow up progressive legislation. They are talking of "creative alternatives" to Great Society measures, a useful and possible fruitful role for a minority party. But the alternatives in the talking stage so far appear to be designed to curtail development of programs adopted by the 89th Congress.

A number of Democrats also have voiced the slow down theme, pairing it with a call for a careful examination of the legislative product of the past two years in terms of consolidation, efficiency and repairs.

The net result of this approach is also to set aside for the time being the immediate and pressing problems confronting the nation.

THE 1966 congressional election results have not changed the problems that still face America:

- Poverty in the midst of affluence.
- The persistence of racial discrimination.
- The unmet needs of the educational system.
- The inequities in federal labor laws.
- The vast and complex challenges posed by urban America.

There are many more and these problems will face the 90th Congress just as they faced the 89th before it. Some of these problems have been eased a bit, some solutions have been framed and are in the process of being applied. But none of the problems has been solved.

The new Congress is thus charged with two tasks: to protect and broaden the legislation adopted by the 89th Congress by assuring adequate funds for the development of the new programs; to evolve new programs and policies to meet the continuing problems facing the nation.

Above all, this is not a time for a leisurely reassessment, curtailment or overriding concern with administrative refinements. New programs tend to run into problems because they are new and in due course they evolve and shake out the bugs.

THE 90TH CONGRESS can make a meaningful contribution to the nation's progress if it understands that the country must continue to move forward, that the pace of American life in the final third of the 20th Century requires affirmative action, not negatively oriented introspection.

This Congress will make its mark if it reads the record of the 89th Congress and picks up and carries on the historic work of that body so that the lives of all Americans for generations to come will be enriched and fulfilled.

Wirtz Urges Standards:

Press Responsibility Critical In Shaping National Policies

The following is excerpted from an address by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to the recent meeting of the Industrial Relations Research Association in San Francisco.

STATISTICS ARE DULL NEWS—except for the boxscores on doom and disaster, casualty lists or holiday deaths on the highways.

But is it too much to ask that when national policy is put at stake, there be a higher standard of communication ethics than readers' or listeners' obsessions? Would the media accept a share of responsibility for promoting a standard of not just a right to know, but an obligation to know?

There is advantage in having a three-tenths of 1 percent increase in prices or unemployment get several times the attention a similar decrease does. The country needs more to be warned of its dangers than told of its successes. It is a different thing though if the fires of inflation are fed by constantly playing down every indication of stability and magnifying every sign of possible instability. One TV announcement of the one-tenth of 1 percent November consumer price increase — the smallest in six months — was confined to the statement that "prices rose in November for the tenth consecutive month."

Nor is there excuse for the country's having been told persistently the less-than-half-truth that it was American labor's insistence on wage increases that "broke the guidelines"—when the fact is that price increases have exceeded those limits much more than have wage increases.

It is worth asking what standard of "credibility" it is that inspires or permits an editor to persist in protesting the alleged inflationary effects of the paper imbalance of the government's "administrative budget" when he knows (and knows most of his readers don't know) that only the much more nearly balanced "national incomes account budget" bears any relationship to national economic stability.

Perhaps it is all too complicated, so that the inevitable price of letting reason rule a complex society is the non-participation of most people in the decision-making. Perhaps it is too much to expect that sophisticated issues of monetary and fiscal policy be decided by those so unfamiliar with decimal points that 3.9 percent sounds like almost 10 times as much as 4 percent.

Perhaps there should be experiment with such measures as bringing out all vital statistical reports on the same day each month—to avoid or at least reduce the confusion that comes from reading, one day, that the Wholesale Price Index is down; the next day that the Consumer Price Index is up; the day after that, that the estimated gross national product for the next quarter is higher than previously predicted; the following day that productivity in manufacturing is increasing but is down in services; and so forth. Maybe a single monthly report card to the public on how it is doing would be better understood.

But any such suggestion is superficial. The problem here is much deeper, and broader, and not limited to economic issues or the habits of computers or professional purveyors of the news.

WHAT MAKES THIS ALL so important now, and so difficult, is the fact of rejection of the old idea of the "inevitability of progress" (which, in its extreme form, left communication only the significance of commentary) and the adoption, instead, of the conviction that the human capacity includes the power to improve the future.

With this turn of events and philosophy, truth in the forum and "the media" has become as important, especially in a democracy, as truth in the laboratory or the library.

Whoever is properly concerned about "credibility"—so that he would reject the credible advancement of what is in fact incredible (racial discrimination, poverty, economic depression, "disproportionment," birth by ignorance or accident) —will note the record of the past three years; a brief moment—as history measures time—in which this country has been asked to face up to the truth

- that boom-and-bust economics can be replaced by the economics of constant expansion;
- that civil (meaning equal) rights can be translated in civil results;
- that poverty can be eliminated and slums eradicated;
- that the franchise can be restored to a one-person-one-vote basis;
- that older age can be given security and meaning;
- that the growth of the population can be governed by reason and knowledge instead of ignorance.

These propositions are right. Their implementation depends solely on the extent to which all participants in the ensuing dialogue regarding them also accept truth as its standard.

Morgan Says:

Murrow's Wartime Broadcasts Recall Man's Triumph, Failure

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

I SPENT New Year's Day looking—and listening—backward. I like to think that what I saw and heard in the newsreel of memory will not be useless guideposts along the road ahead.

As the 20th century enters the final third of its historic spin, the human race finds itself equipped with weapons whose power both of destruction and deliverance are unequalled through the whole span of man's existence.

Morgan

The leading statesmen of East and West are fond of scaring each other and their respective peoples out of their wits with the reminder that each side has a nuclear arsenal capable of obliterating the respective enemy and—although they don't always dwell on this dainty point—ending life on this planet as we know it.

An achievement less dubious and somewhat more exciting, at least in some respects, is one which almost invariably gets lost in the ideological shuffle.

It is, of course, that science, in addition to hoisting us to the brink of oblivion, has pushed and tugged mankind up to a breath-taking vista from which the world can be viewed, for the first time since civilization began to rear itself out of the swamps and jungles, as literally a promised land.

A cure for cancer has not yet been found but smallpox, which has killed more people through the centuries than any other disease, may be totally banished from the face of the earth in a decade, according to the World Health Organization. Science has now produced the means whereby the world can feed, clothe and house itself without want, and the riches of the seas and the potential promise of largesse from other planets are only beginning to be explored and exploited.

But politics has not yet devised a realistic, reliable method whereby these fortunes can be bestowed equably from hemisphere to hemisphere, from nation to nation or, for that matter, from neighborhood to neighborhood.

This brings me back to my nostalgic exercise. I spent the day with an old friend—or rather with his voice. Some thoughtful soul gave me for Christmas the first record volume of a series of Edward R. Murrow's broadcasts entitled "A Reporter Remembers." Volume I covers the war years he so memorably covered from Britain.

Two broadcasts in his first volume hit me with an impact that no history lesson could ever make. One was a report of a raid on Berlin by the Royal Air Force. The other was an account of what he found in the concentration camp of Buchenwald.

ONE HOT DAY more than 30 years ago, I sat with a gaggle of other reporters in the salon of a cruise ship in Honolulu harbor listening to George Bernard Shaw tell us that war would never be abolished until man could bring himself to end the romance and the pageantry of it.

Well, the Ethiopian War and the Spanish Civil War and World War II, which were in progress or impending as the great dramatist spoke, were not the most romantic pageants ever presented on the stage of human conflict. It is not war that is glamorous. It is the interruption of life's humdrum routine wherein the excitement lies.

Most of war itself is a deadly routine of official and officious errands and endless waiting. Politics makes strange bed-fellows but combat welds one of the most unlikely liaisons of all, the comradeship between courage and cruelty.

Murrow reported the almost palpable courage present in the thin vulnerable cabin of the Lancaster bomber as the crew braved withering enemy fire to drop its load, through the deadly night, on Berlin. But there was cruelty in its explosives and incendiaries, too. Nothing, so far, however, has reached the monstrous massiveness of man's savagery as practiced in Hitler's human slaughterhouses.

There are, indubitably, still worthy causes to fight for and sinister forces to fight against. The lesson in Murrow's wartime broadcasts, though, is the urgent reminder of how vital it is to improve our skills in the application of political power. War is not an extension of those skills. It extravagantly marks the failure of them, a failure we cannot afford forever.

In this corner I begin the 13th year of what I know to be one of the luckiest assignments in all journalism, electronic or otherwise, because of the precious freedom of expression it carries. As the AFL-CIO just indicated in that middle commercial, which it paid for, the rules have never changed from the start in January 1955: no censorship, just the right to speak my mind, if any. This is what freedom of the press and freedom of speech are supposed to be all about. What a pity it is that more sponsors and advertisers, more instruments in the whole orchestra of the information media do not encourage more responsible controversy and fair criticism even when it may be aimed straight back at them. It is not to tout this program as impervious to irresponsibility or unfairness that I say that, but to toast ABC and the AFL-CIO for their broad-mindedness.

Excerpt from Edward P. Morgan commentary, Dec. 30, 1966.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE 90TH CONGRESS is on its way and it is most welcome. The capital of the United States is something a little less than half a capital when the powerful legislative body has closed down shop and gone home. Besides, the new Congress has work to do—whether its leaders comprehend it or not.

It is not the expectation of this observer that Pres. Johnson will back away from affirmative themes in his State of the Union message and the other set-piece messages that are now associated with the first month of a new legislative session—the Economic Message and the Budget Message.

We are not going to get from the 90th Congress an outpouring of new programs such as those that marked the 1965 session of the 89th Congress. One must assume that Mr. Johnson, a political realist, knows this as well as any sidelines onlooker—and possibly a little better.

A couple of by-no-means idle comments seem appropriate. First the President is already getting, since the Nov. 8 elections, a "better press." This means, to drop euphemisms, that the writing gentlemen now are acknowledging in print that the so-called "credibility gap" between the people and high Administration circles was very largely a creation of their own imaginations.

LBJ and Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara never have been able to predict positively, for example, when the Vietnamese war would end, and how many troops would have to be committed. Not because the President and the Secretary enjoyed reading about the "credibility gap," but because they genuinely didn't know. And perhaps because an estimate on the end of a war, officially stated, might be an intelligence item affecting the date on which the fighting could actually be ended.

The second comment involves the election returns, which reflected great Republican gains against the President's party—a net gain of 47 House seats, what amounts to a net gain of four Senate seats, a net of eight governorships.

The Republican count in the Senate is still no more than 36, as against 64 Democrats. (The conservative GOP alliance with the southern Democrats arises here as a continuing reality because the GOP hasn't dreamed up a technique to win many Senate races for itself in the South).

The 47-seat net gain for the GOP in the House does not redress the balance for the injuries of many years. Mr. Johnson could not have been gratified with the election returns—but they did not represent, really, a Republican victory, with only 187 Republicans to 248 Democrats in the new House.

THE REPUBLICANS COME BACK to Capitol Hill snorting with premature anticipations of a presidential victory in 1968. But that campaign is two years off, still, and nobody knows who the Republican nominee will be.

We know what issues the 90th Congress will have to deal with: they are city issues, the issues involving the core-cities and their sprawling suburbs in which about 80 percent of our people live.

This means, whether the 90th Congress likes it or not, school integration and the educational standards of the public schools. It involves a vastly altered pattern of housing in the core-cities and the suburbs, so that the cities do not turn totally colored while middle-class whites try to make the suburbs a last line of defense against the 20th Century. It involves, therefore, rent subsidies and civil rights in the broadest sense and a fair shot at job-training for unskilled people of both races.

The 90th Congress is talking about a "pause" in reform laws. But it can't run and hide. The problems are still there.

Six Countries Aided Since '60:

Project HOPE Seeking Funds To Expand Aid to World's Sick

A CRIPPLED children's clinic operating since 1960 in South Viet Nam is just one of many examples of the success of Project HOPE, Harry Goldberg of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs said in a nationwide radio broadcast.

It has brought new medical knowledge and techniques to the less-advantaged people of six countries on three continents, he said.

In light of the enormous needs that exist, what HOPE has done "is only a drop in the bucket," said Goldberg, a member of HOPE's board of directors. The project wants to expand its operations with additional vessels to augment the S.S. HOPE, its floating medical center.

Goldberg explained that HOPE, the come-true dream of a Washington, D. C., physician, William B. Walsh, does more than just treat the sick. Training and education to update the host country's hospitals, medical and health facilities and their personnel go on during the ship's visits, he said, and when the ship leaves, HOPE teaching teams stay on.

BUT MONEY is a serious problem, he said. With operating costs running some $5 million a year, funds—especially contributions from private citizens—are badly needed, he stressed. Donations, he said, are tax-free, and can be sent to Project HOPE, Box A, Washington, D.C.

The AFL-CIO has backed HOPE since its inception, Goldberg said, and was "the first large national organization to which HOPE appealed."

Questioning him on Labor News Conference, Mutual radio network program produced by the AFL-CIO, were Duane Emme of Labor Newspaper and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

SIX-YEAR EFFORT of Project HOPE has brought modern-day medical opportunities to the people of six nations on three continents, but is "only a drop in the bucket in light of the enormous needs," Harry Goldberg (center) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs told Duane Emme (left) of Labor Newspaper and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference, aired on the Mutual Radio Network.

'Peace Corps' Sought To Help Ex-Convicts

Federal and state prisons in the United States seek their own version of the peace corps to help fit and train prisoners for life outside the walls, Pres. James V. Bennett of the Joint Commission on Correctional Manpower & Training said in a network radio interview.

Bennett, former director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, reported that 90 professional and national organizations, including the AFL-CIO, have supported the non-profit commission's effort to aid convicted law breakers become useful citizens.

The commission was set up by Congress to make a three-year study leading to action programs and legislative recommendations on federal, state and local levels.

"There is a tremendous shortage of manpower in the whole correctional field," said Bennett, "including guards, psychologists and psychiatrists who undertake to change prisoner attitudes, doctors, lawyers and so forth. There is a reluctance on the part of some people to work in an institution. Another problem is the wage scale. We are trying to get a better salary level."

Bennett's comments were made on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program heard weekly over the ABC network.

Cooperative Attitudes

He asserted that the attitude of management and the public, as well as unions, has been cooperative, and a number of foundations have assisted with grants.

"We have long since abandoned the idea that the primary purpose of a correctional institution is to punish, that people who come to prisons owe a debt to society," he said. "They are there to learn to work, to learn new attitudes and fit themselves to take their places as law-abiding citizens in the community."

But, at present, more than half the former inmates are unable to find jobs because of continued prejudice against ex-convicts, he reported.

"However, attitudes are changing," he commented. "A recent Gallup Poll showed that seven out of 10 people believed the fundamental purpose of the prison was to rehabilitate."

Some prisoners, Bennett admitted, "find living outside the law is a way of life."

"One of the things we have to do is to have people in our institutions who are trained to recognize such persons and do something to prevent a return to crime," he said.

Appointments Fill Vacancies On CLC Staff

Ottawa, Ont.—Henry Rhodes, assistant organization director for the Canadian Labor Congress, has been appointed director of the Dept. of Federation & Councils, CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin announced in making public a series of staff changes.

Roy LaBerge, public relations director of the Canadian Union of Public Employes, was named editor of Canadian Labor, the CLC's monthly magazine, and will be associated with CLC Public Relations Dept.

Rhodes, a national level staff member since 1942, and LaBerge, who has worked for the Ottawa Press, Ottawa Citizen, Ottawa Journal, Canadian Press and Radio Station CFRA, succeed Clifford Scotton, who held both posts. Scotton resigned to become federal secretary of the New Democratic Party.

Other appointments:

A. L. Hepworth, assistant director of the Departments of Legislation and Government Employes, as director of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs. He succeeds Kalmen Kaplansky, who will head the Ottawa office of the Intl. Labor Organization.

Frank Chafe, regional education director for the Prairies with headquarters in Regina, Sask., as assistant in the Departments of Legislation and Government Employes.

Larry Wagg, representative in the CLC's Ontario education office, to succeed Chafe as regional director of education for the Prairies.

Denis Coupland, on the staff of the Federal Treasury Board in Ottawa, as assistant director of legislation and government employes.

Challenge Facing Congress:

20% Benefit Increase Urged To Update Social Security

Congress in view of the cost of the Viet Nam war.

But a "significant increase" in benefits could be achieved without such a contribution, he goes on. Benefits could be boosted without increasing the burden on the lowest-paid by raising the present taxable wage base of $6,600 but leaving the tax rate virtually unchanged.

"The AFL-CIO has proposed that this wage base be raised," he continues, "in steps, if necessary, to $15,000 so that the same proportion of persons would have their earnings covered as was the case with the $3,000 earnings base in 1935."

However, a higher wage base alone would not be enough to boost benefits appreciably, Seidman notes. A $9,000 base would finance only a 4.5 percent rise in benefits, a $15,000 base with an immediate rise to $9,000 would yield only 8 percent and taxing all wages would allow about 9.4 percent, he points out.

But also available for financing higher benefits is 74 one-hundredths of 1 percent which the Social Security Administration has said was saved in the cost of the program because of more favorable economic conditions and actuarial experience. This plus a $9,000 wage base would permit a 13.6 increase in benefits, Seidman says.

If the saving were combined with an immediate increase in the base wage to $9,000 and a three-step rise over five years to $15,000, he goes on, a 17 percent jump in benefits could be financed and raised to 20 percent by hiking the contribution rate by two-tenths of 1 percent.

"Though paying more in social security taxes, the higher income groups in return would be eligible for larger maximum social security benefits," Seidman says.

"Since almost every worker would have benefit protection computed by reference to his entire earnings, higher earners as well as all other social security beneficiaries would receive a considerably greater replacement of their pre-retirement income than is the case now.

"Thus an increase in the base, plus a minimal boost in the contribution rate, would make it possible to raise benefits in excess of 20 percent and thereby take a big step toward the goal of 50 percent. On these assumptions, a rise substantially above 20 percent would require a general revenue contribution."

Seidman builds a strong case for higher retirement benefits by showing that "the elderly cannot meet even minimum daily requirements" on pensions tragically lower than the Labor Dept.'s budget for "minimum but adequate living" for an elderly retired couple—about $3,000 a year in a large city and $2,500 in a smaller community.

He calls the SSA definition of poverty—$1,500 a year for an individual aged 65 or over and $1,850 for a couple—"an unusually strict one."

Benefits Inadequate

"Since social security is substantially the only source of income for the large majority of the aged," he writes, "the adequacy of this benefit is the prime determinant of whether retirement will be the 'golden years' or years of bitter desperation.

"Though expanded and improved over the years, the program's single biggest defect is lack of adequate benefits. . . .

"Cash benefits have been increased only twice during the 12-year period, 1954-1966. The 7.5 percent increase in 1958 did not restore the 1954 buying power of cash benefits and the 7 percent increase in 1965 fell short of restoring the 1958 purchasing power of benefits."

During the same period, Seidman writes, output per manhour rose about 43 percent, permitting a higher standard of living in which social security beneficiaries did not share because of the low benefit increases.

"The problem is becoming increasingly acute because people are living longer and longer and therefore are dependent on social security payments for more years of their lives," he says.

"It is no longer uncommon for beneficiaries to be on the rolls for 20 years or longer. This is all the more reason why the nation must come to grips with the problem in a realistic way. The objective should be not just to protect the benefits of future retirees and those already retired against the loss of purchasing power, but also to ensure the aged population a share in an increasing standard of living which is their right."

Seidman also urges greater flexibility in regulations permitting retirement before age 65; a reduction in the waiting period for disability retirement from six months to one month and a change in the definition of disability to permit older workers to receive benefits if their impairment bars them from their regular jobs, and a broad program of improvements in medicare.

9 Clerks' Locals Set Up Portable Pension Plan

Los Angeles—A portable pension program for 50,000 members of the Retail Clerks in the supermarket, drug store and discount chain fields has been negotiated by nine locals in Southern California.

Key trustees of the $50.4 million food pension fund have approved the program. It now is being presented for approval to drug and general sales fund trustees.

The plan is considered the first of its kind in the retail field. It skirts "reciprocity" of pensions and instead permits workers with qualified service time to transfer pension credits if they change jobs within the three funds.

To qualify, a worker must have served at least five consecutive years under one of the existing plans and at least 10 years in all.

The food pension fund, established in 1957, now has about 1,500 pensioners. The drug fund has $6.5 million on hand and 380 pensioners. The general sales pension trust was created a couple of years ago and has a fund of $250,000 but no pensioners as yet.

The portability idea is expected to dovetail with the persistent trend toward overlapping and competition in the supermarket, drug and discount stores. With most big stores carrying items duplicated in the various merchandising areas, work experience in one field usually has some application in another, a management spokesman said.

Increase of worker mobility between the several retail fields thus appears probable.

Because uncounted thousands of American workers have, in fact, had pension credits wiped out through job changes, national interest in the portable pension concept has been spurred.

William H. Kaiser Dies, Firemen-Oilers Official

Arlington Heights, Ill.—Vice Pres. William H. Kaiser of the Firemen & Oilers died of a heart ailment at his home here 10 days after leaving a hospital following treatment for a similar attack. He was 54 years old.

He was born in Jersey City, joined Local 980 in 1937 and soon became local chairman. In 1939 he became a system council chairman on the Erie Railroad and in 1946 was elected secretary-treasurer of the carrier's shopcrafts system.

He was serving as assistant to Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept. when elected a vice president of his union last February. He was re-elected at the convention in May.

Final Phase:

Post-Hospital Care Added to Medicare

The final phase of medicare—post-hospitalization treatment in an extended care facility—went into effect Jan. 1.

Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball estimated that between 50,000 and 65,000 men and women over 65 years will need the extended care at any one time in the immediate future.

Approximately 2,500 facilities with a total of more than 150,000 beds can meet the requirements for certification as extended care facilities. Most of them have qualified, Ball said, with the total rising steadily. They include not only nursing homes but also extended care units in hospitals and some units in residential homes for the aged. Some areas, he said, may not have enough beds to meet the demand.

In a letter to state and local central bodies and international unions, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman pointed out that the newly-effective proviso does not cover the custodial care sometimes needed by the elderly.

It is intended, rather, to provide skilled nursing care and related services for people who are too ill to be taken care of in their homes, but do not need the intensive care which hospitals provide.

To be eligible for the services of an extended care facility, Seidman noted, a medicare beneficiary must meet three conditions:

- He must have been in a hospital for at least three days before entering the facility.
- The facility must be approved and participate in the program.
- Admission to the facility must be on a doctor's order, treatment must be for the condition for which hospitalization was necessary, and admission must be within 14 days after discharge from the hospital.

Payment Authorized

Seidman noted that medicare will pay the full cost of the covered services for the first 20 days and all above $5 for the next 80 days in each "spell of illness." The "spell" begins when the patient first enters the hospital or extended care facility and ends when he has not been in one for 60 days.

Not covered, Seidman wrote, are physicians' services except for persons who have enrolled at the $3 monthly premium for Part B of medicare; services in an institution designed primarily for treating mental illness or tuberculosis, private duty nurses, a private room (unless ordered by a doctor), personal comfort or convenience items, and "any services not covered as an in-patient service in the basic medicare hospitalization plan."

In a year-end report, Ball said that in the first six months of medicare, which became effective last July 1, more than 2.5 million of the 19.5 million elderly covered by the law received hospital care for which the Social Security Administration, which administers the program, paid nearly $1 billion.

During the same period 3.5 million men and women who had signed up for Part B of medicare had received covered medical services from physicians to whom the SSA paid more than $100 million. Approximately 17.2 million of those eligible have enrolled for the supplementary medical protection, the report said.

Close to Estimate

Ball said payments to hospitals are moving smoothly and for December will total about $175 million, or close to the estimated monthly average. Some difficulties which may require legislation to correct, the report added, have been encountered in payment procedures to hospitals for out-patient services and for the services hospital-based physicians furnish in-patients.

An estimated 22 million men, women and children, Ball said, were receiving some form of social security cash benefit as of Dec. 29—an increase of 1.2 million during the year.

No earlier amendments, he said, approached the scope of those which Pres. Johnson signed on July 31, 1965.

"The increase in benefits, including cash benefits and health insurance, will be about $6 billion in 1967, the first full year of operation," he said.

"Benefits in 1967 will total some $25 billion, as compared with the $19 billion that would have been expended under the old law. In 1966 benefits totaled $21 billion; under the old law they would have been about $18 billion."

FTC Staff Recommends 'Truth-in Credit' Code

the following information in writing:

- The cash price of the article.
- Total sales, excise or other tax to be paid by the customer.
- The amount of any trade-in to be credited as a down payment.
- The unpaid cash balance.
- Each finance, credit service or carrying charge to be paid by the customer, including any insurance premiums.
- The amount of each weekly or monthly payment, plus the total number of required payments.
- The total amount of indebtedness.
- The total credit transaction price.

In addition, the seller would have to inform the buyer if the sales contract or promissory note is subject to assignment to a finance company or other third party to which the customer would be indebted.

If adopted, the regulations would, for example, bar advertising a product as available for $2 a week or $20 a month unless the total number of payments or the total indebtedness was included in the ad.

The FTC guidelines embrace some of the requirements in the "truth-in-lending" legislation which has been bottled up in Congress. The legislation is broader, however, covering banks, other loan institutions and department stores.

March of Dimes Backed by Meany

Pres. George Meany has informed all affiliates that the AFL-CIO has endorsed the 1967 March of Dimes campaign and urged cooperation with the drive through labor's community services program.

"We are aware that the March of Dimes is concerned with the research, care and rehabilitation of children with birth defects," Meany said in his advisory letter. "Our support will help the March of Dimes carry on its work."

DEEP HOSTILITY of St. John's University administration to the values that make an "adult university" was charged by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. (speaking), former aide to the late Pres. Kennedy, at a rally marking the first anniversary of the faculty strike against the institution. Other speakers included Organization Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Chairman Michael Harrington of the League for Industrial Democracy; Dr. Israel Kugler, president of the United Federation of College Teachers; Rev. Peter O'Reilly, chairman of the St. John's UFCT chapter, and John Leo, associate editor of Commonweal, the chairman.

Union Health Center Marks 15th Year

New York — The Sidney Hillman Health Center of the Clothing Workers Joint Board was pronounced an "obvious success" by ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky at a dinner marking its 15th anniversary.

In addition to standard medical services, the center has pioneered in the development of programs for union members and their families in such areas as vocational rehabilitation and mental health care, and is now sharing its experience with other labor and community groups, Potofsky said.

Chiefly responsible for the center's success, he declared, were ACWA Vice Presidents Louis Hollander and Vincent Lacapria, Joint Board co-managers.

Full Support Pledged To St. John's Strikers

New York—The teachers' strike at St. John's University won strong pledges of continuing support at a protest rally marking the first anniversary of the dispute.

The rally, sponsored by the AFL-CIO United Federation of College Teachers, heard leaders from the academic, labor and public communities express their support of the strikers on the issue of academic freedom and the right to join organizations of their own choosing.

The strike began after St. John's summarily dismissed 31 faculty members without hearings. Another 56 teachers left the university out of sympathy for their fellow teachers. Since then, the university has been censured by the American Association of University Professors and placed on probation by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

Dr. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., historian and Albert Schweitzer Professor at City University of New York, scored the St. John's administration for showing itself "deeply hostile to the values and purposes of an adult university."

"The gallant and devoted men of St. John's who have fought, at such personal sacrifice, for freedoms of teaching and organization on their own campus are conducting an educational battle for all Americans. The academic community is in their debt and the voices of protest will not be stilled until the injustice done to them is rectified."

Nicholas Zonarich, organization director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., presented a $2,000 check to the strikers.

Dr. Israel Kugler, president of the UFCT, said the strike would go on until the 31 fired teachers were reinstated and cleared or fair hearings were held by an impartial body. Union recognition also is demanded, he added.

Also speaking were the Rev. Peter O'Reilly, chairman of the St. John's chapter of UFCT; John Leo associate editor of Commonweal, a Catholic magazine and Michael Harrington, chairman of the League for Industrial Democracy.

Retired Unionist Enrolls As Foster Grandparent

New York—Max Blustein, 11 years retired as a member of the Amalgamated Laundry Workers Joint Board, went right to headquarters when he read a newspaper article about a foster grandparents program in the war on poverty.

He wrote Pres. Johnson, asking how he could enlist. What's more, he got a prompt reply—a suggestion that he get in touch with the Catholic Charities in New York, along with the President's thanks for his interest.

Grandpa and Joseph

So now Blustein, who is 76, acts as "grandfather" five afternoons a week to a two-year-old whose name is Joseph and who lives in the New York Foundling Hospital.

The graybeard and the toddler wander through the parks and watch the birds, visit stores and museums, ride the buses and play games—and eat ice cream.

"It's the best idea you ever had," Blustein wrote Johnson after a few weeks on the job.

An estimated 77,000 children in institutions are in need of extra portions of tender, loving care, to say nothing of extra visitors and extra attention. The Office of Economic Opportunity is willing to pay $1.25 an hour to provide them and believes the project will demonstrate that "low-income senior Americans can be a major new resource of responsible workers for communities and social agencies."

Most of the foster-parents are women, and the OEO is seeking a better balance on the ground that "some identification of the child with men is particularly important to young children who, in institutional life, are often surrounded by women."

The program, which varies in detail from one community to another, is in operation in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Charleston, S.C.; Akron, O.; San Antonio, Tex., and San Francisco as well as New York.

Blustein has five grandchildren of his own, ages 7 to 17, but they have three other grandparents, he pointed out.

"These children at the Foundling Hospital—they're all under 6—don't have any grandparents," he said. "And besides, they've never been in the company of men. They need love from men, too. And, well—I love to give it . . . It's really a joy to be doing such necessary work. . . .

"He's such a good boy, my Joseph!"

Rogin Heads New Labor Center Study

Lawrence Rogin, until recently director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, has been appointed to head a new national center for labor studies at American University and will direct a national survey of labor education.

The new labor education materials and information center and the national survey were initiated Jan. 1.

The center, which has been in the planning stage for a year by AU and the National Institute for Labor Education, will be financed by grants of $38,000 each from NILE and the Ford Foundation. The national survey will be financed by a $70,000 grant from the U.S. Office of Education.

Rogin also was named a full professor in American University's School of Government and Public Administration.

major improvements in social security.

At an end-of-the-year news conference, the President made clear that he opposes scuttling the war on poverty and the Great Society program because of the heavy demands of the Viet Nam war.

The domestic effort must continue, Johnson said, "until we can provide each child with all the education that he can take, until we can see that our families have a decent income, until we can see that the measures that are necessary to improve our cities and to curb pollution and to reduce poverty" are carried out.

The nation, he stressed, "can afford what it needs to spend and I shall so recommend."

The Congress which will deliberate on the President's proposals —and dispose of them—will have 248 Democrats and 187 Republicans in the House, a net gain of 47 Republicans.

Indications are that the roughly two-to-one Democratic majority on House legislative committees will be trimmed to a three-to-two margin. One effect of the change will be to cut back the liberal strength on the powerful House Appropriations Committee, which will have a key voice in setting the spending level of government programs.

The Democratic majority is expected to retain the present 10-5 party ratio on the Rules Committee and to strengthen Administration control by adding two liberals to fill vacancies left by the primary defeat of Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), an arch-conservative, and election defeat of liberal James Trimble (D-Ark.).

A number of proposals have been made to trim the powers of the committee's chairman — scheduled to be Rep. William M. Colmer of Mississippi — but the Democratic caucus which will meet on the eve of the opening of Congress is likely to be guided by the leadership wishes on the matter.

There had been speculation that a Republican-southern Democratic coalition might seek to abolish the 21-day rule adopted at the start of the 89th Congress to permit legislative committees to call up bills which have been blocked by the Rules Committee. Latest indications, however, are that GOP leaders decided against making a fight on the issue.

Another key committee, Ways & Means, would normally revert from a 17-8 to a 15-10 Democratic majority. At this ratio, there would be one Democratic vacancy to be filled. Both New York and Texas have traditional claims to a seat on the committee and a liberal-conservative fight appeared brewing in the Democratic caucus between New York's candidate, Jacob H. Gilbert, and the Texas delegation choice, Omar Burleson. There was talk of enlarging the committee to a 16-11 ratio which would solve the party fight but add a presumably conservative Republican to the committee.

On the Senate side, with a 64-36 Democratic majority and only seven newcomers, fewer changes are likely. Some interest has been generated in a contest for secretary of the Democratic Conference, a secondary leadership post being vacated by Sen. George A. Smathers of Florida.

Announced candidates were Senators Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), Joseph S. Clark (Pa.) and Fred R. Harris (Okla.).

Apart from the Senate rules fight, the opening day spotlight will be on the House, where Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Education & Labor Committee, has been under attack. House leaders were avoiding any speculation on whether Powell would be seated in the normal manner when congressmen take the oath of office.

Formal notice of an effort to change the Senate cloture rule was made by three Democratic and three Republican senators in a letter to their colleagues. The letter was signed by Democrats Philip A. Hart (Mich.), William Proxmire (Wis.) and Joseph D. Tydings (Md.), and by Republicans Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) and Hugh Scott (Pa.).

The Senate's long-standing Rule 22 requires two-thirds of senators present and voting to limit debate. A key issue is whether the Senate rules carry over from one Congress to another, thus requiring a two-thirds vote to change existing rules, or whether each Congress adopts its own rules under normal parliamentary principles allowing a majority to end debate.

Pres. Johnson, when he was vice president in 1963 and thus presiding officer of the Senate, declined to hand down a rule on the question on the ground that it was up to the Senate itself to decide. In effect, this permitted a filibuster on the rules change.

This year it will be Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey who will make the ruling as presiding officer of the Senate. Humphrey, a strong supporter of a rules change when he served in the Senate, has not indicated how he will rule as presiding officer.

Two major bills were blocked by minority filibusters last year—first repeal of the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act and then the civil rights bill.

PRESIDENT'S TROPHY to the Handicapped American of the Year goes to Art Edgerton, blind television-radio reporter and jazz musician in Toledo, O. Edgerton, a member of the Musicians, was chosen by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Blind Union Musician Wins Handicap Honor

Art Edgerton, blind Toledo, O., TV-radio journalist and jazz musician who belongs to two locals of the Musicians, has been selected as the 1966 Handicapped American of the Year by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Edgerton, who is 38, joined AFM Local 77 at the age of 15 when he was a member of the Philadelphia Youth Orchestra, playing under Eugene Ormandy. He also belongs to Toledo Local 286.

His father, Clifford Edgerton was a member of the Longshoremen in Philadelphia and also of Local 77, as he headed a jazz group and was responsible for sparking his son's musical interests.

He will be presented with the President's trophy—a mahogany and silver plaque made by students at the Institute for the Crippled & Disabled in New York—at the annual meeting of the President's Committee scheduled for April 27 in Washington.

Edgerton was born blind to parents who were often ill, but was able to attend St. Joseph's College in Philadelphia and to receive a bachelor of arts degree in Sociology in 1950. The following year he received his master's degree in sociology from Fordham University, New York, and at the same time attended the Julliard School of Music, which gave him a bachelor's degree in music.

He played with the Philadelphia Youth Orchestra while in high school and in 1944-5 toured the service camps with the orchestras of Lionel Hampton and Count Basie.

He has been in Toledo since just before his 30th birthday, when a touring jazz combination he was playing with broke up there.

The award cited Edgerton for his determination and for the example he has set for other handicapped persons. He has been active throughout Ohio in promoting employment of the handicapped.

Metal Trades Unions Endorse Training Plan

Five AFL-CIO unions and the Metal Trades Dept. have endorsed a government-sponsored training project under which 1,200 unemployed persons will be given instruction as production workers in metal plants.

The project will cost about $700,000 and will be undertaken by the American Metal Stamping Association, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning said in making the announcement.

Approval of the plan has been voiced by the Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers and Steelworkers.

"The project," said Henning, "is the type of program which makes maximum use of the facilities of management, education and government to train the disadvantaged for worthwhile occupations.

"These trainees will be in coupled programs, combining their on-the-job training with five hours a week of classroom instruction to help them overcome educational deficiencies."

The trainees will be recruited wherever possible, Henning said, from among the disadvantaged and hard-core unemployed, graduates of the Neighborhood Youth Corps or the Job Corps, and some underemployed persons working as sweepers, cleaners and oilers in some of the plants.

More than 300 association member-firms have agreed to participate in the program. They will pay the trainees at least the minimum wage to start and will receive up to $22 weekly per trainee.

Schedules have been set up for 82 trainees in California, 36 in Connecticut, 290 in Illinois, 95 in Massachusetts, 100 in Michigan, 23 in Minnesota, 36 in New Jersey, 94 in New York, 318 in Ohio, 36 in Pennsylvania, 12 in Rhode Island and 78 in Wisconsin.

Booklet Encourages Apprenticeship Plans

The Labor Dept. has published a 40-page "how-to-do-it" booklet aimed at helping employers and union-management committees set up apprenticeship programs.

It explains the qualifications standards for apprentices, the organization of joint committees, training standards, federal and state assistance available and lists federal and state apprenticeship offices.

The booklet is available free from the Labor Dept. to employers and unions.

Steel Union Appoints Two To Legal Staff

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers has announced the appointment of Winn T. Newman and Alfred E. Lawson to the office of USWA Gen. Counsel Bernard Kleiman.

He also announced the resignation of Associate Gen. Counsel Richard M. Moss, a member of the staff since 1960, to join the Major League Baseball Players Association, the executive director of which is Marvin Miller, formerly director of the USWA Joint Studies Dept.

Newman, the new associate general counsel, is 42, has held legal posts with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Brewery Workers, and until recently was chief of labor liaison for the Equal Opportunity Employment Commission in Washington.

Lawson, who will be an assistant general counsel, is secretary of the Allegheny County Bar Association and staff counsel of the Columbia Gas System Pittsburgh Group Companies.

Labor Hails LBJ's Pledge To Push Policies Forward

GOP-Dixiecrat Coalition:

Conservatives Win First House Tests

By David L. Perlman

A conservative coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats flexed its muscles and took command of the House on the opening day of the 90th Congress.

It upset the strategy of Democratic leaders on two big issues—adoption of House rules and the controversy over whether to seat Adam C. Powell while a bipartisan committee investigates his conduct.

The Democratic majority held together only through the formality of re-electing Speaker John W. McCormack and filling other House offices. The votes thereafter spelled trouble—although not necessarily defeat—for the Administration's program.

The most clearcut test of strength was a liberal-conservative showdown over the 21-day rule, adopted two years ago to curb the power of the Rules Committee to block Administration-supported bills.

Republican leaders insisted they only wanted to modify, not discard, the 21-day rule. But they said they hadn't yet drafted suitable language and supported a motion that repealed the rule in its entirety.

There were two key rollcall votes on the issue. First was a 224-196 defeat of a motion by Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) which would have adopted intact the rules of the 89th Congress.

On this test, only two Republicans voted with 194 Democrats but 44 Democrats joined with 180 Republicans.

New Senate Fight Opens On Cloture

A strong new effort to change the Senate's anti-filibuster rule was begun by a bipartisan group of liberals in the first week of the session.

The goal—to permit a smaller majority of the Senate to cut off a filibuster. Present rules require two-thirds of senators present and voting to limit debate. Most of the rules reformers want a simple majority to have this power. But they are prepared to accept a 60 percent rule if necessary to gain the support of several senators who have supported that figure as a reasonable compromise.

The dilemma—how to obtain a vote on a rules change making it easier to break a filibuster in the face of a filibuster aimed at preventing a vote on changing the rules.

Meany Calls Programs 'Workable'

By Willard Shelton

The AFL-CIO praised Pres. Johnson's State of the Union message as a "candid and forthright" statement of the problems the nation faces and a "workable and achievable" program for meeting them.

Reserving, until the next Executive Council meeting, labor's judgment on two specific proposals urged by Johnson, Federation Pres. George Meany in a statement praised the message for "clearly and frankly" restating the fixed policy of the United States "to defend freedom wherever it is under attack" and continue "to pursue every possible avenue toward just and enduring peace."

The message to Congress, Meany said, "rightly emphasized" that the fulfillment of this policy, including fulfillment of our obligations in Viet Nam, "must not and need not divert the nation from an intensified effort to overcome domestic problems."

The federation president said that "we hail" Johnson's call for action in the 90th Congress on "the whole catalogue of progress," including a broader attack on poverty and "the innumerable difficulties of cities," additional educational programs, strengthened consumer protection, "immediate" improvements in social security benefits, a cleaner and more beautiful America and "the full achievement of civil rights, including open housing."

These have long been goals of the AFL-CIO "to which we are committed and for which we will fight," Meany said.

Seniors Rally Support For Social Security Hike

By Gervase N. Love

The National Council of Senior Citizens touched off its drive for major improvements in the social security program with a Washington rally at which congressional leaders pledged help but warned that the fight for adequate gains will be a tough one.

Some 1,700 council members from all parts of the country rallied in the Interdepartmental Auditorium while another 500 carried the campaign to Capitol Hill with direct appeals to members of Congress.

The rally was held the day after Pres. Johnson, in his state-of-the-union message, called for an average over-all increase of 20 percent in social security benefits with a rise of 15 percent in payments to current recipients, a hike in the minimum from $44 to $70 a month and a guarantee of at least $100 a month for those with 25 years or more of coverage.

The council members stood in a minute of silent tribute to Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.), long a leader in the fight to improve social security benefits, after Charles E. Odell, a member of the council's National Advisory Council and formerly director of the Auto Workers Older & Retired Workers Dept., had ex-

'Level Situation':

BLS Forecasts 4% As 1967 Jobless Rate

By Robert B. Cooney

The government's job experts looked out across 1967 and saw no improvement ahead in the unemployment situation.

The jobless rate will edge upward and average 3.9 or 4 percent, predicted Arthur M. Ross, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Unemployment averaged 3.9 percent in 1966, falling to 3.7 percent in three months of the year.

"We see a level situation in 1967," Ross told a press conference.

As the commissioner drew the picture, the job record for 1966 and the outlook for 1967 was a matter of the "haves" and the "have nots."

"We are closer to full employment than we have been for many years," Ross said. "We do have full employment for the majorities, who have adequate training, experience, connections and education."

But, he said, there certainly is not full employment for those who lack those things. And there certainly is not full employment for the Spanish-speaking, for

Oil Industry 'Pattern' Extended to 50,000

Denver—Contract settlements benefiting more than 50,000 workers in the oil industry were announced here by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. All contain "pattern" improvements of 44 cents an hour, a uniform expiration date and advance layoff notice.

The union said negotiations have been completed with most oil firms but that talks are continuing with scattered small firms and two of the four major operators—Mobil Oil Corp. and Sinclair Refining Co.

Most of the agreements are for two years and have an expiration date of Dec. 31, 1968, the OCAW said.

A major gain in the new settlements was a form of job security, won in the pattern-setting agreement with the Gulf Oil Corp. at the Port Arthur, Tex., refinery. The Gulf settlement stipulates that management does not intend to lay off its employes, but that if it should FEDERAL MEDIATORS hear former Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg assert that compulsory arbitration is not the way to solve national emergency disputes and that free collective bargaining has worked "reasonably well." Goldberg, now U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, addressed 253 referees of labor-management disputes at a seminar marking the 20th anniversary of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Mediators' Conference:

No New Strike Curb Needed, Parley Told

The national welfare does not require any new punitive laws dealing with major strikes or lockouts, and it particularly does not need compulsory arbitration, a panel of experts told the staff of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

"I do not believe a radically new approach is needed" to the settlement of national emergency disputes, declared Arthur J. Goldberg, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and a former secretary of labor. "I am convinced compulsory arbitration is not the answer."

Goldberg conceded that Congress has a right to act in "national emergency" disputes, but said "compulsory arbitration as an accepted and uniform method would be totally alien to the American temperament. Indeed, experience abroad has demonstrated that it will not work in any free society."

Others who gave their views at the opening session of a seminar marking the 20th anniversary of the FM&CS as an independent agency were Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Dr. George W. Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania and Vice Pres. Virgil B. Day of the General Electric Co. In all, 77 speakers addressed the 253 mediators during the five-day seminar conducted by FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin.

American 'Genius'

Goldberg called collective bargaining a fine example of "the genius of American democracy" and said the state of labor-management relations in America is "by and large, good."

Day questioned the wisdom of government intervention in strikes other than those that create "truly critical emergencies" and for which the 80-day injunction procedure is available.

Dr. Taylor, a veteran arbitrator, called the "public employe sector" the new frontier in industrial relations. He advised that the wage-price guideline formula, with its accent on productivity, is not realistic in public employe bargaining. Public employes will continue to ask for a bigger share of the "economic pie," he warned, and urged that they be given the right of representation by unions.

Reuther noted a lack of "meaningful price reductions" where productivity is much higher than the national average, and Goldberg observed "as a consumer I have not recently noticed any dividends" in the area of price reductions, though such price cuts are part of the national wage-price theory.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz advised the mediators to avoid compulsion without turning mediation into a "weak-kneed, spineless, timid process." He advised: "Assert the public interest, for the parties to do with it whatever they wish to do."

"I speak for mediators with guts," he added. "They are the real defenders of free collective bargaining."

Union spokesmen at panel sessions included Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes, Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. A. J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen, Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr. of the Iron Workers, Pres. Howard Coughlin of the Office & Professional Employes, Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke of the Steelworkers, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway of the Industrial Union Dept.; Collective Bargaining Dir. Dan C. Lee of the Retail Clerks.

Hallbeck and Griner reported that much progress in labor-management relations for federal employes has been made since the 1962 order of Pres. Kennedy permitting federal employes to join unions but warned that some agency heads ignore the order and "in too many cases, no meaningful negotiations" have been held. Both advised a central agency for mediation and conciliation, and some method of settling impasses in bargaining.

Company Must Give Union Facts On Grievance, High Court Rules

The Supreme Court, reversing the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago, ruled unanimously that an employer is obligated to supply the information a union needs to decide whether to carry a grievance to arbitration.

The case concerned the Acme Industrial Co. of Chicago, which in 1964 refused to give Local 310 of the Auto Workers information it said was necessary to determine whether or not the contract grievance procedure should be followed to arbitration.

The appeals court refused to enforce a National Labor Relations Board order that management should tell the union why and where it was shipping some machinery out of its plant. The judges held that the NLRB could not step in until arbitration had taken place. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying three cases cited by the appeals court as precedents did not fit the facts in the Acme-UAW dispute.

"There can be no question of the general obligation of an employer to provide information . . . needed by the bargaining representative for the proper performance of its duties," said the high court in an opinion written by Justice Potter Stewart.

The duty to bargain "unquestionably extends beyond the period of contract negotiations," the decision continued, "and applies to labor-management relations during the term of an agreement."

"Far from intruding upon the preserve of the arbitrator," the court added, "the board's action was in aid of the arbitral process. Arbitration can function properly only if the grievance procedures leading to it can sift out unmeritorious claims."

Nothing in federal labor law, the court concluded, compels a union to arbitrate without knowing if there is anything to arbitrate.

Transfer Rights

Local 310 had a contract with Acme providing that in the event any equipment was moved to another location, employes affected by the company's decision "may transfer to the new location with full rights and seniority." When management refused to answer questions the union filed 11 grievances which were still pending when the NLRB held hearings on Local 310's charges. Later the board found Acme guilty of refusal to bargain in good faith and ordered it provide the information sought by the union.

In another case, the Supreme Court ruled that the NLRB was justified in deciding that C & C Plywood Corp. should have bargained wth Carpenters Local 2405, Kalispell, Mont., before putting an incentive pay plan into effect.

The 9th Circuit Court declared in 1965 that the NLRB had no jurisdiction to interpret or enforce a contract. It told the board to vacate its order against C & C Plywood and dismiss the complaint "for lack of the board's present jurisdiction" over the dispute.

The high court, in an opinion also written by Justice Stewart, said that "if the board in a case like this had no jurisdiction to consider a collective agreement" prior to a court ruling, labor organizations would "face inordinate delays in obtaining vindication" of their rights.

Time Crucial

"In the labor field, as in few others," the court observed, "time is crucially important in obtaining relief."

In other actions, the Supreme Court agreed to review a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision denying enforcement of an NLRB order against Great Dane Trailers, Inc., and the action of the 10th Circuit Court, Denver, in setting aside a damage award of $37,988 won by the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Co. from the Railroad Trainmen.

The Great Dane case involved company refusal to give vacation pay to members of Boilermakers' Local 26 who struck in 1963 at the company's Savannah, Ga., plant. The NLRB ruled that the refusal tended to discourage union membership. The 5th Circuit Court, New Orleans, disagreed.

The high court refused to review a ruling by the 2d U.S. Circuit Court that Sheridan Creations, Inc., New York, N.Y., committed an unfair labor practice when it withdrew from a multi-employer bargaining unit in 1963 after negotiations had started. The refusal let stand an NLRB ruling that the firm could not withdraw without getting the union's consent.

Unions' Solidarity Wins Three-Month GE Strike

Schenectady, N.Y.—Four unions preserved a united front throughout a three-month strike at the big General Electric Co. plant here and won through to victory simultaneously.

Local 301 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers ratified a contract settlement Dec. 30 but none of its 11,000 members returned to work for 10 days pending settlement of three other contracts.

Four unions downed tools in October when GE management refused to settle disputes over local issues. All returned Jan. 9—the IUE, Plumbers, Technical Engineers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Local 301 said its new pact includes elimination of three planned transition paycuts; elimination of incentive language; job evaluations for 2,000 employes, with "red circle" rates for long-service employes; payment for union representatives for time spent in discussing job reviews with management, and an agreement to hold periodic meetings to discuss general plant problems.

For the Plumbers' local of 350 members, the major issues dealt with work jurisdiction guarantees and seniority protection. The strike was caused by GE management's insistence on weakening these protections, the union said.

All the AFL-CIO unions involved won the economic gains covered by national agreements between GE and an 11-union coalition set up last March. The coalition achieved settlements at all GE locations, but three locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers remain on strike over local issues at Westinghouse plants.

AFTE Pres. Russell M. Stephens said his union's Local 147 won a "very satisfactory settlement" at the GE Schenectady plant, where 800 members struck Oct. 17. He listed these features:

General wage increases of 4, 3 and 3 percent spread over a 38-month term, additional raises for skilled workers, elimination of merit steps, cost of living raises, more pension benefits and medical care improvements. Management agreed to retain layoff language of the old contract and withdrew its insistence on weakening seniority rights for those on layoff, Stephens said.

The AFTE also achieved a 38-month contract at the GE Pittsfield, Mass., plant. Local 140, with 400 members on strike, improved contract language in many areas which management refused to change until late in December, he reported.

Reuther Appointed To Auto Safety Unit

Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers was among 17 persons named by Pres. Johnson to the Auto Safety Advisory Council authorized by Congress in the 1966 Auto Safety Act.

The council must have a majority of public members, with the rest coming from the industry and dealers. The chairman is Dr. Thomas Malone, vice president of the Travlers Insurance Companies.

seek to do so because of unforeseen changes, it will give advance notice and agree to cancellation of the contract, leaving the union free to use the strike or other economic defenses against layoffs.

The Gulf settlement was approved unanimously by the union's National Oil Bargaining Policy Committee as a major step toward achieving the OCAW's key job security goals.

The terms and conditions of the new pacts parallel the Gulf settlement in their major details and approval of these agreements also is expected, the union said.

The breakthrough settlement provides wage and fringe benefits valued by the OCAW at 29 cents an hour in the first year, with an additional 15-cent wage hike at the start of the second year. Benefits include improved hospital and medical insurance, pension gains valued at 12 cents an hour, and additional pay adjustments for specified groups of employes.

Gulf's Port Arthur refinery is the second largest under OCAW contract. The largest is a Texaco refinery in the same city, where 3,000 members of OCAW and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers are on strike over local issues and wages. An additional 500 members of OCAW were locked out Jan. 9 by Standard Oil Co. of Ohio (Sohio) at Cleveland and Toledo, O., the oil union said.

The Gulf contract at Port Arthur contains a wage package slightly above the bargaining goals set last spring by OCAW's oil policy committee. The job security provision was short of the committee's goal but OCAW leaders called it an "important step" toward the no-layoff guarantee they sought.

High Court Review Sought:

Steel Union Fights Carbide Injunction

The Steelworkers asked the Supreme Court to vacate an 80-day injunction which broke a strike of 2,100 USWA members Dec. 23 at the Kokomo, Ind., plant of the Union Carbide Corp.

In a petition to the high court, the union urged prompt review of the case and reversal "on the merits" of decisions by a U.S. District Court and Court of Appeals upholding the Taft-Hartley Act injunction.

The Kokomo strike against Union Carbide began Sept. 29. It was one of 11 walkouts against the billion-dollar corporation by three unions which coordinated their bargaining through the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Picket lines at 10 other locations are being maintained by the USWA, the Chemical Workers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Management has refused to settle at any location. Local-level negotiations were scheduled for Jan. 14 at Alloy, W.Va., where the OCAW has been locked out since July, and at Ashtabula, O., where another USWA local is picketing.

Pres. Johnson named an emergency board late in December to intervene in the Kokomo strike, and on the basis of a board report that the national defense effort was imperiled, directed the Justice Dept. to seek a back-to-work order. The order was issued Dec. 21 by District Court Judge Leonard P. Walsh and upheld two days later by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The case "presents important questions which have not been, but should be, decided by this court," said a brief presented by counsel for the Steelworkers.

The brief cited these reasons:

● The Supreme Court has dealt with "national emergency" injunction provisions only once, in the 1959 USWA strike against the steel industry. In that case, the justices ruled that before issuing an injunction, the courts must find, first, that the strike affects an entire industry or substantial part, and second, that it imperils the national health or safety.

● The court, in its opinion in the "Steel Industry" case, discussed at length the strike's "peril to the national health or safety" but did not deal with the issue of an entire industry because the strike of 500,000 workers had brought 85 percent of U.S. steel mills to a halt.

● The Kokomo strike presents important legal issues on the "industry" question. Congress intended the "national emergency" provisions to apply only to industrywide strikes. It did not intend that these provisions apply to a single-plant strike.

● A bill to extend the "national emergency" provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act to strikes in a "vital industry or plant" failed to pass in 1952, yet the government, "with the acquiescence of the lower courts," has misused the law to achieve the same result.

Congress Flouted

These cases "contradict the express intent of Congress," the union continued. Besides writing the "industry" requirement out of the law, they have, the petition argued, "trespassed on the right to strike—a right which Congress has been most solicitous to protect—in areas where Congress has expressly determined that the right should not be abridged."

Other points made by the USWA:

● Time limitations built into the Taft-Hartley Act, particularly the automatic expiration of the back-to-work injunction after 80 days, have conspired to make review by the top court "almost impossible."

● The government introduced virtually no evidence to support a finding that the Kokomo strike affects an entire industry or substantial part thereof. Instead it has sought to "panic" the lower courts into ignoring the "industry" requirement.

● Union Carbide employes at Kokomo "sacrificed their wages for 85 days" in "exercising, at great personal cost and hardship, the only economic weapon they possess to secure their desired terms and conditions of employment." The issuance of the injunction deprives them of that weapon and renders the 85 days of lost wages "totally wasted."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its November meeting voted full support for the unions engaged in the walkouts, authorized a contribution of $25,000 to the OCAW workers on strike at Alloy and directed Pres. George Meany to call on all affiliates for additional assistance.

Meany noted in a letter to union presidents that "in the case of OCAW, 3,000 workers at six Union Carbide plants are involved in this strike. Hardship cases are increasing at a rapid rate and the need for money to properly finance the strike is reaching the desperate state."

Asserting that the OCAW has been hard hit by recent strikes, Meany said "I strongly urge that your organization contribute as generously as you can" to assist strikers "engaged in a critical struggle for simple justice with one of the nation's largest, wealthiest and most intransigent corporations."

TEACHERS' UNION Pres. Charles Cogen took a turn on the picket line when AFT College Teachers Local 1600 picketed Chicago City College and other junior colleges. Pictured are Dr. David Simonson, left, assistant to the Local 1600 president; Cogen, and other pickets, including one student representative. The strikers won $900,000 in contract improvements.

Pension Rule Eased In Seaman Shortage

New York—National Maritime Union pensioners who return to active duty to ease the shortage of skilled seamen resulting from the Viet Nam war will not have to wait the required six months for resumption of their benefits after they return to the rolls, NMU Pres. Joseph Curran announced.

The regulation was suspended by pension trustees, Curran said, "to make sure the oldtimers whose skills are desperately needed in this emergency do not suffer a penalty for their loyalty and dedication."

NMU to Fight Suit Voiding Union Election

New York—The National Maritime Union will contest "all the way" in the courts a Labor Dept. suit seeking to set aside the union's 1966 election, Pres. Joseph Curran announced.

The Labor Dept. alleged in its Landrum-Griffin Act suit that the NMU's constitutional requirement that candidates for national office serve at least one term in a lower-level elective position is "too restrictive" a qualification for office.

Curran pointed out in a statement that the requirement for prior experience was proposed at the 1960 NMU convention and approved by the membership in a secret ballot referendum supervised by the Honest Ballot Association—which oversees all NMU elections.

NMU members, Curran said, consider experience in a lower-level post such as port patrolman or port agent a "reasonable apprenticeship" for national officers "responsible for decisions affecting millions of dollars of the members' money."

Curran branded the government suit "an act of political spite" related to NMU court actions designed "to enforce laws protecting U.S. flag shipping."

He said the union will fight efforts to force a change in the NMU's constitution because "to do otherwise would be to contribute to the advancement of government control over workers."

Ship Unions' Publication Makes Bow

The United States in 1967 faces a "fateful choice" between developing "a reasonable national program" to rebuild and revitalize the merchant marine or dooming the nation's commercial fleet "to a certain death," according to Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Hall's views are aired in the first issue of the department's new monthly publication, Maritime, a 32-page digest-type magazine aimed at increasing public awareness of the low state of the nation's merchant fleet.

The first issue of Maritime devotes considerable space to assessments of the industry's outlook in 1967 by members of Congress and spokesmen for labor and management. Hall, who also is president of the Seafarers, noted widespread agreement on two legislative goals:

● Passage of a bill reconstituting the Maritime Administration as an independent agency. It is now part of the Commerce Dept.

● Approval of a "realistic national budget" that would increase the proportion of water-borne foreign trade carried by U.S.-flag vessels, and would support construction in U.S. shipyards of "an adequate number of vessels to achieve this purpose."

Hall noted that the successful move to exclude the Maritime Administration from the new Cabinet-level Transportation Dept. established by the 89th Congress was a defensive measure, but that in 1967 "we intend to move on to the offensive."

Chicago Teachers Win School, College Pacts

Chicago—The Chicago Teachers Union—Local 1 of the American Federation of Teachers—called off a strike set for Jan. 9 when the Board of Education agreed to give 22,000 teaching employes an immediate raise of $500 each and a first contract with other benefits.

Tentative settlement was reached in a four-hour night session convened at City Hall by Mayor Richard J. Daley. The union had a $25 million package as its goal, while the School Board said it could afford only $5.4 million. The figure finally agreed on was $17 million, to be financed largely out of state and federal funds.

Daley was credited also with helping settle a one-day strike of junior college teachers on eight campuses. AFT Local 1600 walked out Jan. 6 and returned Jan. 9 when the City College Board agreed to limit class size, reduce teaching loads and give pay hikes of $20 a month now and another $30 next Sept. 1 for the 684 full-time teachers.

Elsewhere on the school front:

● Cleveland, O., AFT Local 279 made strike preparations but continued to bargain with the Board of Education for higher wages and other benefits. The teachers, representing 3,000 of 5,800 instructors, said they will ask for strike sanction Jan. 16 and walk out Jan. 19 unless the board improves its last offer. Members of the non-union Cleveland Education Association tabled a motion to strike.

● AFT locals won two more representation elections from units of the National Education Association—in Niles Township, Ill., 312-89, and in Cahokia, Ill., 164-149.

Wages Reopen July 1

The Chicago settlement came after the School Board agreed to increase its budget and seek extra funds to finance its first contract with AFT Local 1. Besides the $500 immediate increase, the board agreed to reopen the wage question July 1.

The settlement is subject to agreement on non-economic matters to be worked out by the union and the board by Feb. 1. It brings the starting salary to $6,000 a year for beginning teachers with an AB degree and $6,400 with the master's degree.

The board agreed that for the first time it would pay all hospital, surgical and major medical premiums for teachers; hire 60 teaching aides now to relieve teachers of some classroom chores, and hire special aides for social development schools, Local 1 Pres. John E. Desmond reported.

Local 1 was chosen as exclusive bargaining agent for teachers last March and had been trying since then to get a contract settlement.

AFT Local 1600, headed by Norman Swenson, picketed all day and evening campuses of the city's junior colleges, with 567 faculty members participating. After one day, the college board agreed to pay hikes, binding arbitration of grievances, no more than 25 day students in English composition and speech classes, no more than 35 pupils in other classes, and a limit on teacher class loads—15 to 16 hours a week for physical education, engineering drawing classes and science laboratories, 12 hours a week for other classes.

Swenson said some students served coffee and rolls to picketing teachers and also established their own strike-aid headquarters.

Negroes Gain In Better-Paid Federal Jobs

Negroes held a larger percentage of federal jobs at the middle and upper pay levels in 1966 than in 1965, the U.S. Civil Service Commission reported.

The bulk of the 320,000 Negro workers—about 13.9 percent of the total number of federal employes identified by race—are in the lower paying jobs. But there were employment gains in the higher grades of all three categories—the predominantly white collar and professional classified service; the manual, hourly-paid wage board category, and the postal field service.

Negroes held 18.6 percent of classified jobs in the four lowest grades, down slightly from 1965, but held 10.1 percent of jobs in Grades 5 through 8, up from 9.6 percent; 3.8 percent of jobs in grades 9 through 11, up from 3.4 percent; and 1.6 percent of the jobs in Grades 12 and above, up from 1.3 percent.

The statistics were similar for postal and wage board employes.

The Needs of the Aged

SOCIAL SECURITY benefits are the only substantial source of income for the large majority of the nation's aged, and at their current levels the benefits do not meet the minimum daily living requirements for retired persons.

Social security is the sole retirement system for 85 percent of Americans. With the rise of private pension plans this figure may drop to 70 percent—but not for another 15 or 20 years.

Yet the average individual monthly benefit for all retired workers 62 or over is about $82 and the average benefit for a couple is $144 a month.

This is an intolerable situation and demands immediate action by Congress. Minimum progress calls for an increase in social security benefits averaging at least 20 percent as the first step toward an eventual rise of 50 percent so that the "golden years" are not years of bitter desperation.

The Job Outlook

THE BIG QUESTION for 1967 is whether the economy can produce the new jobs needed to further bring down the unemployment rate.

The Labor Dept. says that to keep the jobless rate at its present level at least 1.7 million new non-farm jobs are needed. If the rate is to be reduced below the average 3.9 percent for 1966 more new jobs must be created.

The job projection is based on an increase in the labor force of 1.4 million persons plus a further drop in farm employment. The economy has produced more than 1.7 million new jobs in both 1965 and 1966 and this surge in employment has been reflected in a continuing drop in the jobless rate.

However, for 1967 leading economists—private and government—are forecasting an economic growth rate of 4 percent after allowing for price increases. The real growth rate in 1966, by contrast, is estimated at about 5.5 percent.

With a lower growth rate this year it is almost a certainty that the unemployment situation will not be improved, and the very real danger exists that it could turn upward.

Thus the need is clearly defined for policies that will not accept a leveling off of unemployment at a 4 percent rate—a substantial distance from what is considered full employment.

If the nation could come up with policies that produced enough new jobs in the past two years to keep the jobless rate dropping, it can do the same in 1967 and in the following years.

The question boils down very simply to how much unemployment the country is willing to accept as "normal" and how much it is willing to pay for "price stability" in terms of men and women hunting non-existent jobs.

A nation as wealthy and resourceful as the United States can master this problem in economic policy. Full employment can be achieved if we think in terms of human beings rather than dollars.

First Things First

Reapportionment Works:

90th Congress Strongly Reflects Impact of 1-Man, 1-Vote Rulings

WHEN THE SUPREME COURT entered that famous "political thicket" in 1962 and handed down its one-man, one-vote decision calling for reapportionment on the state level and in 1964 for reapportionment on the national level, there were many predictions of disaster.

It hasn't worked out that way. Instead, the 89th and now the 90th Congress followed pretty much the Supreme Court injunction. Except for relatively minor examples, the new Congress reflects the court decision even more than the 89th.

Based on latest figures compiled by the Bureau of the Census, virtually half of all congressional districts show a deviation of between zero and 5 percent from their state average; 31.2 percent vary from between 5 and 10 percent from the average. The deviation from 10 to 15 percent is 13.4 percent while only 6.1 percent deviate 15 percent or more.

Of course, there are still "horrible" examples of malapportionment in some states that have not heeded the 1964 decision.

One is Oklahoma, which has one district with 552,863 population and a second with 521,542 as contrasted with two others that have populations of only 252,208 and 227,692.

California is another that shows up poorly on the reapportionment front. It has one district with a population of 588,933 as compared with a low district of 301,872.

Louisiana has a high district with 536,029 inhabitants as contrasted with a low of 263,850 persons.

On the side of better apportionment, however, are some 24 states which have sought to bring their districts more into line with the "one-man, one-vote" principle.

How successful have they been?

The Supreme Court, in its 1964 decision, laid down the general principle that congressional districts must be as equal in population "as is practicable". The majority did not lay down exact standards. Justice John M. Harlan, who dissented from the decision, however suggested that on the basis of the majority opinion a disparity of more than 100,000 between a state's largest and smallest districts would be in violation of the decision.

On that basis, here are some states that now have relatively minor discrepancies in district representation:

Arkansas has a discrepancy of only 8,675 between its high population and low population districts. In 1946, it had a difference of 245,676.

Michigan has a difference of 13,763. In 1962, it had a difference of 625,563.

Maryland has a difference of 10,329 as compared with a difference of 467,475 in 1962.

South Dakota has a difference of 13,288 as compared with its 1962 difference of 14,824.

On an overall basis 210 districts are now within a 5 percent margin of the state average; 133 that are between 5 and 10 percent, 57 between 10 and 15 percent and 26 which are 15 percent and over.

Of the extreme 26 cases, nine are in California, one in Florida, two in Georgia, four in Louisiana, one in New York, one in Ohio, four in Oklahoma, one in Pennsylvania, two in Washington and one in West Virginia.

ACHIEVING the "good" record was no easy job. Vested interests in individual seats and party politics in general made reapportionment extremely difficult in some states. In fact, five states were unable to agree on redistricting in 1962 and as a result resorted to electing some if not all of their members at large. These were Texas, Hawaii, Ohio, Michigan and Maryland.

For the most part the rapidly developing suburbs benefited from redistricting; rural areas suffered the most. To what degree reapportionment benefited the Republican Party in its election victories this year is not yet clear. However, most of the GOP victories were scored in the Middle West where malapportionment was not particularly great.

At any rate, Congress, under the pressure of the Supreme Court decision and the lower courts which have enforced that decision, is now a much more representative body than it was in 1964. The same is true of most state bodies.

From the very beginning labor has been strongly in favor of the one-man, one-vote principle as a basic tenet of democracy. Its support of that principle contributed greatly to the improvements that have been carried out in the past four years.

Morgan Says:

Youthful Turbulence May Hide Sober if Clumsy Soul-Searching

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

IN SOME MAGAZINE the other day I saw a cartoon showing a conscientious citizen with some coins in his hand running after a rather unidentifiable beatnik type and shouting, as I remember it, "Excuse me, sir or madam, but you dropped your change."

Morgan

The current garb of some of the young far-outs can so disguise gender that even when you return their money there is a risk in taking your choice. When I was a boy in the Golden West the only long-hairs I ever saw, below the age of senility, were members of the House of David baseball team. Today girls wear the stretch pants and the boys sport unshorn locks but when the twain meet it is hard to tell which is Samson and which is Delilah. And more confusing still, sometimes neither is either.

I'm not at all sure that Marshall McLuhan or Margaret Mead can explain the sociological or anthropological meaning of all this and I am certain I can't. But it is clear that the traditional rebelliousness of youth has become more vivid than ever before and I suspect that the hungry eye of television has encouraged a certain amount of the picaresque posturing among the protesters.

There is an ageless slice of ham in most of us and what would more quickly inspire the defiant display of a bearded draft-card burning or a motorcycle rumble by Hell's Angels or their East Coast counterparts, the Pagans, than the promise of exposure on the home screen?

The Pagans, whose mother chapter is located, interestingly enough, in Washington, D.C., got themselves in an ugly row with police in New Jersey but despite arrests, fines and some jail sentences they seemed overjoyed at the publicity because, one of them said, it brought a slew of queries about membership.

There is a warped aspect in this scene, including the stark, provocative video picture, because the focus is on the nut, the beatnik, the bizarre. So, suddenly the nation, especially its harassed middle-aged citizenry, finds itself generalizing with pompous shock about the lawlessness of the entire younger generation on the basis of a few sensational snapshots of the depredations of some youngsters who may be delinquent but who really are more lost than young.

Generalizations are inevitable on such a subject but I believe we are neglecting some valid generalizations on the plus side of the picture. The downright wild ones are, surely, a tiny minority of the crop. Nor does it follow that every young man or women who does something maddening to his elders is mad. I daresay there is more sober—if sometimes clumsy—soul-searching among the population bracketed by the ages of 15 to 25 than ever before in American history.

If this is true—and mail from and personal contact with students indicates to me that it is—it represents one of the most exciting turns in the maturing of the United States since Priscilla brushed off Miles Standish and told John Alden to speak for himself. But it also holds a large measure of pain for everybody concerned.

THIS DOES not mean that treacherous, unsponsored trips to the wild blue yonder via LSD should be encouraged or condoned. They should not. It does not mean that the Medal of Honor should be bestowed on the fellow who tears up his draft card, with or without the benefit of news cameras.

But here we have to tread with extreme caution lest the heavy feet of self-righteous patriotism trample legitimate courage, unrecognized, into the ground. There is a difference between a man who is just trying to dodge military service and a man to whose conscience the violence of war is truly unacceptable. I have no foolproof gimmick to offer to tell the difference but a society that can produce space instruments of microscopic delicacy may have to devote a little more time to understanding that delicate mechanism called a human being.

A fresh specimen for laboratory perusal has just emerged at Fort Benning, Ga., where 21-year-old Harry Muir, a great-grand-nephew of Josephus Daniels, Pres. Wilson's secretary of the navy, faces a court martial for refusing to wear a military uniform. "I love America dearly," he said after long and intensive self-examination, "but I love peace more."

Exponents of the New Left, leaders of campus protest movements and their fellows seem at times to love anarchy more than they love peace. It is not impossible, however, that a little transitional anarchy is necessary to breed respect for a lawful society. What many of us fail to realize, however, is this: much of this younger turbulence is conscientious protest against what appears to be a pretty lawless society.

This is a blurred view but it is not completely out of focus. And it doesn't clarify matters much when young people can't find enough older ones with whom to communicate, in trust, their doubts and fears.

I believe the large dimensions of this turbulence indicate that at last American education is beginning to do what it is supposed to do—make people think. Stick-in-the-muds, we have been warned.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

MR. JOHNSON, an extremely pragmatic political leader, made it perfectly clear in his State of the Union message that he had read the Nov. 8 election returns and noted the substantial Republican gains.

It is a different kind of Congress he must deal with in the 90th Congress, with the Republicans in command of a House delegation increased by a net gain of 47 seats, and it would have been unrealistic of him to treat this fact as if it was not a fact.

His opening message to the new Congress, therefore, was phrased in conciliatory terms, including an interpolated sentence expressing the hope that a genuine "partnership" would be established during the two-year period between the Executive and Legislative branches of the government.

It included another interpolated comment indicating that he had taken into account the GOP election victories and remarking that in this country the "genius" of our system depends upon "creative debate" on commonly-recognized problems that allows a selection between "reasonable alternatives."

He was conciliatory, indeed, but by no means defensive or on the run.

He laid out his own affirmative program which he asked Congress to approve, just as former Pres. Harry S. Truman did in 1947 after Republicans had actually won control of both House and Senate. A president has the obligation to read the election returns, but he cannot fail to meet the personal responsibilities in his office to lay out a program.

THE OPENING DAYS of the session indicated very strongly that the conservative coalition—the long-familiar combination between the Republican leadership and southern Democrats—was back again with us, in full force.

Give the Republicans 187 members in the House, as they now have, and about half the 90-odd southern Democrats almost automatically tend to vote with the GOP leaders and against their own official Democratic leadership, which represents the national party interest, on most issues.

The combination represents a majority of the House, a clear and unequivocal majority, on a variety of issues—a motion to recommit an Administration bill to committee (and thus kill it), a motion to substitute a coalition-sponsored bill for an Administration measure, or any one of a series of other devices.

It is as true today as it was in 1965 that the House majority the Democrats enjoyed after the Barry Goldwater election disaster—a margin of more than two to one, 295 Democrats to 140 Republicans—is just about the minimum a liberal, populist Democratic president needs to assure passage of such general welfare bills as medicare, federal school aid, improved and expanded minimum wage standards.

YOU CAN'T RAMROD bills through against the conservative coalition, because Congress is an independent and co-equal branch of the government, and if the majority feels and thinks conservative, that's the way the majority is going to vote.

The President, in such circumstances, must think of trying to get his program through by devices short of ramrodding or the happy circumstance of a 295-140 party majority.

So Mr. Johnson, in his State of the Union message, was extremely careful to avoid arousing the animals of purely partisan hostility, to speak in terms of civility and courtesy, to set forth his views on needed domestic and foreign policy questions with a proper regard for the changed political situation he faced.

He nevertheless set forth his views, declaring he would seek for the demonstration cities program the full sum of actual appropriations authorized in the last Congress, speaking very bluntly about the long, distressing war we still face in Viet Nam, appealing above and beyond partisanship to the common interests of our people in making some of our newer domestic welfare programs work well.

It was a long speech—and just about what the President undoubtedly felt was needed at this stage of accounting for his stewardship.

Bipartisan Support Predicted:

Effective Air Pollution Curbs Keyed to Strong Federal Law

THE BATTLE against air pollution can only be won by a federal law "with teeth in it," an AFL-CIO spokesman declared in a network radio interview.

The causes and effects of air pollution cannot be contained within state boundaries, said AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. James F. Doherty, and "any realistic approach to this problem would have to be nationwide."

"Research has shown that air is located in sheds, somewhat similar to the way that water is located in sheds," Doherty pointed out, and they "may cover several states. If you are going to deal with the pollutants in a particular airshed, you have to have some kind of regional approach."

For that reason, "the federal government has the major role in the sense that it has the major responsibility," he asserted, and it "can't relegate this responsibility to 50 different [state] regulatory agencies." Doherty's statement came as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Knowledge about the cases and effects of air pollution and how to control it is incomplete, he said, so "the important thing in the field of air pollution is money for research and development."

DOHERTY suggested that the $186 million Congress authorized last year to combat the problem is not a "significant amount—especially in view of the problem" that exists.

He predicted that Congress would provide the kind of federal authority that is needed. "Whether you are a Republican or a Democrat, you breathe," he said, noting further that the Air Pollution Control Act of 1966 passed by unanimous vote in the Senate.

Reporters questioning Doherty on Labor News Conference were Orr Kelly of the Washington Evening Star and James Millstone of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

U.S. Commission Urged to Support Farm Worker Collective Bargaining

San Francisco—Labor spokesmen urged a presidential commission to support collective bargaining rights for farm workers as a benefit not only to workers but to their employers and communities.

Three of the witnesses testifying at a day-long hearing Jan. 11 of the Advisory Commission on Food & Fiber were AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, and Henry Munoz, Jr., equal opportunity director for the Texas AFL-CIO.

Kircher laid a 6-point program before the commission topped by the request that farm workers be covered, like other employes, by the National Labor Relations Act.

Referring to the now 16-month-old grape strike at Delano in California's San Joaquin Valley, Kircher said:

"Virtually not a single problem in the last 16 months of strike and turmoil could not have been resolved in a short time if services of the National Labor Relations Board had been available."

Farm workers can make a very real contribution to increase efficiency and productivity of the agricultural industry if they are granted "a voice to improve their circumstances," Kircher said.

Where UFWOC has signed contracts, he observed, "the fact that a worker now knows he has a job to come back to next year encourages him to put down roots in the community."

Munoz, representing Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown, put a statement by Brown into the record and elaborated on its revelations of starvation pay and miserable conditions for Texas migrant farm workers.

Their per capita income, Brown's statement disclosed, is less than $1,000 a year and "80 percent had to travel out of the state to earn that money."

"In five years, 30 to 40 percent of those jobs—even at $1,000 a year—will be gone to automation," Munoz predicted.

He bitterly assailed U.S. permissiviness in allowing "green card" workers to commute daily across the Mexican border to work in American fields. The law under which they are given American work permits requires that they live north of the line but 90,000 to 100,000 of them return home from Texas to Mexico each night, he charged.

Growers Won't Bargain

The Rio Grande City farm strike, now 6 months old, has focused attention "on the deprivation existing in the fertile valley of Texas," Brown's statement declared. "It has further emphasized the total unwillingness of growers to bargain collectively with their workers."

Chavez, a leader of the Delano strike since its inception Sept. 20, 1965, told how growers declined even to accept registered letters or telegrams asking for negotiations before the grape walkout finally was called.

Yet the Schenley Corp., first grower to sign a UFWOC contract, has found unionism to its benefit, Chavez pointed out.

"We have agreed to supply labor and we do," he said. "Schenley used to go to Texas or Mexico for green card workers. It used to use labor contractors. Now we can supply not only enough workers but more."

Union wages, now at $1.75 per hour, and other union benefits have reduced turnover, he added.

In contrast to the California union scale, Munoz told a commission questioner that top Texas farm wages are about 85 cents an hour.

All three AFL-CIO spokesmen asked the commission to urge collective bargaining laws for farm workers.

Other points in Kircher's program were for farm workers' coverage by wage-hour laws, unemployment and workmen's compensation benefits, termination of farm labor import programs, and greater efforts by government and private groups to improve farm labor recruitment methods, housing, education and health protection.

The commission was set up by Pres. Johnson a year ago to make an 18-month study of all aspects of agriculture. It is to report to the President next July.

Legislature Votes Maddox New Governor

Lester Maddox, the ax-wielding total segregationist who closed down his Atlanta restaurant rather than yield to court orders that he must serve Negroes, was elected governor of Georgia by the state legislature.

The election was thrown into the legislature, under the Georgia constitution, because neither Democrat Maddox nor the Republican candidate, former Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway, won an absolute majority at the polls in the Nov. 8 popular-vote balloting.

Former Gov. Ellis Arnall, rated as a liberal and nationally-minded Democrat who lost his party's nomination to Maddox in a runoff primary, got close to 53,000 write-in votes in the general election, leaving both Calloway, with 453,000, and Maddox, with 450,000, short of a majority.

The 259-member legislature, which contains only 30 Republicans, voted 182 to 66 for Maddox over Calloway—an indication that at least 36 Democrats voted for the Republican candidate, Calloway, presumably because of his plurality in the Nov. 8 popular vote.

Ten of the 11 Negro legislators abstained, one voting for Maddox.

Maddox, who took the oath of office immediately, said he accepted the office of governor as a "mantle of responsibility" and would wear it "with dignity and pride."

The Maddox election brings the full roll of governors to 25 Democrats and 25 Republicans—a net gain for the GOP of eight.

Negroes, for the unskilled and other groups, he added.

In fact, Ross pointed out, the 7.6 percent jobless rate for Negroes in December 1966 was unimproved from a year earlier. The jobless rate for white workers fell from 3.7 percent a year ago to 3.3 percent in December.

Ross refused to be drawn into the debate of the economists over ways to crack the highly-resistant jobless rate. One side, labeled "aggregatists," would promote rapid economic growth to create jobs; another group, the "structuralists," would tailor solutions to meet the handicaps of individuals, industries or regions.

"There certainly is a structural aspect to present unemployment," Ross commented. He said the "problem unemployed" do lack skills or education or work discipline or live in areas with transportation or other problems. Or, he added, they may be in need of eyeglasses or hearing aids.

Structural remedies are essential to qualify these people for work, he said, but these will not work unless there is sufficient aggregate demand to provide jobs.

"Our expectation is that the average unemployment rate in 1967 will be 3.9 or 4 percent," Ross said.

He said this is based on a rate of economic growth of 4 percent or slightly less. The nation's rise in its productivity rate is presently retarded, he claimed.

Ross asserted that, over the long run, an annual increase of 4.5 percent in the gross national product —or the total output of goods and services—would be necessary to sustain full employment.

He said a rise in the jobless rate in 1967 to 4.25 or 4.5 percent would represent "a deterioration" of the job situation.

Ross's comments came with a jobs report for December which also included a brief review of 1966.

The December report listed a seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 3.8 percent, up a shade from November's 3.7 percent. This was within the 3.7 to 4.0 percent range for 1966 and compared to 4.1 percent for December 1965.

The unemployed totaled 2.7 million in December.

On the job side of the picture, the Labor Dept. said non-farm payroll employment rose 250,000 more than seasonally, with all major sectors benefiting.

"In contract construction, where employment had weakened since the spring," the report noted, "there was a pickup of 70,000, seasonally adjusted." This lifted contract construction to 3.3 million, seasonally adjusted.

Ross said the gain in construction jobs would be watched since it may indicate an upturn in the housing situation.

The December report also recorded job increases of between 35,000 and 60,000 each in manufacturing, state and local government and in services.

Workweek Down

The Labor Dept. also reported downturns in two leading indicators. The factory workweek, adjusted to account for seasonal influences, declined by 18 minutes to 41.0 hours, compared to highs of 41.5 hours earlier in 1966. And the number of workers employed part-time for economic reasons rose by 300,000, seasonally adjusted.

Reviewing the job picture for 1966, the report said:

"The employment picture remained strong during 1966, although the rate of improvement slowed after the first quarter of the year. The total unemployment rate, which had fallen steadily from 5.5 percent in early 1964 to slightly below 4 percent in early 1966, remained virtually unchanged throughout the year. Total employment advanced strongly throughout 1966 but, after the first quarter, employment gains just about matched labor force growth."

Teenagers and adult women accounted for most of the 1966 job gains, the report said. The demands of the armed forces and the steady drop in unemployment sharply reduced the supply of adult men in 1966. However, adult men scored job gains of 300,000 and their jobless rate fell to the lowest level since 1953.

Farm jobs continued their long-term decline, averaging 400,000 below 1965. The annual postwar decline has averaged 200,000.

Non-farm jobs rose by 2.9 million in the past year but, Ross said, will not rise as much in 1967.

Factory employment rose by 2.0 million since December 1964, with about half the gain coming in 1966. Contract construction jobs reflected the slowdown in homebuilding and finished the year below 1965 levels.

The service industries boomed in 1966. Government employment, mainly state and local, rose by 800,000 over the year while trade and miscellaneous services each gained 500,000 jobs.

The total labor force swelled by 1.8 million—the largest one-year gain in the postwar period—to 80.2 million for 1966.

The Labor Dept. said rising demand pushed employment sharply higher and unemployment lower during the year. It said this encouraged more workers to enter the labor market and caused a labor force increase about 500,000 greater than it had projected.

The labor force is expected to expand by about 1.4 million in 1967, the report said. While women and teenagers accounted for all the 1966 civilian labor force growth, the 1967 expansion is expected to take place among adults, mostly men.

Supreme Court Tightens 1-Man, 1-Vote Standards

The U.S. Supreme Court struck down two redistricting plans for straying too far from one-man, one-vote standards and ordered a lower court to take a closer look at a third.

In a series of 7-2 decisions, the high court indicated that it would insist on close adherence to equal population standards for state legislative and congressional districts in the absence of strong reasons for deviations.

It held unconstitutional an apportionment plan for the Florida legislature which had population deviations not greatly different from some state plans previously granted court approval. But in Florida's case, the court noted, districts closer in population could have been drawn without dividing counties. The court majority in effect rejected Florida's defense that the differences were justified to preserve existing legislative seats.

The Supreme Court also upset Missouri's 1965 redistricting of congressional seats, which left one district with a population 12.8 percent above the average and another with a population 7.2 percent under one-man, one-vote standards.

In the third case, it vacated a lower court decision upholding Indiana's congressional redistricting, ordering that the case be reconsidered in view of its latest decisions.

In all three cases, Justices John M. Harlan and Potter Stewart dissented, terming the population differences "relatively minor."

Observers noted that a number of federal courts have used a rule of thumb allowance of up to 15 percent population deviation in legislative and congressional redistricting cases. The latest Supreme Court rulings apparently set more stringent standards, although the court did not set any precise formula.

In the Florida case, Justice Byron R. White said in the majority opinion that while "mathematical exactness is not required in state apportionment plans," significant variations of population won't be approved "without a satisfactory explanation grounded on acceptable state policy."

Bipartisan Senate Group:

Liberals Open Fight To Curb Filibusters

The strategy—to rely on the constitutional provision that each house of Congress may set its own rules.

This provision of the Constitution, the rules reformers say, clearly means that rules adopted in a previous Congress can't be used to prevent a majority in a new Congress from voting on a proposal to change the rules.

The first step was taken when a resolution to allow three-fifths of senators present and voting to limit debate was filed by Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) and Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.).

Minority Vote Plan

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.) then introduced a proposal co-sponsored by 14 senators of both parties that would permit 51 senators—a majority of the full Senate—to shut off debate after 20 working days. Debate could be limited earlier only by a two-thirds vote.

Filibusters which could not be broken under the two-thirds rule led to the failure last year of both the 14(b) repeal bill and civil rights legislation. Both measures mustered a majority for closing debate but were short of the three-fifths mark as well as of the two-thirds now required.

Past efforts to change cloture rules indicate a close division between supporters and opponents of change. Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) reiterated his opposition to any rules change. Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) said he is "inclined" towards a 60 percent cloture rule but dubious about changing the rules "too drastically." Southerners and some small-state western senators have been traditionally opposed to anti-filibuster rules changes.

If supporters of a rules change have a majority this year, the key to their "constitutional" strategy may rest on hopes for a favorable ruling by Vice Pres. Humphrey, presiding officer of the Senate.

Humphrey, a fighter for anti-filibuster rules when he served in the Senate, has not said how he would rule if a question were posed to him in his role as presiding officer.

An advisory opinion by then-Vice Pres. Nixon in 1957 upheld the right of a majority of the Senate at the start of a new Congress "to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules," although it did not spell out specifically the procedure to accomplish this. At the time, rules change advocates did not have majority support and the motion for a rules change was tabled.

In 1963, when Pres. Johnson was the vice president, he held that the question was a matter of constitutional interpretation which could only be decided by the Senate itself. Since the question was itself subject to debate, it left the liberal bloc in the position of having to use the existing cloture procedure to end debate and of not having the two-thirds vote to do so.

What actually happened was that the Senate voted 53-42 to table, thus refusing to consider, the constitutional question posed by Johnson. A subsequent attempt to close debate on the rules change proposals under the existing cloture rules obtained a 54-42 majority, but failed under the two-thirds rule. That ended the fight.

Only a token effort was made to change the rules two years ago at the start of the 89th Congress, and no votes were taken.

The last change in the filibuster rule was a minor modification adopted in 1959, which allowed cloture by two-thirds of senators present and voting instead of the previous two-thirds of the full Senate.

Party Offices Filled

Both the Democrats and Republicans made minor leadership changes as the Senate session got under way.

West Virginia's Sen. Robert C. Byrd was elected secretary of the Senate Democratic Conference by a 35-28 vote over Sen. Joseph S. Clark (Pa.). The third-ranking leadership post was vacated by Sen. George A. Smathers (Fla.).

The Senate Republican caucus named California's George Murphy as chairman of the Senate Republican Campaign Committee—a post once held by Barry Goldwater. Sen. Hugh Scott (Pa.), who withdrew from the contest for the chairmanship, was again named vice chairman.

Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (Me.) was elected chairman of the Senate Republican conference.

Conservative Coalition in House Shows Strength in Early Tests

The second vote—on scrapping the 21-day rule—saw a coalition of 156 Republicans and 76 Democrats outvote 159 Democrats and 26 Republicans. This 232-185 vote against the 21-day rule compares with the 224-202 vote by which the rule was adopted at the start of the 89th Congress.

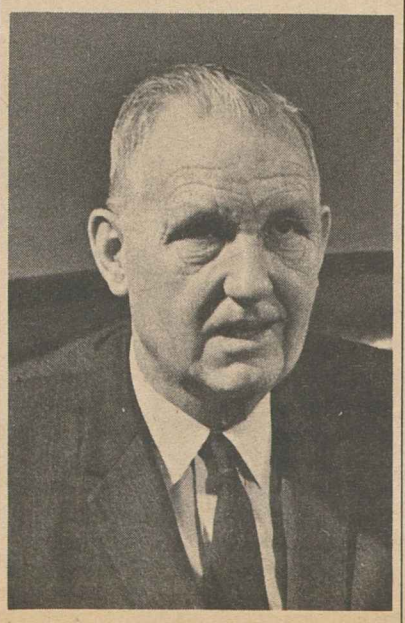
The Rules Committee this year is likely to have a clearly liberal majority and — its chairman has pledged — will meet regularly. Abolition of the 21-day rule is not considered a legislative disaster. But it indicates continuing problems for the Administration with the revived coalition.

On the emotion-laden controversy over Powell, Democratic ranks split several ways while Republicans put up a solid front.

The first division came at the Democratic caucus, the day before the opening of Congress.

Powell, the flamboyant New York congressman who had headed the powerful Education & Labor Committee since 1961, was under heavy fire for alleged misuse of committee funds and evasion of both civil and criminal contempt of court warrants issued against him in New York.

The Democratic caucus voted by a heavy majority to strip him of his committee chairmanship, rejecting a motion supported by the party's leadership merely to suspend him as chairman pending the outcome of an investigation of his conduct.



CARL D. PERKINS

The party discipline came in the form of a motion designating Rep. Carl D. Perkins, a soft-spoken Kentucky liberal and next ranking member of the Education & Labor Committee, as chairman for the 90th Congress.

On the House floor, many of the Democrats who had backed the ouster of Powell as committee chairman joined with McCormack and Albert in supporting a move to allow Powell to take his oath of office as congressman while a special House committee considered whether further action should be taken.

The motion to allow Powell to take his seat under those conditions was made by Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), who had led the fight in the Democratic caucus to remove Powell from his committee chairmanship. To do otherwise, Udall argued, would penalize Powell's Harlem district by denying its people a vote in Congress.

Democrats Split

With Republicans voting solidly against the Udall motion, Democrats split almost down the middle on the issue—126 voting with the party's leadership and 119 supporting the GOP position. This 305-126 vote was quickly followed by 364-64 approval of the Republican motion which denied Powell a vote in the House—although leaving him his salary and office—pending the report of a nine-member special committee within five weeks.

The twin political rebuffs to the House leadership came on the same day that the Administration suffered a damaging blow in the loss of Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.).

Fogarty, whose death a few hours before the opening of the 90th Congress is reported elsewhere on this page, was one of the few liberals with major influence in the House Appropriations Committee. His jurisdiction as a subcommittee chairman included money bills for health, education and labor programs. And many of the upcoming battles between Administration supporters and the conservative coalition are likely to be fought over the amount of appropriations for Great Society programs.

Democratic liberals had given serious thought to seeking to deny the Rules Committee chairmanship to Rep. William M. Colmer of Mississippi, senior Democrat on the committee following the departure from Congress of last year's chairman, Howard W. Smith of Virginia.

The move was dropped, however, after Colmer gave assurances of regular committee meetings. Smith, as chairman, had on occasion "disappeared" for long stretches to avoid calling a meeting at which legislation he opposed would be cleared.

The liberal bloc, with some southern support, did win designation of former Rep. W. Pat Jennings of Virginia, who lost his re-election bid, as Clerk of the House, an important supervisory administrative post.

The caucus put off until later filling a vacancy on the House Ways & Means Committee, which also serves as the group which selects Democratic members of other committees.

The usual flood of bills was introduced by congressmen during the opening days of the session, but no legislative action was on the agenda. The first weeks of a new Congress are usually devoted to filling out committee rosters, setting up subcommittees and scheduling hearings.

Rep. Fogarty Dies at 53; Champion of Health Aid

Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.), a long-standing member of the Bricklayers, a warm friend of organized labor and a House leader in developing health policies, was found dead in his office two hours before the 90th Congress was to open.

Death was attributed to a heart attack. He would have been 54 on Mar. 23.

In a telegram to his widow, Mrs. Louise Fogarty, who was at their home in Harmony, R.I., AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed his "deep sense of sadness" at Fogarty's death.

"I had known him from his earliest days in Washington and had long admired his work which did so much to build America's health standards," Meany wired. "He was a credit to the trade union movement, to the Congress and to his country."

Pres. Johnson, "shocked and saddened," called him a "great leader and an effective member of Congress . . . a major architect in the fields of health and education."

Fogarty was born in Providence and upon completing studies at La Salle Academy followed his father and older brother into bricklaying. He joined Bricklayers Local 1 of Rhode Island and at the age of 23 was elected to the first of four terms as local president.

He was 27 when first elected to Congress. During World War II he enlisted in the Seabees and served on Guam.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor, Health, Education & Welfare of the Appropriations Committee, he obtained billions of dollars in funds for programs reflecting his belief that "I do not think we ought to be a third or fourth-rate country so far as health is concerned."

A daughter, Mary, also survives. The body was flown to Providence for burial.

Sam Eubanks Dies; Ex-Guild Leader

Sam B. Eubanks, executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild from 1941 to 1951 and a member of the former CIO executive board, died following a heart attack at his home in suburban Washington. He was 63.

He had served as executive secretary of his home local, San Francisco-Oakland, from 1952 until 1962, when he became assistant director for technical assistance in the Labor Dept.'s Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports.

Eubanks' election to the top ANG administrative post grew out of the leadership he displayed at the union's 1941 convention, when left wing elements were driven out of control and out of office. He was re-elected in 1943, 1945, 1947 and 1949, and declined to run in 1951 in order to devote full time to what ended up as an unsuccessful attempt to launch a daily labor newspaper.

Surviving are his widow, Mary, and a daughter, Susanne.

'Workable, Achievable':

Meany Hails LBJ's Pledge To Push Programs Forward

Noting that the President had concluded that the "added, abnormal" cost of our defense of freedom in Viet Nam "requires a tax increase," Meany observed that Johnson's request for a 6 percent surtax on corporate and individual incomes included a proposed exemption for low-income families.

Johnson thus "correctly recognized, in part," a basic concept of the AFL-CIO—that even a war tax envisioning "a degree of sacrifice by all Americans" should be based on "ability to pay," he continued.

A greater tax increase levied upon the "abnormally high profits of industry and business" would insure that ability to pay is the "completely guiding principle," he said, and the AFL-CIO Executive Council would make the decision resting upon "the facts which will be developed in the President's messages on the economy."

Meany said that the AFL-CIO's attitude on the President's proposal of a new Dept. of Business and Labor, merging the existing and separate Depts. of Labor & Commerce, would be reached "when the specific proposals are made public."

Merger Plan Weighed

Urging that Congress and the public pursue a similar policy, "avoiding hasty and uninformed judgments," the federation president pointed out that the proposed merger was "a matter of special interest to the labor movement."

The Labor Dept. was formed in 1913, he observed, "to eliminate a form of second-class citizenship for workers whose interests were relegated to a bureau in the Dept. of Commerce."

"We are fully confident that the President has no intention of returning to that concept," he said.

Meany also noted that the President had "candidly acknowledged" that not all the domestic progress of the past several years had "fulfilled the hopes that inspired them" but stressed that the proper remedy was "to strengthen the programs, not abandon the hopes." Meany added that to this purpose "adequate appropriations are essential."

He also expressed specific satisfaction that Johnson had moved to make more money available for "badly-hit residential construction" and to cut "abnormally high interest rates about which the AFL-CIO has long complained."

He was referring to the President's announcement that $1 billion dollars would be made immediately available to saving and loans associations by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and that the interest rate would be reduced from the 6 percent recently charged to 5.75 percent.

Message Unusually Detailed

The President's message to Congress was unusually detailed and specific on many matters and his manner in giving it very serious and conciliatory.

He remarked directly to the Republican opposition, "whose numbers, if I am not mistaken, seem to have increased somewhat," that in our system matters work best when expressed "through creative debate that offers choices and reasonable alternatives."

The President was already on notice, however, that his domestic program at least might face rough handling ahead.

The House leadership of Speaker John W. McCormack and Floor Leader Carl Albert was overturned in the opening session on adoption of the rules and the vote to force Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) to stand aside from swearing-in ceremonies pending an investigation of charges involving use of Education & Labor Committee funds and the contempt citations of him in New York state courts.

Following the President's message, Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), the Republican floor leaders, quickly commented that Johnson had not "made a case" for his proposed 6 percent surtax and indicated that they would seek appropriation cuts instead.

Johnson nevertheless proceeded to lay out his program and explain his conduct of foreign affairs in a methodical way.

He asked for the surcharge "for two years or for so long as the unusual expenditures associated with Viet Nam continue," thus making it clear that he anticipated no quick and easy conclusion to our miiltary operations in Southeast Asia.

He expressed regret over a 4.5 percent price rise in 18 months but pointed out that in a comparable period during World War II the price jump had been 13.5 percent and during the Korean War had been 11 percent.

Dividing his remarks into areas of "programs and partnerships and priorities and prosperity and peace," he recommended an intensified effort "to give the poor a chance to enjoy and to join in this nation's progress."

Here he appeared to place great stress on the Head Start program under which the children of the poorest families obtain pre-school training and he called for its expansion and extension.

He spelled out his social security recommendations—a 20 percent average increase in benefits including a 59 percent hike in the minimum benefit from $44 to $70 a month.

Medicare Extension Urged

He urged that medicare benefits be extended to the 1.3 million citizens not yet 65 years of age who are totally and permanently disabled and unable to earn their livelihoods.

"I hope that this Congress will try to help me do more for the consumer," the President said, including a specific point about requiring that the cost of credit be clearly and honestly expressed.

He urged the strictest possible controls on electronic bugging and wiretapping—"the full reach of our constitutional powers"—except when the national security is at stake.

He urged enactment of a Safe Streets Act to extend federal aid to local police departments.

Yet almost half his 68-minute message dealt with foreign affairs, the nearly 500,000 U.S. troops in Viet Nam, the fact that the war there was not ended and that he could not "prophesy" when it would end.

He spoke of the "transition" in our relations with the Soviet Union and of his hope of a "reconciliation between the people of mainland China and the world community."

But all of this, the President added, rested on his conviction that "we, the American people and our allies, are going to see Viet Nam through to an honorable peace," and for that we must "slowly but inexorably" apply the pressure that makes the Communist enemy realize "that the war he started is costing him more than he can ever gain."

tolled his contributions to older citizens.

Fogarty, who was found dead in his office two hours before the 90th Congress was to convene, had been scheduled to speak at the meeting.

Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen recapitulated Johnson's proposals and predicted that "before the summer is out, this new legislation will be the law of the land."

"In a country as prosperous as the United States," he said, "there is no reason why social security beneficiaries—the retired, widowed, orphaned and disabled—should be denied a measure of dignity and self-sufficiency in our great society."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of a Senate subcommittee that will handle the bulk of the Johnson social security recommendations, said the President's proposals for the elderly "will certainly be high on our agenda." Much remains to be done to improve both social security and medicare, he declared —"and done in the near future."

His brother, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.), pointed out that the minimum social security benefit for the retired is $44 a month and "should be at least double that." He also advocated financing some improvements out of general revenues.

Escalator Clause Warning

He urged a cost of living provision in the Social Security Act, but warned that some who advocate it mean it to be a substitute for further increases in benefits.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) said Congress is "in the mood" to raise social security benefits but not social security taxes, and urged the senior citizens' organization to push hard for genuine improvements.

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) stressed the necessity of old age benefits high enough to assure the retired of self-respect. He demanded extension of the hospitalization proviso of medicare "for whatever period of time is necessary" to clear up a disabling condition and said he would introduce legislation to take the limitation off the earnings of retirees and assure more nursing home care.

Rep. Jonathan Bingham (D-N.Y.) predicted that "the going will be tough in Congress" for legislation designed to help the elderly and that because of the opposition of "a coalition of conservatives," it "will be difficult to make progress."

"Keep up the drumfire of your pressure," he urged.

Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.) joined in urging continued support for improvements.

Greetings and encouragement from sectors of the labor movement were expressed by Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, an AFL-CIO vice president; Assistant Dir. Joseph Rourke of COPE and Leonard Lesser of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

IBEW Solidarity Cited In Alabama Utility Pact

Montgomery, Ala.—Solidarity of 2,400 union members throughout a 21-week strike against the Alabama Power Co. was credited by their union, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, as the key factor in a final contract settlement.

The strike began Aug. 16. Settlement was reached Jan. 6 after an all-night session between company and union negotiators with Gov. George Wallace sitting in.

IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman said in a message to the eight union locals: "This was a long, hard strike and we are very proud of the solidarity of our people. The final agreement, while it did not net us everything we wished, is an honorable settlement, far better than the company's original offer and more in line with the substantial settlements the IBEW obtained with U.S. utility companies in 1966."

The agreement provides wage increases of 3.5 percent retroactive to Aug. 16, 1965, and 3.9 percent as of Aug. 16, 1966, plus a final 4.4 percent effective next Aug. 16; full company payment of medical insurance premiums; four weeks' vacation after 20 years of service, and other gains.

Strikers were aided by IBEW strike benefits. Business Mgr. W. L. Hopper, Jr., of the IBEW System Council, said the strike was notable for the unwillingness of workers to settle for a substandard contract and the refusal of management to meet union standards willingly.

Hopper reported that laws "passed to punish civil rights workers in Alabama were used to coerce and weaken the union, though to little avail." He pointed out also that money spent by the big utility in newspaper ads condemning the union would easily have paid for the improvements asked by the IBEW.

Henning Appointed New Zealand Envoy

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent labor's "warmest congratulations and best wishes" to Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning on his appointment by Pres. Johnson as U.S. ambassador to New Zealand.

"We are delighted at this honor the President has paid you," Meany said in a telegram, "and we are confident that you will serve the United States with distinction."

Henning was research director for the California Federation of Labor from 1949-59, then headed the California Dept. of Industrial Relations until his appointment as under secretary of labor in 1962.

Histadrut Council Board Adds Canadian Unionist

Hamilton, Ont.—Staff Rep. William Scandlan of the Steelworkers, secretary of the Hamilton & District Labor Council and a Hamilton alderman, has been named to the executive board of the American Trade Union Council of the National Committee for Labor Israel (Histadrut).

Scholarship Merit Tests Due Feb. 25

High school juniors interested in scholarships — including the six four-year college scholarships awarded each year by the AFL-CIO — should register to take the National Merit Scholarship Qualifying Test, Education Dir. Walter G. Davis urged.

The tests will be administered Feb. 25 and interested students should contact their school principals or guidance counselors immediately, Davis said.

He also urged high school juniors and seniors to look into the broad range of loan, scholarship and work-study programs available in the field of higher education, including vocational and technical institutions.

Two free booklets are available on request from the U.S. Office of Education of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, Washington, D.C.

"Aid to Students" discusses the various careers students can prepare for with government help.

The second booklet, "Federal Aids for College Students," explains the various government loan and grant programs and lists colleges where these programs are in effect.

Liberals Set Back in Move To Change Filibuster Rule

Abel Hails Mine-Mill, Steel Unity

Tucson, Ariz.—"Our two unions represent more than 107 years of never-ending struggle by men who believe in industrial democracy and were willing to pay the supreme price for it. It is out of this meaningful sacrifice that we are here today, adding still another chapter to the story of our ceaseless fight for social and economic justice," Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers told a special convention of the Intl. Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers.

Abel addressed the 250 delegates at the closing session of the convention, which the day before had unanimously endorsed merger of the 73-year-old unaffiliated union with the 1.1 million-member USWA.

The merger brings together into one powerful organization 80 percent of the workers in the nonferrous metal mining, smelting and refining industry. The Mine-Mill Union has approximately 30,000 members in the industry and the USWA represents another 38,000 workers in the field.

Abel reminded delegates that the struggles in the past had been hard, but warned ". . . we can be certain that there will be more struggles in the future."

Copper Talks Due

For the first time in the history of collective bargaining in the nonferrous metals industry, the workers will be united when they meet copper negotiators late next spring.

"Unity will serve us well," Abel predicted. "Those sitting across the bargaining table from us will soon realize that the contract talks will be different. There will be no playing off one union against another. There will be no undermining of one another's bargaining position. There will be no race to see who can settle first at the expense of the rest."

He traced the parallel histories of the two unions, citing the beginning through predecessor organizations that blazed a bold trail.

The Western Federation of Miners, organized in 1893, initiated the first serious attempt to organize nonferrous workers in the mines and smelters of the West, while in 1874, the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Tin & Steel Workers performed a similar pioneering effort for today's United Steelworkers of America.

TOP-LEVEL CHANGES in the Labor Dept. followed Pres. Johnson's appointment of Under Sec. John F. Henning (right) as ambassador to New Zealand. James J. Reynolds (left) moved up to under secretary and the assistant secretary post he left was filled by Thomas R. Donahue (center) of the Building Service Employes.

New Test Scheduled In Senate

By David L. Perlman

The Senate refused to take a parliamentary shortcut to a vote on liberalizing its anti-filibuster rule, but another path still remained open for a possible rules change.

The filibuster rule which is the target of Senate liberals led to defeat last year of repeal of Taft-Hartley's Section 14(b) and the civil rights bill. Both measures had majority support in the Senate, but could not muster the two-thirds margin required under present rules to close debate.

A ruling by Vice Pres. Humphrey opened the way for a majority of the Senate to claim a constitutional right to change its rules at the start of a new Congress in the face of a filibuster against a rules change.

But support for the constitutional claim advanced by the rules reformers diminished under a sledgehammer attack by both Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield and Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Cloture Move Backed

After defeating the constitutional claim by a 61-37 vote, however, the two leaders promised support for an effort to round up a two-thirds vote to halt the filibuster against a change in the anti-filibuster rule.

The proposal considered most likely to win the Senate's approval—if it ever gets to a vote—would permit closing debate by a three-fifths vote. If all 100 senators were present, this would

500,000 Now Covered:

4 More Rail Unions Win New Wage Pacts

Four more rail unions have negotiated wage settlements with the nation's major carriers, pushing the number of railroad workers covered by new contracts over the 500,000 mark.

The latest agreements cover 150,000 workers represented by the Maintenance of Way Employes, the Transportation-Communication Employes, the Railroad Signalmen and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, which bargains for dining car employes.

The new contracts provide the 5 percent pay raise, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, which formed the basis of the agreements negotiated earlier by the Trainmen, Firemen & Enginemen and Railway Clerks.

The contract extends through the first half of 1968, with an additional 2.5 percent increase on Jan. 1, 1968. The unions will be able to reopen wage negotiations on Mar. 1, 1968, with any increase to be effective on the following July 1.

Besides the pay provisions, the four "non-operating" unions also obtained a third week of vacation after 10 years, instead of the present 15-year service requirement.

The agreements provide for negotiations next June on the question of away-from-home expenses of railroad workers. If direct negotiations don't quickly resolve the issue, the dispute will be submitted to arbitration.

Still unresolved were the wage negotiations of six rail shopcraft unions which have been bargaining through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

Members of the six unions have authorized their officers to call a strike. Before a showdown is reached, however, a Presidential Emergency Board is likely to be named. Under the Railway Labor Act, this would avert a strike for at least 60 days while the board makes its recommendations and the parties bargain for a month thereafter.

The shopcraft unions are the Railway Carmen, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Boiler Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, Machinists, and Firemen & Oilers.

Also unsettled were wage negotiations of the Switchmen, whose members earlier voted down a 5

Meany Lauds Labor Dept. Nominations

The AFL-CIO is "delighted" at Pres. Johnson's selection of James J. Reynolds and Thomas R. Donahue for top Labor Dept. posts, Federation Pres. George Meany declared.

Reynolds, who has been assistant secretary for labor-management relations since 1961, moves up to under secretary, the number two job in the department. He succeeds John F. Henning, who has been appointed U.S. ambassador to New Zealand.

Reynolds, 60, is a former official of the American Locomotive Co. and has helped mediate major labor disputes in recent years. Meany said Reynolds "has a fine record of distinguished service in the Dept. of Labor and we believe he will prove to be an excellent under secretary."

Ways & Means Seat Goes to N. Y. Liberal

House Democrats chose a New York liberal over a Texas conservative to fill a key vacancy on the powerful Ways & Means Committee, but the margin was close enough to give Administration supporters the shudders.

The secret-ballot vote in the House Democratic caucus was 115 for Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (N.Y.) to 113 for Rep. Omar Burleson (Tex.).

Gilbert's selection puts 12 congressmen who usually support the Administration on the 25-member committee, with an equal number who normally vote with the conservative coalition and Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) holding the swing vote. Mills, one of the most influential men in the House, has pushed through some important Administration bills and blocked others.

There were other factors than a straight liberal-conservative showdown in the caucus vote. Nevertheless a defeat for Gilbert would have been read as a strong rebuff to the Democratic leadership and a major setback to the Administration's legislative program.

On COPE's scoreboard, Burleson cast 11 "wrong" votes in the 89th Congress and only one "right" vote. Gilbert had a perfect COPE record of 13 "right" votes.

Reduction of the Democratic majorities on all committees except the Rules Committee left only one Democratic vacancy on the Ways & Means Committee despite the retirement or election defeats of three Democratic members. Both New York and Texas had lost their traditional member and sought the single opening.

The Ways & Means Committee handles all tax-related bills, including social security and unemployment compensation. Its

3-Point NLRB Program Sets Fair Election Code

A new three-point program to make sure workers know their rights and unions and employers their obligations in representation elections has been announced by the National Labor Relations Board.

The agency's basic goal is to stimulate fair play and warn against prohibited conduct in an effort to avoid post-balloting objections in the 8,000 elections it conducts each year, the announcement said.

The program includes:

- Leaflets explaining the NLRB election process.
- In-plant bulletin board notices pointing out the mutual rights and responsibilities of employes, unions and employers.
- Election notices that cite the right of workers to vote free of improper pressures, in addition to the traditional sample ballot and time and place of election.

The program, the board said, is part of the federal government's continuing effort to advise citizens of rights granted by Congress.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch credited Member Sam Zagoria with initiating and implementing "the concept that labor organizations and employers should be informed about and encouraged by the NLRB voluntarily to comply with basic principles of fair conduct in the holding of employe elections."

Job Picture Brighter in '66 For Key Areas

The job situation improved during 1966 in most of the nation's 150 major manpower centers, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The area job report for November-December showed only eight areas with "substantial unemployment"—a jobless rate of 6 percent or higher. A year earlier, 19 major areas were in this category.

During the year, the number of areas in the low unemployment grouping—3 percent or less unemployed—increased by 18 to a record total of 66 in December.

Large metropolitan areas such as Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Dallas and Seattle were placed on the low unemployment list in 1966, the Labor Dept. said.

Job gains in these areas were traced mainly to pickups in such durable goods industries as electrical and non-electrical machinery, aircraft, ordnance and instruments, both defense and civilian. Growth in state and local government, trade and service industries also were reported.

The largest payroll increases foreseen for the immediate future are in key aircraft and machinery manufacturing areas, with the outlook in the auto industry clouded by recent layoffs, the report continued.

The major areas suffering substantial unemployment are: Fresno, Stockton and the San Bernardino-Riverside-Ontario area in California; Fall River and Lowell, Mass.; Altoona, Pa., and two areas in Puerto Rico.

Meany Lauds Labor Dept. Appointments

secretary, Johnson nominated 38-year-old Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes.

Donahue, a graduate of Manhattan College with a law degree from Fordham University, served from 1949 to 1957 on the staff of the 42,000-member BSEIU Local 32B in New York. He was successively editor, education director and director of the contract division.

From 1957 to 1960, he was European labor program coordinator in Paris for the Free Europe Committee, the parent organization of Radio Free Europe.

Besides serving as assistant to Sullivan, Donahue has also been secretary of the BSEIU's Civil Rights Committee.

He was described by Meany as "a man of outstanding talent, ability and experience" who will be "a first-rate public servant."

Meany said Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz "is getting two fine men for his leadership team and we congratulate them both on their appointment."

Sullivan commented that Donahue has done "an exceptionally fine" job with the Building Service Employes and expressed pride "that the President has seen fit to call upon one of our members to serve in the very important office of assistant secretary of labor."

10 Million Jobs in 1966 Filled Through USES

The public employment service found more than 10 million jobs for workers in 1966, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced.

The 6,535,000 non-farm placements exceeded these of the past three years, he said, but the 4,115,000 farm jobs were less than in 1965.

NLRB Wins New Test On Election List Data

The National Labor Relations Board's new names-and-addresses rule was upheld by Chief Judge William J. Campbell in the U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois.

The rule provides that an employer, pending an NLRB representation election, must make available to interested unions a names-and-addresses list of employes eligible to vote. In a number of cases in which employers have refused to supply such a list the NLRB has issued subpenas demanding them.

Four federal district courts have now split evenly when the NLRB has sought enforcement of its subpenas in court action.

In the latest case, the Auto Workers and the Machinists sought bargaining rights for 613 employes of the Crane Packing Co. The company, although consenting to an NLRB representation election, refused the names-and-addresses list.

On objection of the Auto Workers, the NLRB set aside the election results and ordered a second election, issuing its subpena for the employe list.

Judge Campbell in a memorandum opinion observed that the employer has "an exceptional opportunity, at the plant and through the mails, to present its views" on the merits and demerits of union representation to its employes.

In democratic elections generally, he wrote, the names and addresses of the electorate are available to parties at interest—whether they be public elections, corporate elections, or the election of union officials.

Employes preparing to vote in "so important" a matter as a representation election "should be given the maximum in opportunity to be fully informed on all sides of the issues," the court held, and a union seeking representation rights should have "an adequate opportunity" to present its views.

Judge Campbell also noted that the Crane Co. had engaged "actively" in a direct mail campaign with its employes "even though it had a 'captured electorate' in the plant—an advantage the unions do not enjoy."

Supplying a union with a names-and-addresses list "seems fundamental if the right to organize these employes is to be real," he declared. He granted enforcement of the NLRB's subpena.

The NLRB won enforcement of a similar subpena in U.S. District Court in Michigan and was denied enforcement of other subpenas in federal courts in Florida and North Carolina. It is appealing the adverse North Carolina decision in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Glass Union Names Public Relations Chief

Columbus, O. — Pres. Ralph Reiser of the Glass & Ceramic Workers has announced the appointment of Charles L. Borsari, news editor of the Columbus Citizen-Journal, as the union's coordinator of public relations.

Textbook Policy Set:

Kingsport Strikers Win Detroit Ruling

Detroit—The Detroit Board of Education voted after a public hearing to buy books from the struck Kingsport, Tenn., Press only "in those instances where it is clear that comparable alternative titles are not available."

Labor spokesmen had urged the board to refrain from spending tax money for books produced by strikebreakers at Kingsport, where 1,200 members of five unions have been striking for a fair contract since Mar. 11, 1963. A labor spokesman called the vote a victory for the union position. A management official, who opposed the action, interpreted it to mean that the board "will not buy any Kingsport Press books" if similar books can be bought anywhere else.

The board vote was 4-1 in favor of the Kingsport Press resolution, with one member abstaining and one absent because of illness. Member Peter F. Grylls, who cast the lone no vote, said he did so to avoid a position based on sympathy.

He made his personal views clear in a statement reminding board members that the labor movement "was concerned about education for all of the people during times when business and industry were concerned mostly" with "maintaining a large pool of untrained and unskilled labor which could be manipulated to serve its needs."

The fight for good public education, good training and good jobs continues today, Grylls asserted, adding:

"In one region of our country, the South, the fight is far from won. It is a region characterized by illiteracy, poor labor-management relations, and a low level of economic opportunity generally."

The School Board action grew out of an appeal by the Wayne County AFL-CIO and the Detroit Allied Printing Trades Council. Other members of the trade union movement around the country have taken similar action in keeping with the recommendation of the 1965 AFL-CIO convention.

Labor's request for boycott action here was voiced by John R. Lutz of the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Pres. Al Barbour of the County AFL-CIO; Sec.-Treas. Curtis Bumbalough of the Printing Trades Council; Walter Allen of the Printing Pressmen, who spoke for the Allied Kingsport Press Unions, and Pres. Mary Ellen Riordan of the Detroit Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO.

Allen told the board that Kingsport Press management has offered to rehire only 105 of the 1,700 former employes who struck for comparable industry wages and working conditions. The strikers are members of the Pressmen, Bookbinders, Stereotypers & Electrotypers, Machinists and Typographers.

Worker Taxes Cited

Barbour noted that many of the dollars paid for school textbooks are being passed on to the employer at Kingsport, and since public schools are supported to a great extent by the taxes of organized workers, labor believes school officials should act on objections to such purchases.

He quoted AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as saying "what is involved is our rights as citizens. We have a right to say that public money shall be expended in a way that will not depress wages and working conditions and not work a hardship on labor."

Mrs. Riordan testified that the resolution could be fairly implemented without detriment to school children, and urged the board to adopt it.

Board Member A. L. Zwerdling explained his vote in these words: "I personally condemn the anti-labor policies of the Kingsport Press. I consider it completely un-American, wrong, and contrary to everything that is being done in this state."

Kingsport Press officials opposed the resolution. So did Mrs. Olga Schuster, president of the Detroit Education Association and Martin J. Struhar, identified as a director of the non-union section of the Printing Industries of America, Washington, D.C.

At Mediators' Parley:

Bargaining Praised As Boon to Progress

Collective bargaining has produced benefits for an "overwhelming majority" of Americans in the last 25 years and its continued success is essential to hopes for the nation's continued progress and growth, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers told a final session of a national conference of federal mediators.

The roster of benefits was called by Beirne—health care, hospitalization, more paid holidays and vacations, financial protection against layoffs and plant closings, savings plans, guaranteed employment, and improved incomes for millions.

Dedication Cited

Those who criticize the American labor movement for lack of social concern "simply cannot sustain their argument on any sound factual basis," Beirne told the 20th anniversary conference of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. He added:

"In this nation, the labor movement is the only private organization whose primary dedication is to the widest and best interests of all the American people. We sympathetically deal with the whole gamut of difficulties and challenges that . . . confront the average American citizen and his family."

Mediation Service Dir. William E. Simkin, concluding the conference of 250 staff members, supported the views of previous speakers that the nation should refrain from any new punitive labor laws.

Simkin said he not only wants to see the government avoid any further move toward compulsory arbitration but also would like to see it back away from some of the laws already on the books.

Responding to a call from Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who urged the conferees to be "mediators with guts," Simkin agreed they should "assert the public interest," as Wirtz advised, but declared they also should avoid being the "crutches" for either labor or management.

The objective should be "to preserve collective bargaining," the head mediator declared, adding "we are there to assist the parties, not to intervene."

Simkin said the real goal of laws governing collective bargaining is "realistically" to preserve the right of either side to reject what it does not like in a contract. Mediators must, he concluded, "preserve the right of the parties to say no" and thus to keep bargaining truly free.

Arthur J. Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said he believes no "radically new" approach is needed to the settlement of national emergency disputes and "I am convinced that compulsory arbitration is not the answer."

Vice Pres. R. Conrad Cooper of the U.S. Steel Corp. called for ways of settling joint differences "without the use of force on either side, without crisis dates, without asking the government to do the job for us."

Simkin presented the agency's distinguished service award to William F. White, retired St. Louis regional director, for 32 years of effective service. Commissioner Charles F. Werkheiser of the service's Philadelphia office won a meritorious service award for "preventive" mediation efforts. Five mediators won citations for 25 to 30 years of agency service.

MULTI-UNION BARGAINING will increase in importance to unions as companies spread operations over the entire economy, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers tells the 20th anniversary seminar of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Also shown are FMCS Dir. William E. Simkin, gesturing, and Vice Pres. R. Conrad Cooper of U.S. Steel Corp. More than 250 mediators attended the week-long seminar sessions.

"Posting of these notices will be a significant stride along the road to free expression of the untrammeled choice of employes through the medium of the secret-ballot election," said McCulloch and Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman in a joint statement.

"This in turn is the principal method Congress set up to resolve representation disputes and is the threshold to the collective bargaining process which has contributed so much to our industrial democracy and vigor."

The leaflet describing the election machinery can be obtained for general distribution from NLRB headquarters in Washington or at any of the 31 regional offices.

The first bulletin board notice is posted when a request for an election is filed.

The second goes up when an election is agreed to, as happens 75 percent of the time, or is ordered.

Both notices are larger in size and more eye-catching than those used in the past, and should be readily visible to workers passing a bulletin board. They and the leaflet are printed in large, highly legible type.

The NLRB said all three emphasize the right federal law gives workers to self-organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing —or not to exercise these rights.

Everybody involved is urged to "cooperate fully" in "maintaining basic principles of a fair election" as the law requires. All parties to a vote are specifically warned against:

- "Making threats of loss of jobs or loss of benefits by a party capable of carrying out such a threat.
- "Firing employes or causing them to be fired in order to encourage or discourage union activity.
- "Making promises of promotions, pay raises, or other benefits, to influence an employe vote, by a party capable of carrying out any such promise.
- "Making threats of physical force or violence to employes to influence their vote in the election.
- "Making misstatements of important facts where another party does not have a fair chance to reply.
- "Making campaign speeches to assembled groups of employes on company time within the 24-hour period before the election.
- "Inciting racial or religious prejudice by inflammatory appeals."

Henle Appointed To New BLS Post

Peter Henle, former AFL-CIO assistant research director, has been named to the newly-created post of chief economist in the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A second new post, that of chief statistician, also was created and will be filled by Assistant Commissioner of Labor Statistics Leon Greenberg.

Merger Links Mine-Mill to Steelworkers

He cited many of the struggles of the two unions as classic examples of the will of men who have dedicated their lives to helping their fellow workers. He added:

"It can be said that out of the crucibles of Idaho mining and Pennsylvania steelmaking in 1892 the die was cast for the eventual organization of the two industries—even though both unions had suffered heartbreaking setbacks in 1892."

The merger of the organizations came about following an agreement to collaborate on federal mine safety legislation that resulted in passage of a bill last year. It was during this joint endeavor that Mine-Mill Pres. Albert C. Skinner expressed the thought to USWA officials that both unions should get on with the job of uniting the workers.

A mutual assistance pact followed which served to underscore how practical and feasible organic unity was. Unity finally came, spokesmen for the two organizations said, because of a natural respect and understanding that each held for the traditions and historic struggles of the other.

Charters Planned

Under the terms of the merger agreement, Mine-Mill will be affiliated with the Steelworkers until June 30. On that date each local union of Mine-Mill will be issued a USWA charter. The Intl. Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers will cease to exist after that date. The merger will not include an estimated 14,000 members of Mine-Mill in Canada.

Abel revealed to delegates that a combined conference of representatives of all workers in the nonferrous metals industry will be held in March, at a site still to be selected, for the purpose of developing goals for the coming talks with the nation's major copper producing companies.

USWA Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke and Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony spoke briefly.

Following the convention, Skinner, Abel and other international officers of both unions, plus all the delegates and guests, joined Typographical Union pickets before the plants of the Tucson Daily Citizen and Arizona Daily Star, where a strike has been in progress since Nov. 28.

The Mine-Mill Union was expelled from the former CIO in 1950 on findings that its then leadership was under Communist influence.

$1-an-Hour Gains Mark 3-Year J. I. Case Pact

Detroit—Gains worth nearly $1 an hour in a new three-year agreement with the J. I. Case Co. have been negotiated for 7,000 members of the Auto Workers in five states, the union announced.

UAW Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse said the contract was negotiated in "nearly two months of collective bargaining—without the need of taking strike votes" in any local unions. For the first time in the UAW's relations with J. I. Case, the agreement covers all members in seven plants, Greathouse reported.

The new pact, subject to membership ratification, has two new benefits—a fully funded and vested pension plan and the standard UAW cost-of-living wage escalator clause, the union reported.

The pension plan provides benefits of $6 a month per year of service; retirement as early as age 55; disability protection and survivor benefits. Management will pay $3 per month for Medicare Part B for all retirees and their spouses.

Wage increases range from 27 to 88 cents an hour over the contract term. Skilled tradesmen will get additional wage gains plus a uniform apprenticeship program and a clause regulating the subcontracting of work.

The pact calls for improvements in the insurance program, including payment for prescription drugs, physicians' home and office calls, and full coverage of hospital, medical and surgical benefits; increased life insurance, and 52 weeks of disability benefits at higher levels.

Other gains include two additional paid holidays for a total of nine, an added week of paid vacation which can be used as a paid absence allowance for casual days off, three days' bereavement pay, jury duty pay, make up pay for military encampment, tuition refunds, leaves of absence for educational purposes, and transfer rights with chain-wide seniority when plants or operations are moved.

Top Management Shifted

Greathouse said that the "historic agreement" was made possible only after a shift in the top management team and "new company attitudes and ideas."

The following UAW locals are covered by the agreement: Local 180, Racine, Wis.; Local 378, Rockford, Ill.; Local 806, Rock Island, Ill.; Local 807, Burlington, Ia.; Local 858, Bettendorf, Ia.; Local 689, Terre Haute, Ind., and Local 792, Stockton, Calif.

UAW Opens Schools To Complete Education

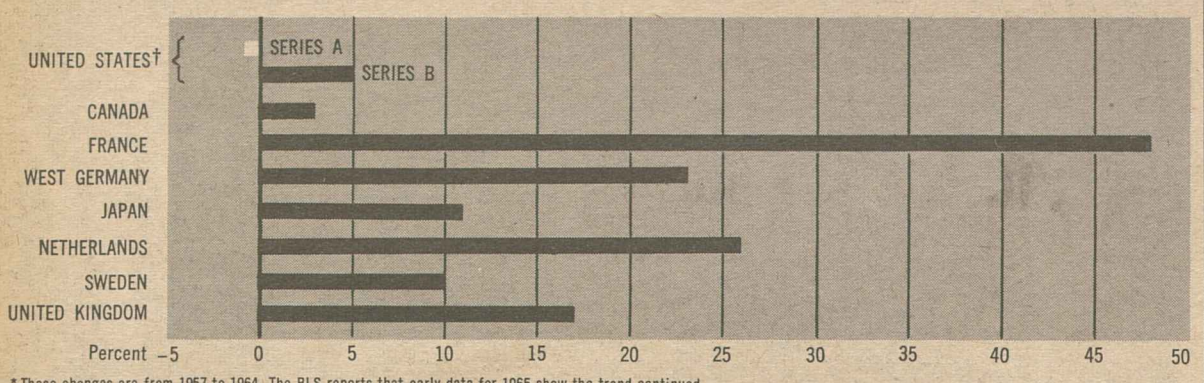
Detroit—Members of the Auto Workers and their adult relatives and friends will be able to complete their education through high school by attending classes in 20 union halls throughout the Detroit metropolitan area.

The experiment in basic education was announced by UAW Education Dir. Carroll M. Hutton. Local unions in Detroit, Wayne County and Southern Macomb County are donating their halls to the program; area school systems are providing the teachers and materials under a federal education grant. Classes also will be held in the Trade Union Leadership Council school.

Participants who finish the program will be given an eighth grade certificate or a high school diploma. Applicants can register and first classes will be held Jan. 17 and 18. Sessions are planned for both day shift and night shift workers.

"The key to this program, we feel, is the use of our union halls for classes for our union's members," said Hutton. "We believe that thousands of UAW members would complete their schooling if they could join with friends and shopmates in classes held in the familiar surroundings of their own or a nearby union hall. We can now give them this opportunity."

Hutton said the program was developed after research showed that 26,000 adult Detroiters never went to school at all; that 96,000 never got beyond the fourth grade; that about 420,000, or two of every five, failed to complete grade school and that about 650,000, or nearly two out of every three, lacked a high school education.



* These changes are from 1957 to 1964. The BLS reports that early data for 1965 show the trend continued.

U.S. Trade Position Found Strong Despite Lower Wages Overseas

Misleading allegations about competition from low foreign wages are harming this country's chances for improving its trade policies, Mrs. Elizabeth Jager, research associate in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, charges in a study of wages and competition from abroad.

"Despite lower wages overseas, the U.S. has continued to export more than it imports," she writes in the current issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO monthly publication.

And, she adds, "recent evidence shows that labor costs in major industrial countries are rising more rapidly than they are in the U.S.," even though "this improvement has not been reflected in America's trade status.

"It is time to take a closer look at how wages and labor costs affect these patterns and to recognize that other factors in international trade need more attention."

Wage rates alone, Mrs. Jager points out, tell little about the wage cost to a company. They must be compared with output per hour before the wage cost comparison becomes "realistic," she says, adding that "productivity and its changes —efficiency of production—determine as much about wage costs as wage rates."

Among other cost factors that have to be considered she lists fringe benefits, which usually are a "much higher proportion of total pay" in other countries than in the U.S., the cost of power, raw materials, overhead, taxes, interest, advertising, selling, distribution costs, profits, prices and the monetary exchange rate.

Mrs. Jager recalls that the AFL-CIO has supported the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 to facilitate short-run adjustments, as well as international agreements restricting imports of some products.

It also has long urged a program of international fair labor standards, she goes on, but "because other countries have different levels of industrial development and different living standards, a general minimum wage standard cannot be adopted."

The time has come for "more action" in determining how to insure that standards abroad do not offer unfair competition to the U.S. worker, she adds, and for another proposal supported by the AFL-CIO—an examination of where U.S. business invests overseas, how much it invests and what the cost-price and employment relationships really are.

"One reason these trade problems remain unsolved," Mrs. Jager writes, "is that even those who make the trade rules, those who complain to Congress and those who write about foreign trade in the press overemphasize the role of wages and labor costs here and abroad.

"The cry that U.S. wages are pricing the U.S. out of world markets is a familiar one. Yet throughout this century and even in the 1960s, U.S. industry has been selling more overseas than it has bought."

Foreign competition has jumped since 1957, she notes, because by that time war-devastated economies had been rebuilt and many countries again were able to produce more than they could sell in home markets. In addition, she points out, foreign manufacturers appeared more willing than U.S. producers to cut their profits to make sales.

Prices Stayed Up

"Output per manhour in the U.S. rose more rapidly than did wage and salary increases in the 1960s," she continues. "But prices did not come down. Many U.S. companies took advantage of tax improvements not to pass on the savings but to hike profits at home and to invest billions of dollars overseas in foreign countries.

"They sold more overseas—from their overseas plants. They sold more from the U.S., too, but the rise was not so rapid. They were more 'competitive in world markets' in terms of the cost of labor in the U.S., but they were not necessarily trying to compete by exporting from the U.S. Nor were U.S. companies necessarily lowering prices to meet import competition."

Mrs. Jager states that comparable statistics on the costs of the different factors in production are not available on an international basis, but declares that "false charges about foreign wage rates obstruct the way toward better understanding of the real problems of international competition."

"Singling out labor costs," she says, "can give too much attention to what is only one factor in competition around the world."

Firm Ruled Responsible For Civic Drive on Union

A federal appeals court has upheld the National Labor Relations Board's finding that the Hamburg Shirt Corp., Hamburg, Ark., was responsible for the warnings local businessmen and civic leaders gave its employes against joining the Clothing Workers during an organizing campaign.

The ruling pointed out that Hamburg businessmen formed an industrial development corporation which persuaded a shirt manufacturer to locate in the community. They endorsed notes for preliminary costs and were later paid from the proceeds of a $300,000 bond issue.

With such an intimate connection between the firm and the community, the company's responsibility under the Taft-Hartley Act is not bound by "refinements of the law of agency," said Judge Harold Leventhal of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The NLRB was justified, he continued, in accepting the firm's refusal to disassociate itself from the businessmen's intervention as "recognition or ratification" of the "role of those not formally included in the organization chart."

He said "it was not arbitrary for the board to conclude that the company took advantage of its employes' impression that the community leaders spoke for the company in driving home the implications of the comments made more gingerly by company officials."

The court in addition upheld the board finding that the company violated the Taft-Hartley Act by refusing recognition when the union had obtained a majority of signed authorization cards, and that it breached the act again when it circulated a questionnaire among its workers asking about union activity in preparation for its appearance before the NLRB trial examiner.

While granting the board's petition for enforcement of its order against the Hamburg firm, the Circuit Court turned down the union's contention that the board erred in not granting broader relief from the company's unfair practices. The ACWA had suggested a $100,000 bond to be forfeited if the company did not carry out the order.

Connor Resigns As Commerce Chief

Pres. Johnson accepted the resignation of John T. Connor as secretary of commerce and named 37-year-old Assistant Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge as acting secretary.

Connor, former drug company president, had served for two years. He said transfer of Commerce Dept. functions to the new Dept. of Transportation and the proposal to merge the Commerce and Labor Departments made this "a good time to make the change back to private business."

Johnson also advanced another assistant secretary, J. Herbert Hollomon, to the vacant post of under secretary.

In Philadelphia:

Transit Workers Win 51c Package

Philadelphia—A two-year contract carrying a 51-cent package of wages and benefits ended a one-day strike by 5,000 members of Transport Workers Local 234 hours before it would have tied up the Philadelphia Transportation Co. during rush-hour traffic.

The settlement, which must be ratified by the union members, calls for a 15 cents an hour pay boost effective immediately; another 15 cents on Jan. 15, 1968, and 12 cents on July 15, 1968.

Five cents an hour was allotted immediately to fringe benefits with an additional 4 cents effective next Jan. 15.

Most of the 9 cents will go for an increase in pensions from $125 to $175 a month effective next January, with commensurate raises for early retirees or those on pension because of disability.

Other benefits include an eighth holiday, Good Friday; full company payment of Blue Cross-Blue Shield premiums, with the company to pick up any further increases; a new proviso for five weeks vacation after 25 years, and considerably improved sick leave benefits.

In addition, the TWU said, group life insurance coverage was raised from $2,000 to $2,500; three days of paid leave were provided in case of a death in the immediate family, and the company agreed to join in establishing a credit union and to check off share purchases and loan repayments.

Severance pay was raised from $25 to $50 per year of service, the tool and clothing allowance was hiked by $7.50 to $50 a year, meal allowance restrictions were eased and cross-assignments for maintenance workers were prohibited.

Base Wage to Hit $3.38

The base wage of $2.96 an hour will rise to $3.38 when the third-step increase becomes effective.

TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan and Pres. Dominick Di Clerico of Local 234 predicted ratification. Di Clerico said the local executive board unanimously agreed to recommend acceptance of the agreement to the members. Guinan called it the best contract the local ever negotiated.

The strike started at 12.01 a.m. on Jan. 15. The settlement was reached at 3.27 a.m. on Jan. 16 and was announced by Mayor James H. J. Tate. It was worked out mainly by his labor advisor, S. Harry Galfand.

Before noon on Jan. 16 the company filed a request with the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission in Harrisburg for fare increases it estimated would yield about $3 million annually. It sought to eliminate tokens, which sell at the rate of 10 for $2.20; to curb the use of 5-cent transfers and to raise the school pupil fare from 8.5 to 10 cents, but did not ask for an increase in the basic fare of 25 cents.

Philadelphia's subway and elevated lines are owned by the city, which leases them to the PTC for $5.5 million a year. Tate said there was no concession in the rent to help the company meet the cost of the new contract, which the firm estimates at $6.5 million during its two-year lifetime.

However, he said, neither the city nor the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority, which is attempting to buy the company, will oppose the fare increase application.

Lyons Named To Panel on City Problems

Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers has been named by Pres. Johnson to a 15-member National Commission on Codes, Zoning, Taxation & Development Standards which will make a study in depth of the major problems affecting cities.

Former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) was named chairman. In appointing the group Johnson said the processes it will review "have not kept pace with the times," accused them of "stunting growth and opportunity" and described them as "the springboards from which many of the ills of urban life flow."

Johnson added that the commission will recommend solutions to urban problems, "particularly those ways in which the efforts of the federal government, private industry and local communities can be marshaled to increase the supply of low-cost, decent housing."

New Remedy Sought:

Court Upsets NLRB On 'Runaway' Cure

The power of the National Labor Relations Board to frame a new and effective remedy to prevent a hostile employer from getting rid of a union by "running away" to another state has been cast in doubt by a federal court decision.

The NLRB in a unanimous decision had found that the Garwin Co. (renamed S'Agaro) had hastily and without advance consultation with Local 57 of the Ladies' Garment Workers closed its New York swimwear plant and moved operations to Florida.

Backpay Ordered

The board also found that Garwin was motivated by anti-union hostility in making the move and ordered reinstatement of the former workers with backpay or compensation for losses until they had found other employment of comparable status.

It further ordered Garwin's successor company to bargain with the ILGWU, temporarily at least, without union proof that it represented a majority of the firm's new Florida employes. This was necessary, the board ruled, to counteract "continuing coercive effects" of the runaway company's unfair labor practices.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, in a split decision, denied enforcement of the latter part of the board's order, saying that its effect would be to deprive the company's new Florida employes of their freedom of choice to select their own bargaining agent or, if they so desired, to have no union bargaining agent whatsoever.

The court majority said, in an opinion by Judge Warren E. Burger, that the NLRB's order directing the employer to bargain with the ILGWU was "punitive" rather than "remedial" in nature and rejected the argument that it was necessary "to deter other employers from fleeing union relationships and thus to protect statutory rights of employes generally."

The court remanded the case to the board to allow it to frame some other remedy for the "aspect" of the case in which enforcement was denied.

In a vigorous dissent, Judge Carl McGowan pointed out that the NLRB is empowered by law to "take such affirmative action" in framing remedies regarding an employer's unfair labor practices "as will effectuate the policies" laid down by Congress in promoting peaceful and realistic labor-management bargaining relationships.

"The problem of the 'runaway' shop" has long been a troublesome one for the board, McGowan said, and in this particular case it "re-examined its policy" as expressed in framing previous remedies "and found it inadequate."

The NLRB did not go as far in its decision as the ILGWU asked, which would have resulted in a flat order to the company to return to New York, he noted. It framed a remedy designed to remove from the company the chance "to retain the fruits of its unfair labor practices at slight cost."

In striking a balance between the interests of the runaway company's former New York employes and its new Florida employes, the NLRB had used its "acquired expertise in applying broad policies . . . to the various situations that may arise," McGowan wrote. "It is the board, not the courts, which is authorized to make these judgments."

The NLRB said it had not yet decided whether to ask the Supreme Court to grant review of the appellate court's adverse decision. It had a 90-day period in which to reach a conclusion on this issue.

Supreme Court Action Leaves GE Bargaining Issues Unsettled

Issues arising from the General Electric Co.'s refusal to bargain with a multi-union committee in negotiations with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers are still open despite preliminary action on the case at the Supreme Court level.

The IUE filed unfair labor practice charges against GE, claiming it had an absolute right to select its negotiators for bargaining purposes, whether or not some were named from other unions.

The NLRB obtained a U.S. District Court injunction ordering the company to bargain with the multi-union group named by the IUE but this was reversed by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Supreme Court Justice John M. Harlan stayed execution of the appellate court decision pending labor board disposition of the refusal-to-bargain charge.

General Electric then entered negotiations with an enlarged IUE committee and agreement was reached Oct. 14 on a national contract, although numerous local issues and grievances remained to be settled on a plant-by-plant basis and some strikes followed.

GE urged the Supreme Court to dismiss the whole issue of the district court injunction and the appellate court's reversal, arguing that the signing of the national contract had made the case moot.

Both the NLRB and IUE argued strenuously that the case was not moot.

The union pointed to unsettled local issues at 50 GE plants and said it intended to continue the effort toward coordinated bargaining by placing representatives from other unions on IUE committees.

The national contract itself provides for third-level processing of grievances directly with GE, the union further pointed out, and here "the same duty is imposed on GE to meet and negotiate with IUE through whomsoever IUE wishes to name as its representatives."

The AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining, which coordinated activities for the IUE and other unions in 1966, remains in existence, an IUE memorandum pointed out.

The NLRB in a memorandum agreed that in view of the likelihood that the union would use negotiators from other unions and that GE might again refuse to bargain with such a group, "we cannot agree that the injunction is a dead letter or the case moot."

The case had lost the "urgency" motivating the board to seek the district court injunction and ask that the appellate court reversal be stayed, the NLRB said, but the issue still remains of what standards should guide district courts when such injunctions are sought in the future.

The Supreme Court in an unsigned opinion in effect set aside both the Court of Appeals decision and the District Court injunction, remanding to the District Court the question of whether the GE-IUE national contract made all issues moot.

An NLRB trial examiner has completed hearings on the IUE's refusal-to-bargain charge against GE and his report and recommendations will go to the board.

Meany Presses Fight For Radio-TV Fairness

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called on the labor movement for renewed efforts to secure fair treatment of unions by radio and television stations under the Federal Communications Commission's rules.

In a letter to all state and local central bodies, the AFL-CIO president declared that "continued flooding of the air waves with right-wing propaganda requires that the trade union movement increase its efforts to counter unfair telecasting and broadcasting."

He agreed that it is "very difficult" for a union to meet two of the five information requirements the FCC expects from a complainant under its "fairness" doctrine—"the basis for the claim that the station has presented only one side of the question, and whether the station has afforded, or has plans to afford, an opportunity for the presentation of contrasting viewpoints."

But "despite these difficulties," Meany advised the central bodies, the effort should be made to secure the opportunity for presentation of labor's views.

"If a television or radio station in your area carries a personal attack upon a union or union official, the organization or individual involved should demand time to reply," he wrote.

"If the station refuses, prompt complaint should be made to the FCC. This can be done simply by sending a letter setting out the details to the FCC. . . . In order that the AFL-CIO may be in a position to follow up, a copy of the letter should be sent to Albert Zack, director, Dept. of Public Relations, AFL-CIO."

He urged any central body in the area of "a station which is violating its 'fairness' obligation consistently and flagrantly" to supply Zack with all available details.

Zack will work with the central body, Meany added, to develop the information required to make out a case before the regulatory body.

Canada Pay Floor Takes Full Effect

Ottawa, Ont.—The $1.25 an hour minimum wage for workers under federal jurisdiction became fully effective Jan. 1.

Legislation setting it became effective July 1, 1965, but permitted the government to grant deferments for periods of up to 18 months. No further delays will be allowed.

The only exceptions to the $1.25 rate are employes under 17 years of age, for whom the minimum is $1, and some workers in training programs.

NEWEST Cabinet member is Alan S. Boyd, 44, who has taken office as secretary of the new Dept. of Transportation. The department consolidates 31 nonmartime transportation agencies.

12 Unions Win Key Gains At Canadian Shipyards

Vancouver, B.C.—British Columbia shipyard workers have won major wage and fringe benefit gains in a two-year contract negotiated by unions affiliated with the Metal Trades Council.

Twelve affiliated unions, bargaining jointly for some 3,000 workers at Vancouver and Victoria yards, reached agreement on a first year pay hike of 9 percent for non-journeymen and 30-cents-an-hour for journeymen, retroactive to last Oct. 15.

An across-the-board raise of 20 cents an hour for all workers is provided in the second year of the contract. The agreement, based on the unanimous recommendation of a tripartite Conciliation Board, covers employes of Burrard Drydock in Vancouver and two Victoria firms, Yarrows Ltd., and Victoria Machinery Depot.

Employer payments into the welfare plan are increased by one-third, from 10 cents for each man-hour worked to 15 cents.

Sec. J. E. Mead of the Vancouver Metal Trades Council said the contract also provides major improvements in vacations.

During the first year of the contract, workers will be entitled to three weeks of vacation after 8 years of service, instead of the present 10-year requirement.

In the second contract year, persons with five years of service will be entitled to three weeks of vacation and workers with 20 years' service will receive four weeks.

Overtime and holiday improvements are also made in the contract.

The agreement covers members of the Plumbers, Sheet Metal Workers, Painters, Asbestos Workers, Machinists, Boiler Makers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Pattern Makers, Carpenters, Laborers, Operating Engineers and Office Employes.

Canada to Assist Auto Pact Jobless

Ottawa, Ont.—Labour Minister John R. Nicholson has announced that all workers adversely affected by the United States-Canada auto treaty henceforth will be eligible for aid from the government's Transitional Assistance Benefit Plan (TAB).

Choice for the GOP

IN THE OPENING DAYS of the 90th Congress Republicans in the House have impaired the image that has been gaining acceptance since their strong showing in the November elections. The GOP was believed to be moving away from negative, conservative opposition to a policy of constructive, positive moderation.

On key rollcalls involving the House rules the overwhelming majority of the House Republicans forsook the "new look" of offering positive alternatives and united with their allies of three decades—the Southern Democrats—to scuttle a continuation of the rules adopted at the last Congress.

It is true that the House GOP is still to make its record on substantive legislation. But there is a very real impression that the conservative coalition has been put back together. Whether the coalition is on a formal or an informal basis is beside the point; the coalition is functioning and poses a distinct and present danger to the liberal and progressive programs.

THE SOUTHERN DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICAN coalition emerged in the late 1930s. It was built on an axis of opposition to civil rights and support of economic conservatism. It succeeded in frustrating programs aimed at dealing effectively with national problems in both areas.

In 1962 the coalition came a bit unstuck and in 1964 it was further weakened by the Johnson landslide which produced enough liberal votes to override the coalition on key issues.

The 1966 elections produced a new crop of Republican congressmen, most of them moderates who shied away in their campaigns from the tenets of the conservative coalition. Their behavior during the campaign and since the elections heightened expectations that the coalition would take a new tack or that its effectiveness as a nay-sayer would be weakened.

That possibility still exists as the hard issues of legislation move up for decision. But the tone of the opening days will have to be replaced with a positive sound of constructive Republicanism taking larger note of the core of Republican liberals as well as of the newly elected moderates.

THERE IS MUCH MORE involved in the 90th Congress than jockeying for political position for the 1968 presidential elections. There is a host of difficult problems requiring solutions; there are new challenges to be met. The Republicans have the opportunity to make a contribution to the nation's welfare and strength in terms of positive programs and adequate financing.

This opportunity cannot be seized, however, if an effective coalition continues to operate dedicated to obstructionism, to starving out programs by withholding funds, to emasculating legislation that is the product of decades of hard work.

Kaysen Report Hit:

National Data Center Proposal Raises Issue of Privacy Rights

SEVERAL MONTHS AGO a task force completed a 10-month study and submitted to the Bureau of the Budget its report on the Storage of and Access to Government Statistics.

This cumbersome, bureaucratic title has provoked a storm of controversy involving the very delicate problem of the right of the individual American to privacy.

The special task force, headed by Carl Kaysen of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton University, recommended the establishment of a National Data Center that would be part of a reorganized computerized statistical system. This would include all the myriad statistics available to the federal government including employment, social security, taxes, economic studies, etc.

The Kaysen report is only the latest of a number in recent years calling for the establishment of an extensive program to centralize information collection. As did the earlier reports, the Kaysen recommendation has produced deep concern among constitutional lawyers, trade unionists, civil libertarians and many members of Congress.

They point to the extremely high level of sophistication that computers and technology have achieved. Without adequate standards and safeguards, freedom and privacy of the individual are rapidly disappearing.

Reacting sharply to the Kaysen report was Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher (D-N.J.), chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Invasion of Privacy of the House Operations Committee.

Gallagher has written a lengthy letter to Charles L. Schultz, director of the Bureau of the Budget, explaining point by point why he has come to the conclusion that a centralized data system is not only impractical but also a marked threat to the individual citizen.

On the latter point he notes that the Kaysen report recommends a director of the federal statistical system who would be charged with "monitoring compliance" with disclosure rules.

Gallagher asks:

"Do you know of any one person in whom you would invest such power?"

The Kaysen committee is extremely sensitive to the question of invasion of privacy and says that a statistical data bank need not evolve into an intelligence type center.

The report says it "is not the purpose of the proposed center at all" to build a "vast file of individual 'dossiers'."

Gallagher says that in reading the transcript of hearings before his committee he determined that "such a conversion would be possible." He cited such expert witnesses in computer science as Paul Baran of the Rand Corp. and Burton E. Squires of the University of Illinois Dept. of Computer Science.

"While expressing concern for privacy," Gallagher wrote, "the task force offers no real solutions. Merely stating that rules, laws, individual judgment and congressional - executive action should be exerted to safeguard privacy does not provide the solution."

The congressman notes, further, that "the task force apparently is unaware of the danger that, as modern technology advances, unauthorized information might pop out of a computer."

HE SHARES with the Federal Communications Commission concern over the threat of centralized computer activities. The FCC, for example, recently pointed out:

"The modern application of computer technology has brought about a trend toward concentrating commercial and personal data at computer centers. This concentration, resulting in the ready availability in one place of detailed personal and business data, raises serious problems of how this information can be kept from unauthorized persons or unauthorized use."

Gallagher notes that informational experts indicate that decentralization, rather than centralizations might be more desirable in the future.

According to these experts it might be more advantageous to build a decentralized computer system to solve the growing information-gathering crisis. Under such a system the data could remain with the various agencies and would be fed into a central computer for statistical analysis.

The Kaysen committee acknowledges that under a centralized approach there is a tendency for duplication and waste. Each agency would keep its own computerized operation and it would be duplicated in the central setup.

The primary issue, however, is the right to privacy of the individual. A national data center could become a major threat to this right. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

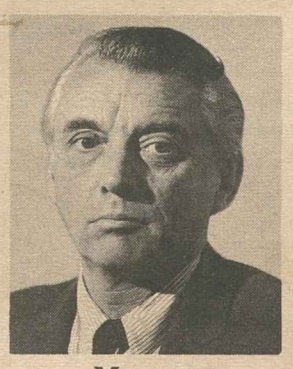
Negro Government May Make Bahamas a Healthier Paradise

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

MINUTES FROM Miami by jet, a political revolution is taking place in an archipelago floating in the Gulf Stream called the Bahamas and it's about time.

The islands, whose population is 85 percent black, have the first Negro government in their 300-year history.



Morgan

The picture - postcard travel ads and the operation of gambling casinos, despite overtones of the underworld in the latter, now lure 135 million tourist dollars, mostly American, a year. Tourism accounts for 90 percent of the islands' income. In 1966 some 800,000 vacationers, seven times the total resident population, swarmed over Bahama beaches and, notably, through three separate gambling establishments on Grand Bahama Island, a gigantic sandpile a decade ago and now a booming resort for beautiful people.

Everybody has been having such a lovely time, living up the life the color posters promised, that nobody noticed much that things are not so beautiful for the "natives."

But now those natives, descendants of slaves, most of them, have revolted in an orderly way. In the first parliamentary elections since Britain granted the Bahamas qualified independence in 1964, the Negro-dominated PLP — Progressive Liberal Party—more than quadrupled its seats in the assembly, from four to 18.

This brought it even with the United Bahamian Party, controlled by a group of white merchants and financiers known as the Bay Street Boys, after the main street of Nassau, the capital. But a Laborite member, Randol Fawkes, promised his vote to the PLP and so Lynden O. Pindling, leader of that party, was installed as prime minister.

He set out to avoid panic among the tourists or investors by saying the Bahamas wanted them both. It cannot, in fact, do without either.

But a change in internal economic policy is virtually a foregone conclusion. The Bay Street Boys never had it so good as they did before the election and, presumably, they will never have it so good again. They never knew the meaning of conflict of interest because they ran the government and they ran business—so how could they lose on the late Charlie Wilson's old General Motors motto that what's good for Bay Street is good enough for everybody? The joker was that the goodies went to Bay Street and not everybody.

According to dispatches published in the Wall Street Journal last October, corporate records show that the then most powerful member of the government, Sir Stafford Sands, minister of finance and tourism, received $1 million in fees from a company controlled by Wallace Groves, a former Wall Street operator who once served a prison term for mail fraud. Groves has since spectacularly rehabilitated himself by making a fortune exploiting Grand Bahama Island under what amounts to virtually an exclusive and tax-free contract with the government.

The non-conflict of interest system is gorgeously illustrated by the fact that the then minister of finance represented Groves in seeking a gambling license at the very time the minister was a member of the Executive Council which granted the license.

All this and much more were revealed in the Wall Street Journal series. The average Bahamaian does not take the Wall Street Journal and the carefully cultured information media of the archipelago would hardly be inclined to circulate reprints of the articles.

But the exposé exploded a political bombshell on the assembly floor. BBC Washington Correspondent Charles Wheeler, who has just returned from Nassau, credits the Journal series with precipitating a bloodless revolution. At least the pressure of public protest stemming from the dispatches forced the election much earlier than had been planned.

BUT A REVOLT was bound to come sooner or later. Nine years ago, after a visit to Nassau in the wake of a general strike, this correspondent discovered some of the pressures inflicted on the local population.

After the strike some "reform" legislation was passed. It was liberal by Bay Street standards but Randol Fawkes, head of the Bahamas Federation of Labor and a member of the Assembly select committee which handled the bill, was not even allowed to read the committee report and federation witnesses were not given the right to testify at hearings on it.

In a staggering coincidence of timing, as the bill, with built-in safeguards for employers, was moving through the assembly, Fawkes was prosecuted for trespassing at a labor rally, later charged with "seditious utterances." This is the same Randol Fawkes who—guess why—has chosen to give Lynden Pindling's government its one-vote majority.

The Progressive Liberal Party has been described as radical. By Bay Street standards it is. It wants a better economic break for average Bahamians and a purge of gangster elements allegedly involved in gambling concessions.

This is a big order. The all-black Pindling cabinet is new. It may trip. Whatever it does, things on Bay Street won't be the same again. Who knows? The Bahamas may be a healthier paradise if they aren't.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IT WAS A ROUGH two opening weeks in the 90th Congress for both House and Senate liberals and, in the House, for the Democratic leadership as well.

The House Democratic Caucus voted to strip Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.) of his chairmanship of the Education & Labor Committee although lesser steps were urged by the leaders. The full House then voted, again against the wishes of the Democratic leaders, to force Powell to stand aside, pending a five-week committee investigation and report, on taking the oath of office.

A motion by Democratic Floor Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) that the House adopt as its rules the same rules it had operated under in the 89th Congress was roundly beaten, 225 to 196, and Republicans and southern Democrats then combined to repeal specifically the 21-day rule allowing a committee-approved bill to be sent to the floor without Rules Committee action if that unit balked at its clearance.

Democrats strengthened liberal control of the Rules Committee to a 9-6 margin and won from Chairman William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) agreement on regular meeting times. They voted in caucus to name the liberal Rep. Jacob L. Gilbert (N. Y.) to a single vacancy on the powerful tax-writing Ways & Means Committee—but only by a barebones 115-113 margin over the conservative Rep. Omar Burleson (Tex.).

Liberal Senate forces were fragmented when they attempted to force a simple majority vote on changing the filibuster rules and the proposal came under fierce attack by both Democratic Floor Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

Dirksen last year was able to filibuster to death, cooperating with the southern Democrats, both repeal of Section 14(b) and the Johnson Administration's proposed civil rights act. Under the rule requiring a two-thirds vote to invoke cloture and shut off a filibuster, the prolonged debate simply droned on until the issues were dropped.

Democratic liberals could get the votes of only 29 of their 64 party members to force a quick rules-change showdown and only eight of the 36 Republicans joined them.

THE ELECTION returns last Nov. 8 made it clear that the Administration would face strong resistance on some issues, but a succession of quick leadership or liberal defeats on strictly organizational matters was not to be expected.

Republicans are voting in both House and Senate about the way they voted in the past. A revived GOP-southern Democratic coalition may make the Republican floor leader, Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), the de facto commander of a majority on many issues and on appropriations.

Dirksen established again that without his consent the 25-odd Republican senators needed under the two-thirds cloture rule to break any filibuster are simply not obtainable. This, too, means de facto control of action at least on some issues. [Both 14(b) repeal and the civil rights bill were passed by the House in the 89th Congress.]

Pres. Johnson's Budget and Economic messages will contain, if precedents are followed, information on specific legislative proposals, the rate of economic growth considered obtainable and the amount of money urged to support new programs that in some cases have barely gotten off the ground or haven't gotten off the ground at all.

There were times during the last six years when both Mr. Johnson and, before him, the late Pres. Kennedy, were able to make effective efforts to get substantial support for Administration proposals from southern Democrats, even though in the past they had opposed similar proposals. It looks as if the President may need to follow up along these lines in the two years ahead—unless the Republicans begin to display their touted moderation.

Widening 'Safety Gap' Charged As Railroad Accidents Climb

NEW GOVERNMENT statistics show a widening safety gap on the nation's railroads, the president of an AFL-CIO union declared in a network radio interview.

Train accidents during the first quarter of 1966 soared 32 percent over the same period of 1964, said Pres. H. E. Gilbert Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen on Labor News Conference.

"If all accidents were really reported," Gilbert charged, "this figure would be increased immeasurably."

He based his statements on a recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, he said is compiled from accident information supplied to the ICC "by the railroads."

Gilbert said that a major cause of the rising accident rate is removal of some 20,000 firemen from diesel locomotives as a result of the compulsory arbitration of train crew sizes ordered by Congress in 1963. He said the union had warned that removing firemen from the engines "would inevitably increase the number of accidents and cause the deterioration of safety," and the ICC report "proves that we were right."

It's "a shame that we have to lose men and lose lives to prove our point," he declared.

GILBERT SAID the union has appealed to Alan S. Boyd, head of the new Dept. of Transportation, to take steps to assure that the full facts are made known to "all concerned," and to recommend "what ought to be done to stop" the rising accident rate.

"The facts developed in any kind of investigation," he predicted, would show the need to return firemen to all locomotive cabs.

Reporters questioning Gilbert on Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual radio network, were Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Tight Money, Reluctant Lenders Hamper College Loan Programs

By Sidney Margolius

MODERATE INCOME college students seeking loans under the guarantee program of the Higher Education Act of 1965 are having noticeable difficulty. Of 16 state agencies which provided definite estimates of the availability of the new loans, 11 reported problems, attributed mainly to the "tight money" situation.

Lenders are not permitted to charge more than 6 percent for such loans. In return the states, with the aid of the federal government, guarantee the lenders against loss.

But in a time of high interest and heavy demand for loans, banks can get more than 6 percent on business loans, and true rates of 10 to 14 percent on personal loans, and they will be paid back faster than the 10 years permitted for the college loans.

The new program had been hailed as a help to middle income and moderate income families. It does not replace but is in addition to National Defense Education Act loans administered by colleges themselves with funds provided largely by the federal government.

The difficulties have become known as many colleges announced new increases in fees on top of the steady rises of the past decade. Costs at most private colleges now are $3,000 to $3,500 a year, including all costs and incidentals, with some close to the $4,000 mark. At state universities, costs have risen to $1,500 to $2,000.

Of the states supplying estimates only Delaware, Hawaii, New Hampshire, Oklahoma and Texas reported no noticeable problems.

In other states:

Alabama reports the banking industry "not enthusiastic."

Connecticut advises that some lenders are limiting their participation, and others are not joining at all. But the bankers association, Savings & Loan League and credit unions are backing the program, and the state higher-education agency reports that it knows of no student being unable to find a lender.

Iowa reports "reluctance and delay", but the state bankers association is trying to encourage bank participation.

Maryland's Higher Education Loan corp. reports that "a number of banks have withdrawn . . . we have had to help a number of students to locate a lender."

Massachusetts' Higher Education Assistance Corporation reports it is "swamped with applications . . . and processing about 2.5 times more loans this year than in 1965." The agency believes that the interest rate and the time allowed for repayment "need reviewing."

The Michigan Dept. of Education reports that "many students are unable to take advantage of the loan program" and are "encountering real difficulty in finding a lender willing to make loans."

New Jersey reports that bank policies vary, with some restricting the loans to families which have accounts or live in the area. Currently 132 banks are participating but 122 are not, including 32 which previously had participated.

North Carolina reports that tight money is hampering the program but loans still are being made, with insurance companies also making funds available.

Ohio reports that some colleges are trying to switch students over to the guarantee loans because of college limitations on Defense Act loans.

The Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency reports that "lending institutions have indicated they are neither able nor willing to invest additional funds at the low interest rate and liberal repayment terms." Many lenders have placed quotas on the number of loans.

Wyoming reports difficulties placing the guaranteed loans, with about half the banks "making sacrificial efforts to handle applications from students whose families customarily bank with them."

ANOTHER problem confronts evening students, whose financial needs often have been overlooked by Congress in providing college assistance, reports Dean Ernest E. McMahon of Rutgers University Extension Division, president of the Association of University Evening Colleges.

These students often come from low-income families and often themselves have families to support while they try to equip themselves for better jobs, he points out.

Evening students are eligible for the guaranteed loans only if they carry at least half a normal workload, and can get NDEA loans of only up to $500 a year.

If you can't find a local lender willing to provide a guaranteed loan, ask your state education department or education assistance agency to help you locate one. Your school counselor can give you the name of the state agency.

FTC Chief Issues Call:

Consumers Rallied To Fight Fake Ads

The following appeared as a guest editorial by Chairman Paul Rand Dixon of the Federal Trade Commission in a recent issue of The Viewer, published by the National Audience Board, Inc.

THE FIGHT against false and misleading advertising over the airwaves is one the government cannot hope to win without support from consumers willing to take the trouble to help in their own defense.

The same kind of support is needed from reputable advertisers who suffer by unfair competition from the tricky advertising of others. Too often the honest advertiser would rather endure the cheats than take the time and effort needed to expose them. It is easier to shrug away the problem with the comforting thought that reputability wins in the long run.

The Federal Trade Commission, with responsibility for halting "unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce," is making an effort, unprecedented in degree, to educate both consumers and businessmen on how best to team their efforts with those of the FTC in curbing spurious advertising that not only bilks consumers but devalues the advertising dollar so needed to keep our economy going at full speed.

While the FTC's continuous monitoring program of all broadcast stations serves the valuable purpose of examining all advertising for a type of product, or type of claim, in order to assess and isolate problems and select the best means of coping with them, a vast amount of advertising is for products and services not sold in interstate commerce and hence not within FTC's jurisdiction.

Here is the area where teamwork is needed for protection of the consumer. Here is the area where consumers and reputable advertisers can do a great deal to protect themselves. And the first thing they can do is to protest with vigor to the news and broadcast media which have carried false advertising.

Few if any would be the broadcasters who would continue to advertise products or services when subjected to complaints from listeners who have been victimized by misrepresentations in the commercials. Advertising may be the bread and butter of the media, but they have no appetite for any which would bilk their listeners.

To give facts on how an unscrupulous advertiser is failing to live up to the claims he makes for what he sells will strengthen the broadcaster's hand in dealing with him. Particularly will the broadcaster listen to fact-supported complaints from reputable competitors of the false advertiser.

THE TRUTH of the matter is that advertising media can not be expected to make thorough investigations of every advertising claim they print or broadcast.

They can and generally do reject those that are obviously phony, but some cannot be quickly detected. In these cases, if the victims—be they customers or reputable competitors of the seller—report the facts to the media, a great amount of false advertising will never reach the eyes or the ears of the intended victims.

With the willingness, even the determination, of most media to screen out false or misleading advertising, enough manages to get through to provide private organizations like the Better Business Bureaus, as well as city and state law enforcement agencies, with more than enough to do. The same holds true for FTC's responsibilities in interstate commerce.

Yet, thanks to the growing awareness of consumers and reputable businessmen, acting individually and through organizations devoted to encouraging proper business conduct, plus more alert media, plus an ever more effective FTC, the hucksters may soon find it simpler and safer to stay within the law.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Wonderful World of Cookbooks Flabbergasts Us With Recipes

By Jane Goodsell

LIKE DEATH and taxes, the problem of what to have for dinner is always with us. Heads may roll, love may bloom and basements may flood, but people still have to eat. The problem is what? To the average, harrassed housewife, it often seems that she has already fed her loved ones everything there is to eat. Finding myself in this desperate state of mind a few weeks ago, I sent away for a catalog titled The Wonderful World of Cookbooks.

It's a world of which I was only dimly aware, and now I find myself wondering where I've been lately. While I wasn't looking, there have been some curious developments in the field of culinary literature.

For one thing, there is so much of it. Cookbooks have been rolling off the presses at such a furious rate that it's hard to see how there can be enough recipes to go around. But cookbook writers are an inventive and imaginative lot, capable of thinking up endless variations.

Geography is only one approach. There are dozens of other angles. For example: what's cooking? There are cookbooks that pivot on where the food is cooked (in a small kitchen, a boat, at high altitudes) while others focus on when (the cool of the day, at midnight, the 12 days of Christmas) and still others center on where the food will end up (lunchbox, buffet, freezer, picnic hamper).

THEN AGAIN, a cookbook may have as its theme the use of a particular utensil: chafing dish, electric blender, electric skillet, casserole).

There are cookbooks that offer something more than recipes: inspirational verse, historical anecdotes, jolly poems, ribald limericks. There is a zodiac cookbook for those who want to cook by the stars.

Cookbookland is a wonderful world, all right. As Keats said On First Looking into Chapman's Homer, "Then felt I like some watcher of the skies when a new planet swims into his ken. . . ." Well that's just how I feel after thumbing through The Wonderful World of Cookbooks.

Flabbergasted.

Arms Of The State:

Soviet Unions Push Production, Not Worker Rights or Benefits

Upon the invitation of the Soviet Ministry of Iron and Steel, the steel committee of the United Nations Commission for Europe recently sent a mission to the USSR. Americans were part of the 12-nation group constituting this mission.

Reproduced below are portions of the section of the mission's report dealing with the labor situation in the Russiain steel industry. The author of this section, Meyer Bernstein, international affairs director of the Steelworkers, participated in this mission as a technical adviser to the American delegation and not as a union member or exchange delegation visitor.

By Meyer Bernstein

Obtaining information on labor conditions in the Soviet Union proved to be considerably more difficult than obtaining information on the technology of making steel. This was apparently due at least partially to their not expecting our group to be interested in this subject. Accordingly, arrangements had not been made in advance for us to discuss labor problems with the top people concerned with labor relations at the ministry in Moscow. This impeded our efforts to learn as much as we would have liked.

These factors, together with problems in translation and differences in the semantics of the free enterprise and the Communist approaches to labor relations, made it difficult for us to obtain a comprehensive understanding of the real status of the rank-and-file employe in the Soviet Union.

At the first plant we visited (Zaporozhstal) there were no union representatives in the reception group. In view of the interest expressed by some members of our group, our hosts made arrangements to have union representatives participate in subsequent plant tours. Even then, most questions relating to the labor aspects of steelmaking were answered by management personnel, and we did not feel at any time that we were actually communicating directly with the people who represented the rank-and-file worker in the sense that unions represent such workers in the United States.

The lowest wage we were able to ascertain was 50 to 60 rubles ($55 to $66) a month, the highest 350-400 rubles ($385-$440) a month. This generally includes most of the incentives and bonuses.

Wages

Wages are paid as a monthly salary, and for most workers are divided roughly in two parts—the standard monthly salary and the sum of various bonuses, incentives, premiums and rewards.

The head of the Economics Dept. of the Central Scientific Research Institute for the Iron & Steel Industry stated that the average wage for the entire steel industry, including all bonuses except a special annual bonus equal to two weeks pay, amounts to 150 rubles ($165) a month, of which some 120 rubles (80 percent) represents base pay and 30 rubles (20 percent) the various bonuses. He said that the range for bonuses is from a low of 10 percent to a high of 50 percent of the basic monthly salary.

He also explained that the average for highly skilled workers is a total of 250 rubles ($275) a month of which total bonuses average some 45 percent. In other words he said the bonuses of the higher skilled workers are larger both in absolute and percentage terms than the bonuses on the unskilled jobs.

As explained by the deputy minister of the Iron & Steel Ministry, wages are fixed by the ministry. Actually the Labor & Wages Dept. of the ministry proposes a scale which must then be approved by the Council of Ministers.

As is the practice in most European countries there is a host of benefits.

In the USSR, housing is probably the most important. Most of the workers we talked to said that they pay between 7 and 15 rubles ($7.70 to $16.50) per month for an apartment, depending upon the size. A typical answer for a young married couple with no children was that they have something that would compare with our efficiency, that is a one-room apartment plus bathroom and kitchen, for which they would pay 7 rubles ($7.70) a month. A three-room apartment plus bathroom and kitchen, inhabited by a family of six, including retired parents of workers, costs 15 rubles per month ($16.50).

We were not taken to see the interior of any worker's home. The apartment buildings were generally large block housing, and constructed in considerable measure from prefabricated material. From the outside the workmanship appeared to be poor. We observed similar poor workmanship on the interior of the hotels and enterprise buildings. Loose door hinges, wobbling door handles, loose fitting windows, rusting bath water, missing sink stoppers, poor electric lighting, badly placed switches, all of this and much more were typical of the buildings we entered.

Labor Unions

There is a single metal workers' union for the whole metal working industry in the USSR. Steel, therefore, has no separate representation. Each plant has a local. In structure, plant representation resembles more closely a works council of a European country than a local union or branch union of the United States or Great Britain. In function it resembles neither.

Local union, or more accurately, works council officials are named by a two-stage process. First, elections take place in the various shops in November, and then the delegates so elected constitute a kind of electoral college, which selects the plant committee in the following January.

Plant committeemen are released from their duties as workers and become full time union officials for the one year term. The salary is paid by the union.

Union dues are fixed at 1 percent of salary except in the case of workers earning less than 100 rubles ($110) a month. They pay one-half of 1 percent. The federation constitution gives a somewhat different dues schedules. According to that document the 1 percent applies to 70 rubles ($77) or more, 40 kopecks (44 cents) for earnings from 51-60 rubles ($56-$66), and 50 kopecks (55 cents) for earnings from 61-70 rubles ($67-$77).

We were told that practically all workers right up to and including foremen, superintendents, and the plant manager belong to the union. We asked the union officials what they considered their prime responsibility, their duties, their functions to be. The answer we received was first production, secondly socialist emulation, and third safety.

The union has little to do with wages. The union does not negotiate wages, but only details and times of wage payment. All of the union officials we met were ill-informed on wage matters. Nevertheless, the union is in charge of "socialist emulation," that is the competition between plants or departments. The competition is on the basis of production records.

The rewards are substantial and in cash. If, therefore, a local union or works council succeeds in spurring its membership on to new production records and to win first place in this "socialist emulation," the workers will of course directly gain from this success. Otherwise the union is not involved in matters which in a democratic country are the main concern of a labor union. We were told that the union was responsible for the display of most of the inspirational messages seen throughout the plant.

The union men we talked to gave us the impression of being subordinate to enterprise and ministry officials.

Collective Bargaining Agreement

There are five main characteristics of collective bargaining in the steel industry of the USSR: 1) The overwhelming all-pervading purpose is fulfillment and over-fulfillment of the production plan; 2) There are more union and worker obligations than rights or benefits; 3) With a few relatively insignificant exceptions, wages, hours, and working conditions are outside the scope of collective bargaining; 4) There is no reference to grievances or any procedure for their adjustment; 5) The union has no power other than that of persuasion. It must rely entirely upon the good will and generosity of management.

Aside from a few signs exhorting the workers to perform their job safely we saw very little evidence of any safety program. And even less of protective clothing except in the continuous casting department.

Hard hats were not in evidence. They weren't given to visitors except in one plant. Workers in the blast furnace department during casting were apparently no differently dressed than workers in the rolling mill pulpit. We saw no air-conditioned cranes. We saw few safety markings. Broken windows were not repaired. There was no hesitation of cranes carrying loads over the heads of workmen.

Cost of Living

We asked some workers about their earnings and their living costs. A typical answer was as follows: A high pressure pump operator earns an average of 135 rubles ($148) a month. His wife working in the same steel plant as a clerk earns 90 rubles ($99) a month. The total income therefore is 225 rubles ($247.50). Of this they pay 7 rubles ($7.70) for their one-room apartment and 120 rubles ($132) for food.

Asked what expenditures they had made for clothing during the past few months we were told that the husband had bought a suit of clothing for 120 rubles ($132) and a pair of shoes for 26 rubles ($28.60). The wife had purchased a fur coat (the interpreter never did get the kind) for 160 rubles ($176) and a TV set had cost 300 rubles ($330).

We priced various articles at the Gum and Zum stores in Moscow and at the Gastronomes and the like.

FIFTY SEAMEN have started the process of upgrading themselves to third mate's status under the Masters, Mates & Pilots Maritime Advancement, Training, Education & Safety (MATES) program. Classes are held aboard the Texas Clipper, training ship of the Texas Maritime Academy at Galveston. Shown above working with a candidate is Academy Supt. Bennett M. Dodson.

Mates Training Plan To Upgrade Seamen

Galveston, Tex.—Fifty unlicensed seamen from the Navy, Coast Guard and merchant marine have started shipboard training that will turn them into merchant fleet deck officers after 90 days' intensive schooling.

They constitute the first class of the Maritime Advancement, Training, Education & Safety (MATES) program of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, a joint union-industry project aimed at turning out about 200 third mates by June to meet the manpower requirements of the Viet Nam war.

Opening Ceremony

The program was inaugurated at a public ceremony on the campus of the Texas Maritime Academy here attended by national, state and local officials.

The program has contracted for the faculty, facilities and training ship—the Texas Clipper—of the maritime academy, the country's newest school of its kind.

The candidates are housed aboard the training vessel and are attending classes in it—partly because of the ship-board atmosphere which approximates that under which they will serve when licensed.

Applicants must have had at least two years watch-standing time at sea in a deck department rating, and must pass Coast Guard physical requirements for licensing as third mate.

There is no charge for tuition. The successful applicants receive $300 subsistence allowance the first month, $400 the second and $500 the third so they will be able to apply themselves without worrying about the welfare of their families. The student must pay only for his textbooks, about $50, and a khaki "uniform," both of which he will be able to use after completing training.

His staterooms are maintained, his meals are first-class and served by waiters, and membership in a nearby YMCA is provided free of charge. Tutors are available for after-class help.

Sponsoring the MATES program with the MMP are Atlantic and Gulf ship operating companies under contract with the union. Employer payments of $1,000 per ship per year help finance the plan.

Executive director of the program is Capt. Frank M. McCabe, a 1935 graduate of the Coast Guard Academy whose last assignment before retirement in 1965 was as captain of the Port of Philadelphia.

Overseeing the program is a joint board of trustees on which the union is represented by Intl. Sec. Treas. T. F. O'Callaghan, and Captains Joseph B. Gaier and Robert L. Jones, both presidents of MMP locals.

Zeev Barash Named Histadrut Aide in U.S.

Zeev Barash, general secretary of Israel's Public Service Union, has been appointed American representative of Histadrut, the Israel labor federation.

Born in the Ukraine in 1913, Barash was educated in the United States, attending the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1933 went to Palestine to join a kibbutz. He has been active in the labor movement since 1936 and as one of its top leaders, he has served in many administrative capacities.

Taxi Drivers In Detroit Win 5-Year Battle

Detroit, Mich. — The Checker Cab Co. has bowed to the U.S. Supreme Court and after a five-year fight has agreed to bargain with Seafarers Local 10 in behalf of its 1,800 employes.

The company is an ownership association with 286 members who own from one to 18 cabs for a total of 887, the city's largest fleet.

The high court decision upheld the National Labor Relations Board certification of Local 10 as bargaining agent for the Checker workers following the third of three elections won by the union.

The firm had appealed on the ground that the NLRB order would force some of its members to bargain with the employes of other members. The basic issue was whether an association is an employer under federal labor law.

"We'll comply with the law," said Alfred Diaz, Checker president, following the Supreme Court's refusal to review an appeals court decision upholding the NLRB.

The union drive at the unorganized firm dates back to 1961. More that 1,200 drivers joined in the petition to the NLRB for the original election on May 8, 1962.

Local 10 is a unit of the Transportation Services & Allied Workers, an SIU district. The district has contracts covering more than 8,000 cab company employes in Chicago, St. Louis and San Diego, Calif.

House Rollcall Votes on Rules Change

The Administration suffered an opening day setback in Congress when the House first refused to adopt the rules of the previous Congress and then abolished the 21-day rule adopted two years ago to prevent the Rules Committee from blocking important bills.

Column I shows the 225-196 vote which prevented adoption of the previous rules. On labor's scoreboard 181 Republicans and 44 Democrats cast wrong votes (W), while 194 Democrats and 2 Republicans voted right (R).

Column II is the 233-185 vote to kill the 21-day rule. On this 157 Republicans and 76 Democrats voted wrong (W), and 159 Democrats and 26 Republicans voted right (R). Absentees are indicated by "A"; numerals show districts; AL—at large.

By Automation Foundation:

Clearing House Set For Job Training Aid

New York—A center for the distribution of information and help on job training and development programs is being set up here under the sponsorship of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment.

The foundation is a joint union-management operation of which Pres. P. L. (Roy) Siemiller of the Machinists and Frank Gallucci, vice president of the Essex Wire Co., are vice chairmen.

The center will include a library with up-to-date material on technology and automation and their effects on workers, industry, the community and the nation, and will provide space for companies to display and demonstrate training equipment.

The program also includes the organization of a council that will act as a clearing house for the exchange of information on job-training programs by organized labor, industry and the government.

Theodore W. Kheel, nationally-known labor mediator and executive secretary of the foundation, described the center as the first effort to coordinate in one place the information on job training labor and management have developed through studies and experience, to provide for dissemination of such information and to stimulate further developments.

Better training programs to upgrade the unskilled are a major weapon in the war on poverty, Kheel said. He stressed, in addition, their importance in preparing members of minority groups to take their places in industry, in meeting the growing demand for skilled workers and in boosting production.

"Today a man with a skill is in command of his destiny," he said. "A man without a skill is a beggar."

The center will do no direct teaching or training, but the foundation already has moved in that direction.

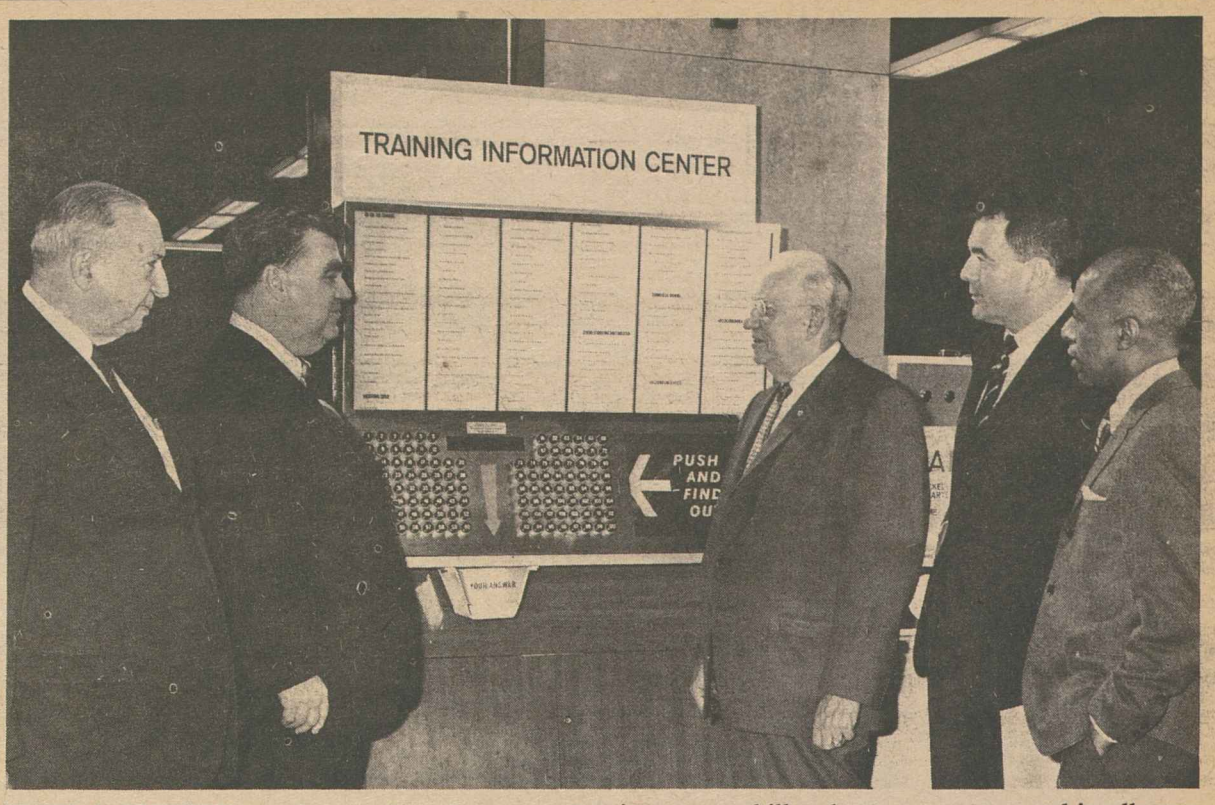
The New York City Institute of the foundation and the U.S. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training recently signed a contract under which the latter is establishing a program to train 5,000 employed workers for higher-skill jobs in the same shops.

Federal funds totaling $592,882 have been earmarked for the project, the first phase of which will be the training of 2,500 workers for unfilled jobs such as machinist, tool and die maker, die setter, screw and automatic machine operators, welders, electronic and mechanical electricians, electronic wiremen, truck and trailer-truck drivers, and building service workers.

As the workers undergoing the training move up to better jobs, it was pointed out, their old positions will be taken by unemployed workers with lesser skills.

Unions participating in the program include IAM District 15, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 3, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and Building Service Employes Local 32-B.

Some 275 instructors will provide the training in shops under contract with the participating unions.



PUSH A BUTTON on this machine if you want to improve a skill or learn a new one, and it tells you where to go, who to see and what to take with you in order to get basic training and educational information. It was placed in a New York Post Office lobby by the New York City Institute of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, whose co-chairman, Hugh Sheridan, is at left. Others from left are James J. McFadden, institute executive director; Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Stage Employes; Theodore W. Kheel, labor mediator and secretary-treasurer of the institute, and Dean James Dumpson of the Fordham University School of Social Work.

Federal Workers Set Legislative Program

Representatives of more than a million organized federal workers agreed on a legislative program for the 90th Congress emphasizing "full comparability" with salaries in private industry and new machinery to make collective bargaining more effective in the civil service.

The program was adopted by the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, made up of 33 unions with members employed by the federal government.

GEC Chairman E. C. Hallbeck termed adoption of the council's program "essential" if the federal government is to be regarded as "an enlightened and progressive employer."

In addition to pay and labor-management legislation, the council called on Congress to improve the government's retirement program, raise its contributions to the life and health insurance programs, boost the daily travel allowance and revise the Hatch Act "to permit employes to exercise greater political responsibility."

"Substantial improvements" in the government's labor - management relations program are needed, the GEC said in a statement marking the fifth anniversary of Pres. Kennedy's executive order on union recognition.

The 1962 order, the council said, was a "milestone" in establishing the right of government workers to be represented by a union. It helped bring hundreds of thousands of new members into government employe unions and led to the negotiation of written contracts with virtually every federal agency.

The five-year experience has also, the GEC stressed, revealed deficiencies" in the program that need to be corrected.

"High on the list of union complaints is the absence of machinery to resolve bargaining deadlocks between unions and agency officials," the statement said.

It also pointed to restrictions on the subject matter of bargaining and the lack of binding arbitration of grievances.

Legislation introduced in Congress would provide a labor-management relations panel named by the President to decide negotiation deadlocks, set up a tripartite arbitration board for grievances, and shift prime responsibility for the government's labor - management program from the Civil Service Commission to the Labor Dept.

4 More Unions Win Pay Pacts With Railroads

percent pay proposal, and of two unaffiliated rail unions, the Conductors & Brakemen and the Locomotive Engineers.

Heads of the four "non-operating" unions involved in the latest settlement termed it "the best agreement we have signed in the railroad industry in recent years" and "the best that could be negotiated" at the present time.

They expressed satisfaction that it was achieved through direct union-management negotiations, something of a rarity in recent railroad wage disputes.

Ship Unions' Upgrading Program Helps Meet Shortage of Engineers

New York—A joint union license training program initiated by the Seafarers Atlantic & Gulf District and the Marine Engineers District II has developed in its first year into one of the main sources of newly licensed engineers to meet the demand created by the war in Viet Nam, an "Achievement Report" shows.

The year-end report disclosed that 113 unlicensed SIU members, after attending classes at the School of Marine Engineering jointly operated by the two unions, qualified for original licenses as marine engineers.

At the same time 75 members of the MEBA upgraded their licenses after study at the union-run school.

Maritime Administration records, the unions said, showed that 111 marine engineers were graduated from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy during the same year, and a total of 204 graduated from academies or colleges operated by the states of Maine, New York, California, Massachusetts and Texas.

The 16-page achievement report carries photos of practically all of the union members who completed courses at the school and was distributed as a supplement to the regular publications of MEBA District II and the SIU. SIU Pres. Paul Hall and MEBA District II Pres. Raymond T. McKay wrote introductions.

Hall, pointing out that the school serves the interests of the nation, the union and the members, said:

"From the standpoint of the Seafarers themselves, the manner in which they have upgraded themselves is a convincing demonstration that the foc'sle is still a major source of potential licensed officers."

McKay said:

"Because of the success of our joint training and upgrading program—and our ability to provide opportunities for the graduates of the maritime academies — our contracted ships have been able to sail throughout the year without delays, and the union has met its contractual obligations."

Both unions provide weekly cash payments to their members while they attend the school, as well as tuition, subsistence and other benefits. A reciprocal pension arrangement in the bi-union agreement setting up the school removed one of the major objections of unlicensed personnel to upgrading themselves, the report said.

Morgan to Judge Hillman Awards

New York—Edward P. Morgan, whose news broadcasts over the ABC network are sponsored by the AFL-CIO, has been named a judge of the Sidney Hillman Foundation prize awards, Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, foundation chairman, announced.

Serving with him will be Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta, Ga., Constitution, and Alan Barth, author and editorial writer for the Washington Post, who has been an awards judge for the past six years. All three judges are past winners of Hillman awards, named in honor of the founding president of the ACWA.

Feb. 1 is the deadline for submission of works published or produced in 1966 in this year's competition for the Hillman prizes.

Urban League, USES Join in Job-Test Study

A joint experiment to determine if occupational tests clearly reflect the abilities of Negroes will be conducted in Pittsburgh and New Orleans by the U.S. Employment Service and the National Urban League, the Labor Dept. announced.

Under an agreement signed by Assistant Labor Sec. Stanley H. Ruttenberg and Executive Dir. Whitney Young of the Urban League, the USES will release its General Aptitude Test Battery for use in the project.

The aptitude tests will be given in Urban League offices in the two cities. In addition, there will be experimental use of new tools and techniques the USES has developed to measure the ability of the educationally deficient and other disadvantaged persons.

These include new non-reading aptitude tests; tests of basic skills in arithmetic and reading to measure job-readiness, and the use of pre-testing orientation techniques to give the prospects a measure of practice in taking tests. The league will develop visual aids showing how to take the tests.

In each city two comparable groups of about 50 men and women each will be chosen for the experiment. Members of one group will be placed in jobs with the GATB test results used in the process; those in the other group will be put into jobs without the test results being disclosed.

After they have worked for a spell, the USES will analyze their job performance along with other data state employment service personnel will collect.

The results are expected to show if tests accurately reflect the "occupational potential" of the Negro and to indicate what steps might be taken to cut the Negro unemployment rate, which has been nearly double that of whites during the past decade.

They also are expected to help determine if employers are willing to hire Negroes who demonstrate ability in tests, and to show if those who meet test standards are any more successful or satisfied as workers than those who fail.

Ruttenberg said interest in the experiment has been shown by civil rights leaders.

4 CWA Locals Hit 1967 COPE Quotas

With 1967 less than two weeks old four local unions have already turned in 100 percent collections in the year's COPE dollar drive—and all are affiliates of the Communications Workers.

In the order in which the $1 per member contribution reached COPE, they are: Local 3517, Tupelo, Miss., and Local 3317, Pikesville, Ky., tied for first; third, Local 9409, Palo Alto, Calif.; fourth, Local 9407, Merced, Calif.

New Test Set:

Filibuster Foes Push Senate Rules Fight

mean by the vote of 60 instead of 67 senators.

Mansfield announced he is filing a cloture petition which would result in a floor vote on closing debate on Jan. 24.

Dirksen, who led the filibuster against 14(b) repeal and supported the filibuster against the 1966 civil rights bill, said he will vote for cloture and join in an effort to reach a compromise on changing the anti-filibuster rule.

Labor and civil rights groups have strongly supported the rules reform drive, although both have urged debate limitation by majority vote. The last AFL-CIO convention declared that the Senate "must be democratized" and said a majority should be able to close debate "after sufficient discussion in which every senator is given ample opportunity to present his view."

Strategy Fails

The full weight of the Senate "establishment" crushed an intricate but workable strategy for closing debate on the rules change by a majority vote.

The script ran this way:

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), sponsor of the three-fifths cloture proposal, moved for a vote on the motion that the Senate consider his rules change proposal. He asserted the Senate's "constitutional right" to act on a rules change by majority vote at the start of a new Congress.

Dirksen made a point of order that the debate-closing motion was contrary to Senate rules, and called on Humphrey for a ruling.

The last presiding officer called on to rule on such an issue was then-Vice Pres. Johnson in 1963. Johnson at the time held that the question was one of constitutional interpretation which could only be decided by the Senate. The Senate debate on the constitutional issue, however, was still bound by the two-thirds cloture rule and the question was finally sidetracked. In 1957, then-Vice Pres. Nixon gave an advisory opinion that a majority of the Senate at the start of a new Congress could exercise "its constitutional right to make its own rules." But the issue never came to a showdown because rules change supporters lacked a majority to force a test.

Humphrey started off by accepting the precedent that a constitutional question can only be decided by the Senate itself, not by its presiding officer. He therefore referred Dirksen's point of order to the Senate.

In answer to a series of questions, Humphrey went on to indicate that any senator could move to table Dirksen's point of order, a procedure that requires only a majority vote and is not subject to debate.

If the Senate voted to table, Humphrey said, the effect would be to uphold McGovern's claim that a majority of senators can end debate on a rules change proposal.

McGovern announced that he would make the motion to table Dirksen's point of order after two hours of debate and the showdown was set.

Mansfield and Dirksen argued that the shortcut procedure would set a precedent that could be used to establish simple majority cloture at any time. The appeal was to tradition, mingled with reminders of legislative episodes where majority rule would have harmed the nation or individual states.

'Path of Destruction'

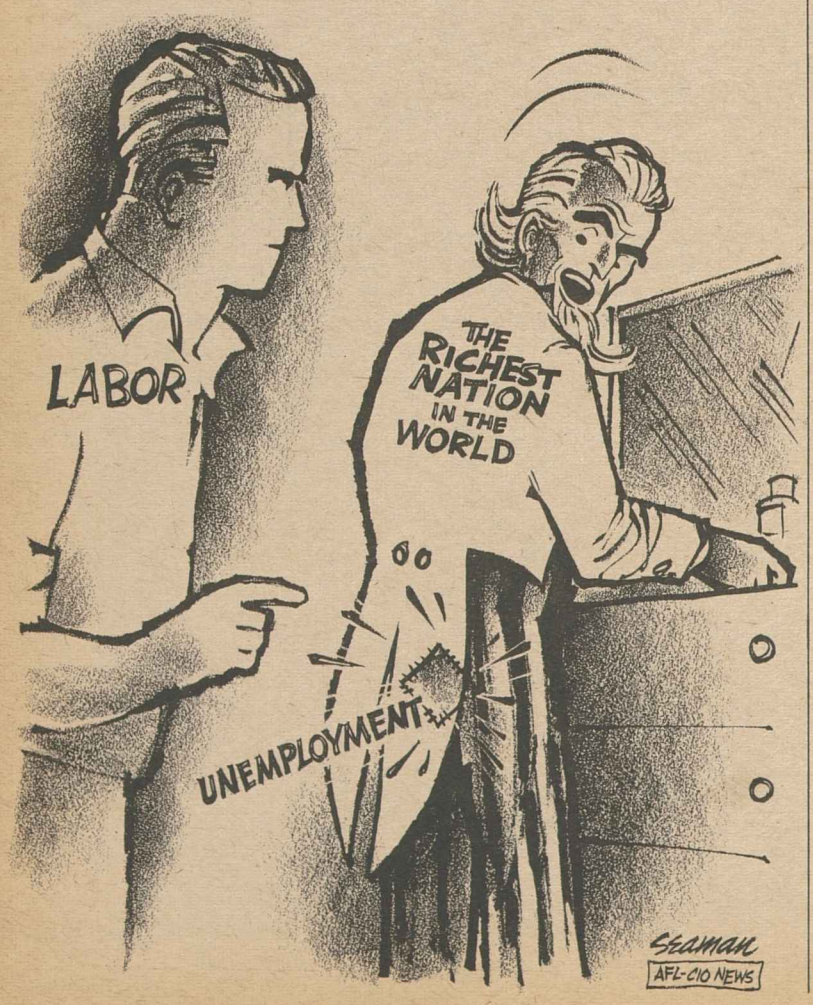
Mansfield said he favored a three-fifths cloture rule, but he argued that the procedure being followed to obtain it represented "a path of destruction to the Senate as an institution."

Rules reform leaders, who had carefully counted a bare probable majority for their cause a few days earlier, answered argument with argument. But their votes were whittled away under the bipartisan leadership attack.

On the showdown, 33 Democrats and 28 Republicans voted against the tabling motion, while 29 Democrats and eight Republicans voted for the shortcut to a rules change.

The Senate then put the last nail in the constitutional argument by voting 59-37 to uphold Dirksen's point of order.

'Aw, Nobody'll Notice It'



HOUSE SPEAKER John W. McCormack helped the Government Employes celebrate the 84th anniversary of the civil service system at a Washington, D.C., banquet attended by 1,500 AFGE members. McCormack, center, accepts a plaque of appreciation from AFGE Pres. John F. Griner. At left, Legislative Dir. Thomas G. Walters holds a reproduction of a profile of McCormack that appeared in the union's newspaper.

Democrats Name Liberal to Fill House Ways & Means Vacancy

Democratic members also select the Democratic members of other House committees, subject to routine confirmation at a party caucus.

There was one other liberal gain as the House moved through its start-of-a-Congress procedures. The two Democratic vacancies on the Rules Committee were filled by liberals—William R. Anderson of Tennessee and Spark M. Matsunaga of Hawaii.

This gives Administration supporters a normal 9-6 working majority on the committee, especially important since the bipartisan conservative coalition won repeal of the 21-day rule which had thwarted the ability of the Rules Committee to keep major bills from the House floor.

Conservatives picked up strength on nearly every other committee, however, reflecting the GOP's 47-seat election gain.

Committee ratios are set by agreement of Democratic and Republican leaders, subject to routine House approval, and most committees dropped from a 2-1 to a 3-2 Democratic ratio.

The Appropriations Committee, which ranks in importance with Ways & Means and Rules, took a sharp turn to the right with a shift in party ratio from 34-16 to 30-21 Democratic. The committee size was increased by one to give Republicans an extra member. The previous majority was moderate-to-conservative and the liberal beachhead was almost wiped out by the election and the death of Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.). The lone Democratic vacancy on the committee was assigned to a freshman from Arkansas, David Pryor, who voted against his party's leadership on the rules changes.

The Education & Labor Committee dropped from a 21-10 to a 19-14 Democratic ratio, but retains a liberal majority.

Committees where added conservative strength is likely to have a major impact on the Administration's program include the Banking Committee, now 19-14 instead of 22-11; the Foreign Affairs Committee, shifted from 24-12 to 21-15; the Judiciary Committee, moved from 24-11 to 20-15 Democratic, and the Commerce Committee, with a 19-14 instead of a 23-11 majority. The Ways & Means Committee shift was from 17-8 to 15-10 Democratic.

Appointments on both sides of the Capitol were still being made as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

One of the early shifts on the Senate side saw a liberal Republican, Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.), leave the Judiciary Committee to claim an opening on the Appropriations Committee. His place on Judiciary was taken by Sen. Strom Thurmond (S.C.), Republican segregationist ally of Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (Miss.).

Powell Panel Named

House Speaker John W. McCormack named Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler to head the special committee that will consider whether Rep.-elect Adam C. Powell should be seated Its recommendation will be submitted to the full House within five weeks.

Beside Celler, the dean of the House in length of service, the committee will include Democrats James C. Corman (Calif.), John Conyers, Jr. (Mich.), Claude Pepper (Fla.) and Andrew Jacobs, Jr. (Ind.). Republican memlican members, named by GOP Leader Gerald R. Ford, are Arch A. Moore, Jr. (W. Va.), Charles M. Teague (Calif.), Clark MacGregor (Minn.) and Vernon W. Thomson (Wis.).

A congressional reorganization bill, drafted last year by a joint committee of the two houses, is scheduled to be taken up by the Senate as the first major order of business after the current rules battle.

Its sponsors dropped from the measure a controversial proposal to split both the Labor & Public Welfare Committee of the Senate and the Education & Labor Committee of the House. The AFL-CIO had strongly opposed the plan to create separate education and labor committees in the two houses.

Other provisions, which are expected to win Senate approval, include additional staff for senators and for committees.

Congress awaited the dollars-and-cents details of Pres. Johnson's program in his annual budget message, due Jan. 24.

Also forthcoming, on Jan. 26, will be the President's Economic Report to Congress, the evaluation of the state of the economy prepared by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Bollard Moves to State-County Post

Columbus, O.—Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard of the Ohio AFL-CIO has resigned to take a new post in the general field of legislation and political activity with the State, County & Municipal Employes in Washington.

He was a representative of the Steelworkers in Cincinnati when he first took the state post in 1963 upon the resignation of the late Elmer F. Cope, and was elected in 1964 and 1966 without opposition. A veteran of 25 years in the labor movement, he was on the staff of the Illinois CIO for eight years prior to the AFL-CIO merger.

Tax Clearance Given Group Pension Plan

The Internal Revenue Service has approved the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s group pension plan for small employers, IUD Exec. Dir. Jack T. Conway announced.

The plan was set up a year ago to pool the pension resources of small companies and to offer employes a program comparable to those in large firms. Several major insurance companies are participating, with the Prudential Insurance Co. acting as administrator.

IRS approval means that contributing employers can be assured their payments into the trust fund are exempt from taxation. Individual approval will not be required for tax purposes, he said.

Approval also eliminates the need for separate actuarial and legal services in connection with the establishment of a pension plan, he added.

The year-old program already gives pension protection to more than 2,800 employes of 35 bargaining units, Conway reported. Four pensioners are drawing benefits, and over $115,000 has been paid into the trust fund by employers.

'New Hope' for Aged Hailed In Social Security Proposal

LBJ's Economic Report:

Jobless Rate Seen Sticking Near 4%

By Saul Miller

The American economy will grow at a slower rate in 1967, the drop in unemployment will level out and prices will rise slightly more than 2.5 percent.

That's the outlook for the year projected by Pres. Johnson and his Council of Economic Advisers.

The President told Congress in his annual Economic Report that it will require "a flexible and delicate balance of economic policies" to solve the problems confronting the nation.

The balance was emphasized in the CEA report which voiced its concern over the possibility of a sluggish first six months of 1967 and the need for government policies to stimulate the economy. For the second half of the year the council called for a switch to restraint to assure stability.

The gross national product — the total value of all goods and services for the year — is expected to increase 4 percent in 1967 in real dollar terms, compared to an increase in 1966 of 5.5 percent, the council said. The anticipated $47 billion rise in the GNP is slated to send the total to $787 billion.

The growth in the GNP will maintain "healthy forward motion," the council said, but the unemployment rate will be "essentially the same as in 1966 when it averaged 3.9 percent." For the past five years the unemployment rate has been declining steadily.

The record on prices should improve in 1967, the council added, with the overall increase dropping

Filibuster Foes Lose To Dirksen

An effort by Senate liberals to make it easier to halt a filibuster was killed when Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen prevented the Senate from acting on a rules change.

Present rules require a two-thirds vote to close debate and supporters of a rules change had rallied behind a compromise plan to end debate by a three-fifths vote. But they were unable to get their plan to a vote—or even bring it to the Senate floor.

On the showdown to invoke cloture, 36 Democrats and 17 Republicans voted to halt the filibuster against the rules change; 27 Democrats and 19 Republicans supported the filibuster.

An apparent about-face by Dirksen dashed the last real hope for a major rules reform in this Congress.

Dirksen had joined with Dem-

CHART SHOWING the breakdown of the budget dollar is used by Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze at a briefing for newsmen. Of every dollar spent, 56 cents is earmarked for defense and Viet Nam costs, 33 cents goes into interest payments, veterans benefits and other fixed charges, leaving 11 cents for all other government programs.

Stresses Nation's Strength:

President's Budget Pushes Social Goals

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson asked Congress to vote the billions needed both to repel aggression in Viet Nam and combat poverty, ignorance, slums and pollution at home.

The United States is "stronger than ever before," the President said, and "can afford" to press ahead with "urgent social programs."

Military spending and payments fixed by law accounted for nearly 90 percent of the President's proposed budget. He warned against the slashes demanded by conservatives in the remainder of the budget, declaring "we cannot permit the defense of freedom abroad to sidetrack the struggle for individual growth and dignity."

Appropriations sought for the fiscal year starting July 1, the President told Congress, would "move forward at a reasonable rate the programs to broaden opportunities for the poor and disadvantaged."

Johnson asked Congress to appropriate about $1.9 billion more than last year for Great Society programs. These include education, poverty, housing, regional development and pollution control.

From all federal sources, including portions of the social security and other trust funds, aid to the poor would rise next year to $25.6 billion, up $3.6 billion from the present level and double the expenditures of five years ago. The figure assumes congressional approval of the Administration's social security benefit increase bill.

Although details of the Administration's proposal for government employe pay raises were not spelled out, the budget earmarks $1 billion for both civilian and military salary hikes. If applied across the board,

Meany Calls LBJ Plan Good Start

By Gervase N. Love

Pres. Johnson's proposal for increases in social security benefits averaging at least 20 percent represents "a substantial down payment" on what organized labor believes is a needed 50 percent rise, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany said the President had "wisely recommended . . . vital and necessary improvement" in the benefits schedule "which should bring new hope to more than 19 million elderly Americans."

Calls for More

The full 50 percent rise in benefits—called for by the last AFL-CIO convention—should go into effect, he suggested, "as soon as it can be adequately financed "without detriment to other high priority domestic and foreign commitments."

"We believe that the elderly and other Americans dependent on social security should share fully in the nation's economic progress," Meany added.

"The President's proposals reflect his commitment to that principle and deserve Congress' sympathetic consideration. To the President's recommendations, we would add the need for additional improvements in both the disability insurance and medicare programs."

Budget Seeks Expansion of Job Training

Pres. Johnson called for a stepup in the Labor Dept.'s manpower training program in his budget request to Congress.

He asked increased appropriations to train 280,000 workers during the 1958 fiscal year, a rise of 30,000 from the current year's enrollment.

The budget put the emphasis on training the hard-core unemployed — "the severely disadvantaged" — and meeting skill shortages. A new program of remedial and part-time training is proposed, to enroll some 56,000 trainees during the year. Conventional forms of vocational and on-the-job training would be

Eleven Unions at GE, Westinghouse To Strengthen Unified Bargaining

Eleven AFL-CIO unions that used the coordinated approach in bargaining with General Electric Co. and the Westinghouse Corp. reported "superior" gains from the experience and announced plans to strengthen their cooperation in the years ahead.

Coordination of bargaining plans resulted in a "tremendous gain for the 200,000 employes represented by our unions," the AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining said in a statement.

With some local unions still on strike over local issues, the committee said "we would be foolish to rest content on what has been accomplished" and "serious problems left over from the 1966 negotiations still face us. Technology and the economy continue to change; the anti-labor position of the companies does not."

The 11 unions that dovetailed their goals nearly a year ago are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Auto Workers, Technical Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Steelworkers and Carpenters.

The group's steering committee summed up the results of the year's efforts with the declaration that coordinated bargaining had met the test. The committee agreed not only to maintain cooperation but to strengthen its effectiveness.

On organizing, the committee statement promised to "eliminate any rivalry" among the unions, in

Party Caucus To Decide Spot For Dixiecrat

A House Democratic caucus was handed the thorny issue of the seniority status of Rep. John Bell Williams, an 11-term Dixiecrat from Mississippi.

Two years ago House Democrats voted to drop Williams to the bottom of the Commerce Committee roster because he openly supported Barry Goldwater in the 1964 presidential election. He would otherwise have been the second-ranking member and would have advanced to the chairmanship last year.

Williams wants his seniority back—at least to the Number 2 spot on the committee. Democratic members of the Ways & Means Committee, who normally handle committee assignments, tossed the issue to the full Democratic caucus. Meanwhile they left a vacancy on the Commerce Committee at a ranking still to be determined.

Also unsettled—although not an issue that has to be faced immediately—is the seniority status of Adam C. Powell on the Education & Labor Committee if the House should vote to seat him. A special bipartisan committee is currently considering Powell's qualifications for office.

Otherwise committee appointments showed few surprises. The already-conservative bent of the powerful House Appropriations Committee was strengthened when Republicans named conservatives to all five GOP vacancies. The Education & Labor Committee remained generally liberal, although less so than in the 89th Congress.

Dirksen Blocks Senate From Rule Change Vote

ocratic Leader Mike Mansfield in sponsoring a cloture petition to permit the rules change proposal to come to the floor.

Both had opposed the parliamentary shortcut which the Senate rejected on Jan. 18—an assertion that a majority of the Senate had a constitutional right to act on its rules at the start of a new Congress without being hamstrung by rules adopted by a previous Congress. A ruling by Vice Pres. Humphrey left this course open, but the Senate refused by a 61-37 vote to follow it.

Dirksen's willingness to co-sponsor the cloture petition raised hopes for some sort of rules reform. Earlier he had told newsmen he could "live with" a three-fifths rule. On the Senate floor he gave his "assurance" to supporters of a rules change that he would "sit down . . . and see if we cannot negotiate a reasonable time to discuss this matter and let it come to a vote."

Less than 24 hours later, the hopes that Dirksen's influence would rally the two-thirds needed for the cloture vote were dashed.

The Republican leader explained that he had no intention of voting for cloture, that his signature on the petition didn't mean anything except that he was willing to have the Senate vote on whether or not to close debate. Only 16 signatures are needed on a cloture petition and 30 senators besides Dirksen had signed it.

On Jan. 24, when the vote came, the Senate Republican leader was explicit:

"I am opposed to cloture by a majority, I am opposed to cloture by 60 percent, and I am opposed to cloture by any other means than that which exists in Rule 22 at the present time," he told the Senate.

"As a practical matter," he added, "had we not had the rule which is on the books today, repeal of Section 14(b) [the 'right-to-work' provision of the Taft-Hartley Act] would have been jammed through the Senate as it was through the House by twisting the arms of those tender young representatives . . . The repeal of Section 14(b) could not be rammed through the Senate . . . If we had not had the two-thirds rule, it would have been a different story."

The Senate's liberal assistant Republican leader, Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), termed Dirksen's decision to oppose any consideration of a rules change "a body blow."

While defeat of the cloture move swept the rules reform proposals off the Senate agenda, the battle was revived on another field by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.).

Clark included a series of anti-filibuster rules changes in a group of amendments proposed to the legislative reorganization bill currently before the Senate.

They ranged from permitting a majority of the Senate to close debate after three days of discussion to elimination of some of the procedural tactics used by a minority during a filibuster, such as requiring the reading of the Senate journal.

Senate Rollcall Vote on Rules Change Filibuster

The Senate voted 53-46 to end a filibuster against considering a change in its cloture rule. The vote was short of the two-thirds majority required under the present rule, so the effort failed. Labor supported the position of the 36 Democrats and 17 Republicans who voted to end debate.

AIFLD Projects Reduce Latin Mortgage Costs

Latin American urban and rural workers, previously precluded from home ownership by mortgage interest rates as high as 12 percent a month for periods as short as three years, are now getting their own homes.

How this is being done was described on a recent radio program by Don Bruner, social projects director for the American Institute for Free Labor Development in the Dominican Republic; Salvatore Piazza, social projects director for AIFLD in Peru, and Ignazio G. Mendoza, general manager of ASINCOOP, worker savings and loan bank in Lima, Peru. The three appeared on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the ABC radio network.

Bruner reported that three-bedroom houses are now available in the Dominican Republic for a down payment of $380 and monthly payments of $24.18.

Similar facilities were said to be features of the houses built under AIFLD auspices in Peru.

AFL-CIO pension and welfare funds, made available for housing loans, is given a 100 percent guarantee of repayment, Piazza explained. Such funds have been used for a number of housing projects in Latin America.

'Emergency' Question Unresolved:

High Court Declines Carbide Case Review

The Supreme Court refused to review decisions by two federal courts upholding an 80-day injunction ordering 2,100 striking Steelworkers back to work at the Kokomo, Ind., plant of the Union Carbide Corp.

The refusal left unresolved before the high court the question of the federal government's authority to halt a strike at a single industrial plant, under the "national emergency" provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The union had challenged that authority, saying in its petition for review that Congress intended the provisions to apply only to industry-wide strikes and not to a single plant producing products that do not affect an entire industry "or a substantial portion thereof."

11 Plants Struck

The Kokomo plant was one of 11 where three AFL-CIO unions stopped work when contracts expired, the first in July. The steelworkers were ordered back to their jobs in Kokomo alone on Dec. 23 and are not free to strike again until the injunction expires Mar. 13. Also back are USWA members at a Union Carbide plant in Sheffield, Ala., who settled late in December.

The Kokomo strike started Sept. 29. Pres. Johnson named an emergency board in December and, on the basis of its report that the national defense effort was "imperiled," the government secured a back-to-work order Dec. 21. The order, by U.S. District Judge Leonard P. Walsh, was affirmed by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In asking the Supreme Court to reverse the lower courts, union attorneys had pointed out that the case presented "important questions which have not been, but should be, decided by this court."

They recounted that the high court had dealt with "national emergency" injunction provisions only once, in the 1959 USWA strike against the steel industry. In that case the justices ruled that, before issuing an injunction, the courts must find, first, that the strike affects an entire industry or substantial part, and second that it imperils the national health or safety.

They pointed out that Congress in 1952 failed to enact a proposed law to extend Taft-Hartley's national emergency provisions to strikes in a vital industry or plant. Despite that refusal, they argued, the government "with the acquiescence of the lower courts" has misused the law to achieve the same result.

Meanwhile a lockout at one Union Carbide plant and strikes at eight other plants continued to involve the Chemical Workers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the USWA, with no visible abandonment of what the unions call management's "arrogant" insistence on having things its own way.

The unions returned to bargaining at individual locations, instead of as a coordinated group, when Union Carbide officials said the change would be to their advantage. The results were called disappointing though some striking locals have asked the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to set further meeting dates at several locations. Talks at one struck plant, in Ashtabula, O., were called off when no progress was made, the unions said.

The three-union strike was triggered when the company locked out 1,200 OCAW members at Alloy, W. Va. The union filed unfair labor practice charges, and NLRB Trial Examiner George J. Bott upheld them. Bott ruled the corporation guilty of refusal to bargain and illegal discrimination by insisting "to the point of impasse" on union acceptance of a company-altered pension-insurance plan which was not then open for negotiation.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has voted full support of the strikes and called for financial support and a consumer boycott of Union Carbide products. That boycott is continuing.

organizing new plants, and to work out a method through which a campaign of one union will be supported by the others.

On contract administration, the committee said it will set up a clearinghouse for information on grievances. Concerted action will be concentrated also on narrowing geographic wage differentials, a goal not yet attained.

The statement said that the unity established in 1966 "will enable us to move ahead with greater confidence in the coming years and adequately prepare us for negotiations in 1969."

New GE and Westinghouse contracts achieved on the national level will provide benefits over a three-year period "greater than those of the six-year period 1960-1966," union representatives said. They gave these details:

"Not only did we restore the annual wage increase, and to a partial extent the cost of living escalator, but great gains were made in pensions, insurance, vacations, adjustments for the skilled trades and improvements in contract administration.

"It is significant that both companies publicly acknowledged they were acting in response to proposals . . . developed by our coordinated unions."

Committees Enlarged

The committee recognized that a contributing factor to its success was the practice of inviting all unions to send representatives to each union-management bargaining session. It predicted the courts will "sustain the position" of the National Labor Relations Board, that unions have a right to have representatives of other unions on their bargaining committees. The NLRB ruling is being appealed by the two giant manufacturing firms.

A GE statement Dec. 19 "leaves no doubt that the company not only clings to its basic anti-labor position but is determined to intensify it," the committee reported. "We are equally determined" to improve coordinated activities, it said.

Promising a drive "to secure maximum membership in the plants we already represent," the 11 unions noted GE's continued refusal to agree to a union shop clause and declared enrolling all workers in organized shops is "an essential part of our job."

In 1966, both companies refused to improve the "very inadequate arbitration clauses" in existing contracts, the statement continued, despite warnings that the refusal might well result in strikes over unsettled grievances.

"We frankly declare that we will support strike activity where this is the only effective method . . . to secure redress of unsettled grievances. We will also explore other methods of securing legal action . . . including suits for damages against the companies."

Nothing that both companies "refused to act on the great and growing gap between the wages paid to southern and rural employes" and those paid elsewhere for the same type of work, the committee said it will sponsor an "all-embracing survey on comparative wage rates to further document our case for action on equalization."

The joint organization announced it will continue its publication, Unity, on a quarterly basis and is weighing plans for regional or national conferences of local unions.

Job Security Progress Called Key OCAW Gain

Denver, Colo.—New contracts just concluded for 60,000 oil industry workers are keyed to the theme that proposed reductions in force will be "a matter for serious and constructive collective bargaining" in future, Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers said here.

In a statement marking the successful close of the union's 1966-67 bargaining with major oil firms, Grospiron expressed his gratification that "broad segments of the American oil industry have reached agreement . . . without a moment of work stoppage, on impressive economic gains—an estimated 44 cents an hour over two years—and on the very important principle of job security."

Grospiron reported that the companies have said in writing that they do not expect to lay off present regular employes but that "in the unforeseen event they should decide to do so, they will make the question a matter of collective bargaining."

Companies have agreed, he continued, to provide the union with advance notice of contemplated layoffs so that negotiators may discuss means of "avoiding or ameliorating" them. He added:

"The union has won the right to strike against such layoffs if negotiations do not bring mutually satisfactory results."

He called the agreements a "tremendous forward step" and final recognition of the need for "human security and the right of the union to discuss this subject with management."

Layoffs in the industry led OCAW's national oil bargaining policy committee to declare last year that all present regular and permanent employes should be guaranteed continued employment at present or higher rates until retirement on adequate pension, he said.

Industry agreements followed a settlement with Gulf Oil at its Port Arthur, Tex., refinery that other firms agreed to approximate. The settlement established the principle of rate retention for refinery employes, Grospiron said.

The union announced settlement of strikes over local issues at the Port Arthur plant of Texaco, Inc., and two Standard Oil of Ohio plants in Cleveland and Toledo.

A strike against Texaco by members of the Int'l Brotherhood of Electrical Workers also was settled on terms accepted by that union at the Port Arthur plant division.

Champion Paper Victory Climaxes 5-Year Drive

Hamilton, O.—The parent plant of the Champion Paper Co. here, long known as an anti-labor stronghold in the Ohio River Valley, has finally gone union.

After an organizing campaign that started in 1961 and was marked by five previous elections, the Papermakers & Paperworkers eked out a National Labor Relations Board ballot victory by a tally of 912 to 907.

The close vote reflected the intensity of the company's opposition. Two earlier elections were set aside because of the firm's unfair practices, including illegal discharges of its employes for legitimate trade union activities. In the last prior vote, in August 1966, the UPP came within two votes of winning despite the company's unfair tactics.

AFL-CIO Rep. Tom Stewart of Region IX (Cleveland) directed the latest drive. He was assisted by Representatives Charles Coakwell and Al Shibley of Region IX and Rep. Peter Lehnen of Region X (Indianapolis), and a full-time group of UPP representatives that included John Gray, Warren Mortle, David Pierrpont and William Turner.

Volunteer part time organizers from among employes and a 75-member in-plant committee also assisted.

The Champion company is engaged in merger negotiations with the U.S. Plywood Co. At least 10 NLRB elections have been held in the local plant in the past 20 years. Last May the Pulp-Sulphite Workers, with help from AFL-CIO representatives, won a labor board election at the firm's plants in Canton and Waynesville, N.C., and have since negotiated a first contract providing substantial wage increases and major improvements in working conditions.

Day Care Staffs Pick State-County

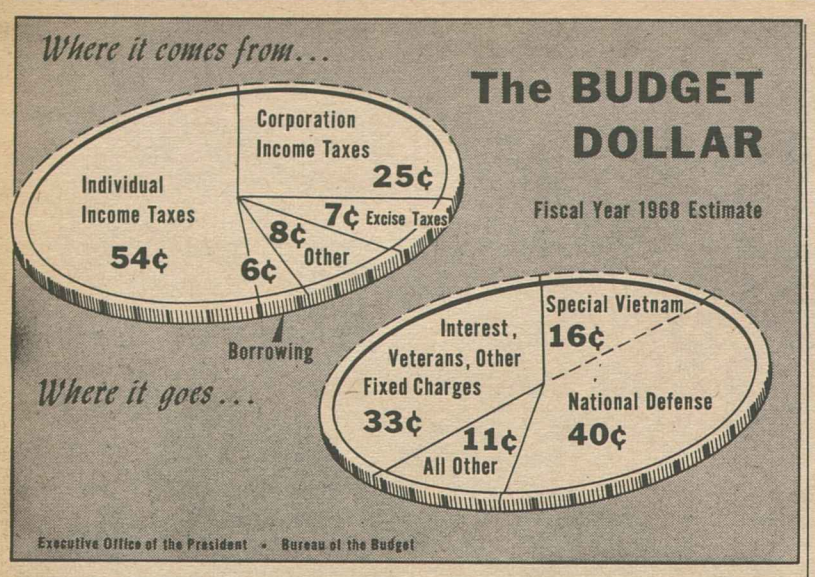
New York—Employes of 79 day care centers here voted to be represented by Local 1707 of the State, County & Municipal Employes in a mail ballot election conducted by the American Arbitration Association.

The AFL-CIO-affiliated union polled 336 votes to 171 for an unaffiliated union, with 54 votes for neither.

Office Unit Strike Wins UAW Pact

Detroit — A wage increase of $4.35 a week ended a one-week strike by 65 members of Auto Workers Local 174 employed in the office of the Revere Copper & Brass Co. here.

The pay hike, retroactive to Sept. 16, 1966, highlights a new two-year contract that also includes provisions for automatic wage raises, a non-contributory pension plan, severance pay, paid absence allowances, a new seniority system and the union shop. The agreement was ratified unanimously.



Administrative Budget Expenditures

it would result in a pay raise in the 3.5 to 4 percent range.

The Administration did some careful pruning to keep the anticipated deficit to a minimum. A number of construction projects were deferred and increases in many domestic programs were less of a step-up than provided in long-term authorization bills already enacted by Congress.

$3 Billion Less

The President could have asked for "at least $3 billion" more than he did for these programs, Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze told newsmen.

Included in the budget calculations are revenue increases which are yet to be enacted by Congress—principally the 6 percent surcharge on corporate and individual income taxes sought by Johnson and a hike in postage rates designed to make the postal service pay its way.

Federal expenditures of $169.2 billion, up $15.6 billion from the current fiscal year, would be almost matched by receipts of $167.1 billion, an increase of $17.3 billion.

The gap between the money the government takes in and the money it pays out would amount to $2.1 billion, about $1.7 billion less than the estimated deficit for the current fiscal year.

Were it not for the special costs of the Viet Nam war—estimated at $22.4 billion for the 1968 fiscal year—the budget would have shown a substantial surplus. In fact, Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler told newsmen, there would have been big surpluses for the past two years if Viet Nam costs were excluded. He cited these figures, Fowler said, for "the special attention of all those who, unaware of the facts, are talking about runaway federal spending."

The anticipated attack on the size of the budget came from conservatives on Capitol Hill, foreshadowing a major battle over appropriations.

For the first time, the budget was presented primarily in terms of total government income and spending, including transactions of trust funds such as social security.

Most economists have long agreed that these "national income accounts" are a better measure of the impact of federal spending on the economy than the more familiar "administrative budget," which is based on appropriations by Congress.

Trust fund income and spending now accounts for about one-third of the government's economic transactions and must be considered in determining whether a budget will have an expanding or contracting effect on the national economy.

The administrative budget, which excludes trust fund transactions, shows a deficit of $8.1 billion. A third type of budget, based on cash outgo but including some lending transactions not counted in the national income accounts, produces a $4.3 billion deficit. Under all three accounting methods, though, the coming year deficit would be smaller than this year's.

Besides the tax and postage rate increases, the President proposed to help meet the rising costs of government by selling $5.3 billion of government-owned mortgages and other financial assets. In the administrative budget, income from the sale of these assets is treated as a reduction in expenditures, just as the original loans were shown as an increase in spending when they were made.

Republicans have attacked this as a "gimmick" designed to conceal the full extent of budget deficits and are expected to fight to discontinue the funding plan.

Key Areas

In some areas where the budget requests were being carefully scrutinized by both liberals and conservatives, the President:

● Asked Congress to move ahead with the large-scale model cities program authorized last year by permitting the government to commit $412 million in federal grants to cities, although only $150 million would be actually paid out during the fiscal year. The President also asked an additional $40 million to continue and expand the rent supplement program, raising the number of housing units covered from 29,000 to 44,500. The program has been sharply attacked by congressional conservatives and barely survived even in the heavily Democratic 89th Congress.

● Proposed sharply boosted spending for programs to control air and water pollution, including both grants to state and local agencies and research projects. As in most domestic programs, the amounts were less than spending ceilings set last year by Congress.

● Asked continued large expenditures for education, including a new follow-up program to Project Head Start which provides special training for pre-school children. The budget adds about $500 million above current levels for all education programs and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner commented: "It will move our programs forward but not at the accelerated pace we would expect if we were free of the fiscal restraints that the war imposes."

Again defying conservative critics, Johnson asked funds to expand the Teacher Corps, a Great Society program to send teams of teachers to serve, when requested, in poverty area schools. Congress came close to killing the program last year and heavily cut its appropriation.

● Proposed increased funds for anti-poverty community action programs, an area cut by the last Congress.

● Sought more money for health research and said "legislation will be proposed to improve the availability and quality of health care for children, including dental care."

● Announced that legislation will be proposed to increase educational allowances and training for returned veterans and lower the cost of life insurance for servicemen.

● Asked increased funds for school lunches and expansion of pilot programs for breakfasts in schools in needy areas. The budget also called for a boost in the food stamp program.

● Requested a $2.7 billion foreign aid program, slightly above current levels but below the last budget request. Included was $550 million for economic aid to South Viet Nam. The administrator of the Agency for Intl. Development, William S. Goud, said he hoped Congress wouldn't cut the economic aid request which he termed a "bikini budget."

Tight money put a squeeze on the government as well as on the private sector of the economy during the past year, the President noted. He said the deficit for the current fiscal year is $3 billion higher because of higher interest rates and other effects of the money squeeze.

Johnson warned Congress that the economy could be thrown out of kilter by major changes in the budget, either in spending or in tax revenue.

A substantially higher deficit, he warned, would risk "choking off the much-desired move toward lower interest rates" and "renewing inflationary pressures, particularly in the latter half of this year."

On the other hand, he cautioned, seeking a lower deficit through budget cuts would be "self-defeating." It could "depress economic activity, reduce the income of individuals and corporations, and thereby fail to secure the revenues it was designed to achieve."

Budget Asks Expanded Job Training

cut back slightly, but experimental and demonstration programs would be increased.

Moderate increases are recommended for nearly all Labor Dept. operations, adding up to a hike of $11.6 million in spending authority and an increase of $26.8 million over the current year in actual spending. The department's total budget calls for $652.9 million in spending authority and $530 million in actual expenses.

The President reported that 613,000 persons have received training since the passage of the 1962 Manpower Development & Training Act. Of 373,000 who have completed training, over 78 percent have been placed in jobs, he said.

During the coming fiscal year, the President said, about two-thirds of trainees will be workers "with minimal skills . . . who are least able to take advantage of job opportunities now available."

The Labor Dept. budget also asks an increase of $2.7 million for the Wage & Hour Division for costs of administering the 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. It asks $2.47 million more for the Bureau of Labor Statistics for "improved statistics and statistical research on employment and unemployment, prices, wages, and employe benefit plans."

More money also is sought for enforcement of the non-discrimination provisions in government contracts and grant programs.

A boost in the budget for the Bureau of Intl. Labor Affairs is explained as "an expanded program to improve labor-management relations for U.S. firms overseas."

In related areas, the budget proposes:

● A $1.3 million increase for the National Labor Relations Board, reflecting an estimated 5 percent increase in representation cases and an anticipated 2 percent rise in unfair labor practice cases.

● A $278,000 boost for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service for "an expected increase in labor-management dispute activity."

● An additional $69,000 for National Mediation Board spending for the "new special adjustment boards" set up under Railway Labor Act amendments of the 89th Congress "to provide an expeditious alternative procedure for readjustment of railroad grievances."

The President also asked $2.1 million more spending authority, for a total of $7.1 million, for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for expanded enforcement workload, greater technical assistance and improved statistical reporting.

Economic Boom Seen Slowing in 1967

Report Predicts Unemployment Will Level Off Near 4 Percent

from 3.3 percent to "slightly more than 2.5 percent."

The President renewed his appeal to business and labor "for the utmost restraint and responsibility in wage and price decisions." He noted that in 1966 most businessmen and most trade unions acted "responsibly" because they recognized the national interest as their own.

He warned that "if unions now attempt to recoup in wages all of the past or anticipated advance in the cost of living—in addition to the productivity trend; (and) if businesses now seek to pass along rising costs when it would be possible to absorb them or do not reduce prices when costs fall then the result will be just such a (wage-price) spiral damaging to business, damaging to labor and disastrous to the nation."

The President called attention to four major economic problems facing the country in 1967:

- Economic progress still left far too many behind. This included 3 million unemployed at the end of 1966, a third of them hard-core jobless, and a large group of workers who had given up looking for jobs.
- Price increases, although less than in many comparable periods, were "greater than we wanted or should long tolerate."
- Achieving equilibrium in the balance of payments—a remaining problem in spite of strong, new measures.
- Tight money and high interest rates that concentrated the burden of restraint on housing.

The President reviewed past and new programs to attack poverty and unemployment, noted that interest rates are moving downward and credit is becoming easier to get and that "the advance of prices has already begun to slow . . . we will be making good progress toward price stability this year."

The CEA, in a review of collective bargaining in 1966, said the median union wage increase, excluding fringe benefits in all non-construction contracts was 3.3 percent "about the same as in 1965."

It said that productivity last year was "somewhat below the average annual increase in the postwar period" and that unit labor costs, stable between 1960 and 1964, increased modestly in 1965 and again in 1966. The 1966 increase in unit labor costs, it added, "was well below the increase experienced in every other postwar expansion" and the "sharp" upturn in the second half of last year "should be regarded as temporary in nature."

As for unemployment in 1967, the council declared that "the experience of 1966 clearly suggests that expanding demand cannot lower the unemployment rate much below the present level without bringing an unacceptable rate of price increase. Under present conditions, an over-all unemployment rate close to 4 percent appears to be associated with an approximate balance between supply and demand in most labor markets. A higher level of demand for goods and services would create inflationary pressures in both product and labor markets."

Most of the unemployment that remains, the council said, is either "frictional" or "structural" — new job seekers, workers coming back to the labor market or voluntary job changes accounting for most of the "frictional" factor, and untrained youths, non-white workers and older persons making up the bulk of the "structural" group.

Wage-Price Variations

Reviewing the workings of the wage-price guideposts, the CEA declared that until the second half of 1966, wage settlements on the average were "only modestly in excess" of the guideposts, but that settlements in construction and some transportation and manufacturing negotiations were in excess of the council's position that wage increases should be held to 3.2 percent with certain exceptions.

"It is clear," the council added, "that some significant price reductions which the guidepost would have suggested have not occurred . . . in general terms, the greatest failure of observance of the price guidepost lies in the failure to reduce prices on a considerable number of the product lines of a large number of industries."

Two major problems confront wage-price policy in 1967, the council commented—the rise in consumer prices and the fact that "corporate profits have increased considerably more than aggregate labor income."

The report goes on to say that the primary source of the rise in consumer prices is in areas where the guideposts have no applicability and the rise in profits would have occurred "had the guideposts been precisely followed."

The council said that no useful purpose would be served by suggesting a higher standard for wage increases "even on a temporary basis," while recognizing that the rise in living costs "makes it unlikely" that 1967 settlements will "fully conform" to productivity trends. The national interest, it stressed, requires restraint in wage settlements.

The council expressed its position that contracts that "automatically tie wages rates to changes in consumer price indexes will contribute to inflation." It suggested the possibility of an exception to the guidepost principle in shortage occupations, but only if "the union involved stands ready to lift every artificial barrier to entry into the occupation, and to cooperate fully in public and private efforts to train whatever numbers of workers may desire to enter the occupation."

The public interest, the council added, requires that wage settlements pay appropriate attention "to factors of comparability. But it cannot accept inflationary settlements every time this justification is alleged."

As to prices, the council urged that "producers absorb cost increases to the maximum extent feasible and take advantage of every opportunity to lower prices." It noted that "although average profit margins of manufacturers declined in the second half of 1966, they were higher for the entire year—at least as a percentage of equity—than in any prior year since the highly inflationary year of 1950."

The President's message reviewed the recent economic gains noting that "in purely material terms most Americans are better off than ever before." He expressed the Administration's determination to maintain a moderate advance, declaring that the country cannot tolerate either a further slowdown or new spurt of demand.

Of the $47 billion growth in the GNP in 1967, the President said, $10 billion will go for Viet Nam, $1.5 billion for expansion of other federal purchases including pay increases for government workers, and $8 billion will be used by state and local governments aided by $15 billion in federal grants. The remaining $27.5 billion, he said, will be used in the private sector.

In discussing help for the disadvantaged, the President said he will establish a commission to examine the many proposals for income guarantees, to report back in two years; ask Congress for legislation in the public assistance area for new improved standards and formulas; urge funds for a new and special effort to train and find jobs for the "disadvantaged who live in urban ghettos; seek improvement in the federal-state employment service; improve social security benefits, establish more uniformly adequate benefits for unemployment insurance as well as extended benefits for the long-term unemployed."

He restated his intention of proposing an expanded Head Start program and a Follow-Through plan, an expanded child health program, control of air pollution and reform of the tax system with specific changes to deal with abuses by tax-exempt private foundations.

Support Urged

He urged Congress to support his recommendation for a new department of labor and business to more effectively carry out national programs and improve the efficiency of the various programs both departments now handle. The President said that separate departments "perpetuate the obsolete notion that there is a fundamental conflict between the interests of business and labor, or between the interests of either and that of the nation."

He renewed requests for a system of user charges in transportation, a modernization of the patent system, authority to dispose of additional stockpile excesses and coordination of banks' regulatory and examination policies.

Reports on the economic policies needed to direct the nation in peacetime after Viet Nam have been ordered, he said, and will be kept in readiness.

Sullivan hung on to the locomotive grabrail, shoved the boy out of the way while Engineer Merle Wacker applied the brakes. Timmy had followed his dog from the family back yard.

75 Non-Union Years End As URW Wins Election

Joplin, Mo.—The Rubber Workers scored an emphatic election victory here in a plant that had succeeded in keeping out unions for more than 75 years.

URW organizers teamed up with plant workers and the AFL-CIO regional director's office to win a National Labor Relations Board election, 263-187, at the Couples aerospace battery plant of the Eagle-Picher Co., a government contractor.

It was the fourth election in recent years at the Couples plant, which was an Eagle-Picher smelter when that firm specialized in zinc in the 1880s. Management broke a strike in 1901 and again in New Deal days, when national guardsmen from Missouri and nearby Kansas put down worker "defiance" with a loss of six lives, URW officials recalled.

The URW made its first breakthrough last Oct. 13 by winning bargaining rights at another Eagle-Picher plant here, 47-29. Then it followed with two more victories—at Couples, and at a Galena, Kan., location, 81-65.

Management conducted a "very vigorous" anti-union campaign but failed to overcome an informational effort launched last fall by URW organizers.

The union campaign made the point that low wages at Eagle-Picher plants have held down area wages for years, despite the fact that the Couples plant has a government contract to make batteries for the Gemini space project.

A URW spokesman reported that during the organizing campaign, management exhibited a letter from Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey to Eagle-Picher Pres. T. Spencer Shore congratulating "you and your associates" for "your contributions" to the Gemini program.

The union also sent a letter congratulating Couples workers on their part in making the space program successful and adding: "It is your skills, along with those of many thousands of highly paid union members in other companies, that make our space program possible."

Noting that management and Humphrey substantiate the union's claim that "you are highly skilled workers," the URW asked: "Why aren't you receiving the same rates of pay as other workers in the space program?"

It advised that "a yes vote will give you an opportunity to negotiate adequate wages, better fringe benefits and job security comparable to those enjoyed" by other space workers.

The union also presented another Humphrey quote: "To those who say . . . protecting labor's right to organize may have been essential many years ago, when employers were insensitive to the need of workers, before there were protective labor laws . . . I say that unions are as essential as ever before."

The workers got the Humphrey message.

URW organizers were aided by AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Delmond Garst and his staff.

Parley Spurs 'Direct Action' In Organizing

Cincinnati, Ohio—Union members don't have to know everything about organizing to be effective—but if they use what they do know, the ranks of organized labor would increase greatly, AFL-CIO Assistant Organization Dir. Ed Haines told a Special Policy Conference of the Brewery Workers.

Haines and Thomas M. Rusch, the union's director of organization, spoke on modern techniques of organizing. Haines, warning that conferences are worthless unless "direct action" results, urged an organizing committee in each local.

AFL-CIO Assistant Education Dir. Otto Pragan and James E. Wolfe, director of the Brewery Workers' Dept. of Research & Education, discussed collective bargaining at a session over which BW Pres. Karl F. Feller presided.

Equal rights in bargaining were analyzed by Dir. Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. Pension planning was discussed by the union's secretary-treasurer, Arthur P. Gildea, and its general counsel, James C. Paradise. Gildea and Sec. James Bury of the Ontario branch of Canada's New Democratic Party led a discussion on political action and legislation.

Hart Named To Labor Post By Gov. Shafer

Harrisburg, Pa. — Dir. William J. Hart of Steelworkers' District 19, Pittsburgh, took office as Pennsylvania's Sec. of Labor & Industry when Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R) was inaugurated on Jan. 17.

A pioneer member of the USWA and head of his district since 1940, Hart has been president of the Allegheny County AFL-CIO since 1962 and a member of the State Labor Relations Board since 1965.

He is only the second trade unionist to hold the state cabinet post. His lone predecessor was the late Lewis G. Hines, an AFL and AFL-CIO representative who served under Gov. Arthur H. James (R) from 1939 to 1943.

Shafer also appointed three union officials to a nonpartisan tax study and revision commission charged with determining state revenue needs for the next fiscal year. They are USWA Pres. I. W. Abel, Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO and Pres. W. A. Boyle of the Mine Workers.

Archaism Triumphant

THE OPENING-OF-THE-SESSION battle over the Senate's filibuster rule ended with the Republican leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, in full command and with the two-thirds rule for closing off debate left unchanged.

He had a little help along the way from the Democratic leader, Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana, who argued vigorously against Vice Pres. Humphrey's ruling that a simple majority could table the point of order Dirksen had raised against a McGovern resolution to reduce the cloture majority required from two-thirds to three-fifths of senators present and voting.

Mansfield argued so vehemently, in fact, that the liberals seeking to modernize the Senate rules could rustle up only 36 votes for the motion to table Dirksen's point of order.

Mansfield himself then switched to support the substantive issue in the McGovern resolution—the reduction of the filibuster-killing majority required from two-thirds to three-fifths. Dirksen joined Mansfield in signing the cloture petition, but promptly announced that he was against any change in the rules whatsoever and would vote against cloture.

The Republican leader made this position stick. The vote for cloture was 53, the vote against it 46—far short of the two-thirds majority required, and short of even the three-fifths majority the McGovern resolution would have provided for.

So the Senate, which prides itself as the preeminent legislative body in the world, left itself stuck with an archaic debate-limitation rule making it impossible for it to function legislatively whenever a determined minority of one-third of the senators, plus one, decides not to let it function.

The bill under consideration may be a civil rights measure at one moment, or an arms control measure at another, or repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's Section 14 (b) at another. In the Senate, under its rules, the minority can prevail. Proponents of these measures, and others, are required to have not just a majority, even a substantial one, but a two-thirds majority.

THERE ISN'T any other legislative body in the world where the majority, having allowed full and free time for debate and public illumination, cannot work its will.

Dirksen himself had a pet project—a constitutional amendment to overturn or modify the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" decisions. The liberals did not filibuster him; they allowed his proposals to go to the floor and beat them on the floor, which is a different kettle of fish entirely.

The two-thirds cloture requirement has allowed the defeat of a few civil rights filibusters—mostly token filibusters—in the last decade. But ordinarily the two-thirds rule makes the breaking of a filibuster impossible. And Dirksen knows this as well as any man.

After 20 years the Senate hasn't faced up squarely to the need for a change in its rules. So the fight must go on at the beginning of each new Congress—perhaps for another 20 years, although that prospect is dismal and not to be welcomed—until at last the majority wins the right to debate the substantive issue and the Senate as a whole comes to terms with reality.

President Bids Congress Build On Social Security Foundations

Excerpts from Pres. Johnson's Message on Older Americans sent to Congress Jan. 23, 1967:

AMERICA IS a young nation. But each year a larger proportion of our population joins the ranks of the senior citizens. Today, over 19 million Americans are 65 or older—a number equal to the combined populations of 20 states: One out of every 10 citizens is in this age group—more than twice as many as a half-century ago.

These figures represent a national triumph. The American born in 1900 could expect to reach his 47th birthday. The American born today has a life expectancy of 70 years. Tomorrow, the miracles of man's knowledge will stretch the life span even farther.

These figures also represent a national challenge. One of the tests of a great civilization is the compassion and respect shown to its elders. Too many of our senior citizens have been left behind by the progress they worked most of their lives to create. Too often the wisdom and experience of our senior citizens is lost or ignored. Many who are able and willing to work suffer the bitter rebuff of arbitrary and unjust job discrimination.

In this busy and productive nation, the elderly are too frequently destined to lead empty, neglected lives:

- 5.3 million older Americans have yearly incomes below the poverty level.
- Only one out of five has a job, often at low wages.
- Only 2 million elderly citizens are on welfare.
- Nearly 40 percent of our single older citizens have total assets of less than $1,000.

Countless numbers dwell in city and rural slums, lonely and forgotten, isolated from the invigorating spirit of the American community. They suffer a disproportionate burden of bad housing, poor health facilities, inferior recreation and rehabilitation services.

The historic Social Security Act of 1935, sponsored by that great Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, first proclaimed a federal role in the task of creating a life of dignity for the older American. By 1951, the number of our senior citizens who had earned and received social security benefits exceeded the number on public welfare. Today, more than 15 million Americans over 65 draw social security, while only 2 million remain on the welfare rolls.

We in the Executive Branch and you in the Congress have extended the federal role in other ways:

- The last eight housing acts contain special public housing provisions for the elderly and special assistance for them when they rent, buy or modernize their own homes.
- The Hill-Burton hospital program seeks to expand and improve nursing homes and other long-term care facilities.
- Public Welfare provides programs to help restore older people to self-support and self-care.
- The Manpower Development and Training programs direct special efforts at the problems of the middle-aged and older American.
- The National Institutes of Health have established programs of research on aging.

In 1965, the Congress enacted and I signed into law two landmark measures for older Americans:

Medicare, to ease the burden of hospital and doctor bills.

The Older Americans Act, to develop community services to put more meaning into the lives of the senior citizens.

When he signed the 1935 Social Security Act, Pres. Franklin Roosevelt said, "This law . . . represents a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete." Pres. Truman in 1950 and Pres. Kennedy in 1961 proposed and the Congress passed legislation to improve the social security system.

The time has come to build on the solid foundations provided by the work of Congress and the Executive Branch over the last three decades. Last summer, I declared a Bill of Rights for Older Americans—to fix as our nation's goal an adequate income, a decent home, and a meaningful retirement for each senior citizen.

Now we must take steps to move closer toward that goal.

Let us raise social security benefits to a level which will better meet today's needs.

Let us improve and extend the health care available to the elderly.

Let us attack the roots of unjust job discrimination.

Let us renew and expand our programs to help bring fulfillment and meaning to retirement years.

Morgan Says:

Shock Waves Still Spreading From Reagan's Ouster of Kerr

By Edward P. Morgan

THE UNIVERSITY of California has had a "happening" but nobody can be happy about it except the far right and the far left.

By a vote of 14 to 8, the State Board of Regents, which controls policy in the biggest public system of higher education in the world, fired Pres. Clark Kerr. This was the equivalent, in the educational world, of the San Francisco earthquake. The shock waves are still being registered, far beyond the boundaries of the union's most populous state.

Morgan

At this juncture about the only conclusion that can be drawn with any certainty is that the prestige of the University of California, which embraces nine campuses with an enrollment of more than 87,000 students, has suffered a crushing blow.

Gov. Ronald Reagan has already been accused of striking that blow, making Kerr a hapless victim in the climax of a political offensive which Reagan himself started as a campaign issue by declaring that "something had to be done" about the university—or multiversity as Kerr christened it—about its education policies in general and the behavior on its mother campus—Berkeley—in particular.

Despite certain facts which tempt one to support the indictment, such an oversimplification does not do justice to the vastly complex and agonizing situation. The most gruesome thing about the spectacle is that the New Left and the Old Right have joined, in effect, in jubilating over damage that each, for different reasons, helped cause.

California has more than its share, perhaps, of right-wing extremists. They are, by and large, at war with society. A few would like to repeal the 20th Century. Several are rich, some are powerful. Many are convinced that the university system seethes with radicalism and that the Berkeley campus is the center of original sin. Even a couple of regents themselves espouse this passionate thinking.

So the issue, sadly enough, was ready-made, intensified spasmodically by student demonstrations at Berkeley and elsewhere, whether for sex and free speech or against the war in Vietnam. Reagan's campaign demands for an investigation sharpened the issue and when he beat Gov. Pat Brown it was obvious that something would have to give.

At least one prestigious member of the Board of Regents, it is learned, thought it might have to be Kerr himself and made the friendly suggestion his usefulness perhaps had been impaired by events. He chose, however, to stand and fight. Ironically, though his nine-year record in managing this educational colossus was admirable, Kerr's courageous championing of academic freedom had enraged the radical right as being, in effect, soft on communism, it also outraged the somewhat nihilistic leadership of the student New Left, as being the paternalistic voice of the Establishment.

On top of all this, Kerr, with all his administrative brilliance, seemed, partly because of his personal coolness, remote and aloof and thus unconvincing to many key protagonists in the many-faceted controversy.

REAGAN HAS NOT come off with Phi Beta Kappa honors in his first major struggle, which is only beginning. In his understandable desire to cut expenses, he has approached the higher education system as if it were a supermarket, which needed to take inventory, tidy up its shelves, reduce its overhead and increase the price of its leading item, in this case free tuition.

The latter is a valid point to debate but Reagan's economy moves all but ignored the huge increase in student bodies the California university and college systems face, and it is difficult to see what evaluation, if any, he puts on academic freedom or the prestige Kerr has built up by attracting professors, researchers and teachers of such excellence that California ranks with the top universities of the world.

Already that position has been eroded in a matter of days. Three of California's Nobel Prize winners deplore Kerr's dismissal as a hasty act, bringing politics into education and raising great doubts about the university's future.

The regents, in the manner and timing of firing Kerr, have made virtually impossible the next job: finding a suitable replacement. Top-flight candidates would hardly consider the appointment unless and until the miasma of the present circumstances is lifted. Indeed an exodus of talent from the university faculty may now be expected.

A multiversity the size of California poses special problems to keep it in the public interest. Reagan recently said the "university has to come to terms with the world of reality." So does he and he may need some more homework before he passes the test.

GOP Plan Hit:

Poverty Among Aged Points Up Need for Social Security Raise

THE REPUBLICAN PROPOSAL for an 8 percent increase in social security retirement benefits is "entirely inadequate," the AFL-CIO's director of social security declared in a radio interview.

Bert Seidman said the AFL-CIO considers the 20 percent average benefits improvement urged by Pres. Johnson "a substantial increase." The AFL-CIO's long range goal, he said, is for a 50 percent increase in benefits, and he called the Administration proposal "a down payment" on that goal.

Seidman pointed out that 5 million elderly Americans are now below what the Social Security Administration has established as its "poverty levels" of income—$1,500 a year for a single person and $1,850 for a couple—and it is only social security benefits "that keep an additional 5.5 million people out of poverty."

"It takes Congress so long to get around to raising social security benefits" that they are "always lagging behind the cost of living . . . and even further behind the general increase of incomes in the country," he said. Some elderly people have other income to "fall back on," but more often the are "forced to turn to public assistance, private charity or their relatives in order just to eke out a bare minimum living," he added. His statements came during Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual radio network.

SEIDMAN URGED that social security retirement benefits be adjusted to improvements in the general standard of living—not just increased living costs.

This, he said, would allow America's elderly not only to "keep pace with the cost of living," but to "enjoy the same increases in living standards after they retire that the rest of the population enjoys."

Reporters questioning him were James Deakin of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Al Goldsmith, editor and publisher of the Washington Insurance Newsletter.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE PRESIDENT'S Budget Message and Economic Message, taken together, say that we cannot expect any further reduction in joblessness beneath the 3.9 percent average in 1966 but that the country's economy can easily support the Vietnamese war, an increase in expenditures for the poverty program and educational programs, and a 20 percent increase in social security benefits.

All this depends, in a budget-balancing sense, upon the willingness of Congress to approve Mr. Johnson's proposals for a 1-cent increase in first class mail rates and a 6 percent surtax on individual and corporate income taxes, plus increases in both the tax rate and the income base from which social security is financed.

The general observation can be made that the President hasn't left much room for maneuver to his tactical political opponents, the Republicans in Congress.

They can say, as they have said, that we should push the war harder and "bring the boys home," but since they have no responsibility for whatever might go wrong with this dictum it must be taken as a partisan oversimplification.

They can say, as they have said, that the anti-poverty program is a troublesome one, particularly in regard to its requirement for genuine participation by the communities involved. But that is the way Congress wrote the law—and besides it is basically right. A project to lift a ghetto above the level of the ghettos needs the active involvement of the comunity's natural leaders.

A fact must be recognized about our economy—it is so strong, so productive, that great enterprises can be undertaken from the tax base it provides. The profits of industry are so large, the taxes from individuals so substantial, that the American people have simply outmoded the idea that a $100 billion budget might be excessive.

The national debt is important as a gross figure only in relationship to the Gross National Product; the interest rate payable as a result of general fiscal policies is far more important, and it has been steadily going up.

The overwhelming proportion of federal expenditures is encompassed in national defense (including Viet Nam), interest on the debt, the space program, obligatory payments to veterans, the deficit in the Post Office Dept. Only a minor segment is designated for all other functions of the federal government, including so-called Great Society programs.

THE FACT REMAINS that a considerable attack must be expected from the strengthened Republican delegation in the House on appropriations for almost all of the President's domestic programs.

In the GOP's so-called State of the Union reply to Mr. Johnson's formal message. House Leader Gerald R. Ford's comments on domestic affairs struck few affirmative notes.

The 7 percent investment tax credit, which helped overheat the economy last year, should nevertheless be "immediately" restored, he said. "Low-priority" domestic programs must be postponed, billions voted in previous years should be reclaimed by a recission bill, there should be a "thorough airing of poverty administration, poverty publicity and poverty politics," he added.

The increase in social security benefits should be 8 percent—not 20 percent, as the President urges—and this "can be achieved without any tax increase," said Ford. The school-aid program should be revised to "eliminate the heavy-handed federal intrusions."

There is nothing in all this that differs from the kind of Republican approach familiar through many years—that differs from the kind of speech that might have been made, for example, by former GOP House Leader Charles A. Halleck. It is excellent to have proposals for private investment in urban renewal and expanded job training—if the private investors can be induced to participate.

The treatment of federal activity and spending as dangerous comes through clearly. What doesn't come through is a recognition of the abounding strength and vitality of our economy.

How to Buy:

Loan Firms' High Credit Fees Hit Those Least Able to Pay

HIGHEST FEES for credit are those charged by licensed small loan companies. The people who pay them are those who can least afford high rates—often people already with debt troubles or medical bills.

The rates are fixed by various state laws at 2 to 3.5 percent a month—the equivalent of true annual interest of 24 to 42 percent. Most typical rate is 3 percent a month on loans ranging from $150 to $300 in different states.

For example in Illinois the borrower pays 3 percent a month on the first $150 of a loan, 2 on the next $150, and 1 percent between $300 and $800. In Michigan, the rate is 2.5 percent to $300, and 1.25 from $300 to $1,000.

As though such rates were not high enough, some states permit the higher rate to continue on the lower part of the loan while the borrowers' payments first pay off that part bearing the lowest interest rate. Thus, in Michigan, if a man borrows $600 from a loan company, his payments first go towards the $300 bearing interest at 1.25 percent, while the interest continues at 2.5 percent on the bottom $300.

One of several fallacies is that such borrowers lack collateral. The fact is that loan companies usually do seek collateral. In Akron, for example, "although many small-loan company advertisements speak of 'signature' loans, all those visited wanted security such as a car or furniture," Ronald Karg reported in a survey for the Rubber Workers.

Loan companies have been campaigning at state capitals with noticeable success to increase the amounts they are permitted to lend. In general they recently have traded a small reduction on the initial part of a loan for the privilege of raising the maximums they can lend to—for example—$1,000 in Michigan instead of $500; $1,000 in Connecticut from $600; $1,000 in Indiana from $500; $800 in West Virginia from $300, etc.

Another indication that legal small-loan rates are needlessly high is that in Canada some of the same loan companies are able to survive under a maximum of 2 percent a month on the first $300; 1 percent on the next $700, and one-half of 1 percent on the next $500, compared to 2.5 to 3.5 percent on the first few hundred in most of the U.S. (Two percent a month is still 24 percent a year.)

Small-loan companies maintain active lobbies at state capitals in addition to their national associations which are fighting the "truth in lending" bill.

In one recent instance they were charged with being a little too active, and in an illegal way. A Superior Court jury in Massachusetts convicted three loan companies, six public relations employes and an executive vice president, on charges that they attempted in 1962-63 to bribe two members of the State Regulatory Board to forestall a proposed rate reduction.

Ironically, one of the public relations men is a member of a committee of lenders and retailers working with community agencies to develop counseling services for over-extended debtors.

LOAN COMPANIES exert heavy sales pressure to get people to take out consolidation loans at high fees to pay other debts, which may have lower carrying charges. A number now solicit by mail, including Dial Finance from Iowa; Fairfax Family Fund, Kentucky, and Executive Loan Service in Minnesota, which offers a "Prestige Plan" for big debtors.

Fairfax, one of the most active, is owned by Spiegel's mail-order house, which in turn is owned by Beneficial Finance Co., one of the largest loan companies.

Canada, too, has its loans by mail. Citizens Finance Co. of Ontario offers a "personal credit account." "You pay nothing to establish this account . . . nothing on the unused balance." This sounds as though they were setting up a bank account for you. But all it really means is that the loan company charges you nothing for nothing. Once you "withdraw cash," as they put it, you start paying. For example, for $507 you repay $22 a month for 30 months, or a total of $660.

One of the problems borrowers ultimately may face in loans-by-mail is that the agreement says it is subject to the laws of the loan-company's state, not yours, and "is subject to acceptance by — at its office." In the event of a court action, you might have to travel to the loan company's state to tell your side.

Paid and Unpaid:

U.S. Living Standard Laid to 'Hard Work'

THE UNITED STATES has its high standard of living today in part because its people are hard-working, ambitious, and progressive, according to the University of Michigan's Social Research Center.

Americans do economically productive work both for money and without payment, SRC researchers say in a new study titled "Productive Americans" published by the UM Institute for Social Research.

In fact, the authors say, measuring the upaid work done by Americans would raise estimates of the country's output by more than a third. This includes do-it-yourself projects, volunteer and charity work, taking special education courses and the like.

The findings are based on a representative national sample of families interviewed early in 1965 in the United States. But the study was designed to provide a background against which comparisons can be made with other countries or with the U.S. a decade from now.

An international conference of social scientists, supported as was the study by the Carnegie Corp., helped design the study for this purpose.

The American family was found to be "receptive to change and progress, generally hard-working, and interested in the new things that can be bought with the rewards for that hard work."

Formal education is cited as "the most powerful force by which the cumulative cycle of progress, hard work, and further progress continues."

It would seem that current proposals for greater "investment in human capital," through support for more and better education, are justified for their effects on people's attitudes and unpaid actions as well as their effects on people's productivity on the job, the report states.

AMONG THE TOPICS studied are the hours of work family heads and their wives do for money, the time they spend getting to work and back, the time they were hampered by illness or unemployment, and the time spent doing the housework or other unpaid but productive activities.

But progressive behavior involves more than hard work, so the study turns next to use of new products, receptivity to modern science, receptivity to change on the job, planning ahead, moving to new places or jobs, ambition, risk avoidance, social participation, and a few indicators of resistance to change such as dislike of mothers' working or desire to maintain strong family ties.

A new approach to presenting findings reduces the uninteresting detail and focuses on the things that matter. But for those who need the detail, the distribution of answers to every question is given in an appendix, together with descriptions of methods and a detailed index.

The book should interest those concerned with economic progress generally, as well as social scientists interested in achievement motivation, labor force participation, or the market for new products.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Next Week Will Be Different, But Then We Always Say That

By Jane Goodsell

MONDAY IS A DAY of low expectations. If you stay in bed too long after the alarm goes off, if the eggs are overcooked and the coffee weak, that's just about what you figured Monday would be like. If anything good happens—if you make a green light or find a parking space, if the knot in your shoelace comes loose when you yank it—you are pleasantly surprised.

Tuesday is a day for moving out of low gear and revving up. It is a day for making lists and laying plans for the week ahead. If you are a woman, Tuesday is the day to make a hair appointment, to pick up the clothes at the dry cleaners, to remember to buy shelf paper. If you happen to be a man, Tuesday is the day to expedite orders, to clear out your IN basket.

By Wednesday, the week has taken shape, and it is now apparent that this one is not, after all, going to be as productive as you'd hoped. Somehow you didn't get around to doing all the things you'd planned to do on Tuesday. But there is still time and you can catch up.

By Thursday the week is so far gone that you no longer expect to perform miracles. What with one thing and another, you have abandoned the idea of the party, but you do manage to get a couple of letters written. The contents of the IN and OUT baskets are about equal and you feel a slight sense of accomplishment.

FRIDAY is the day when tomorrow is Saturday, which is cheering enough to make anyone feel better. Friday is too late to start any new projects but next week your strength will be as the strength of 10 and you will move mountains.

Saturday is the day men plan to play golf or go fishing or to watch a ball game on TV. It is the day men's wives expect them to put up curtain rods and clean out the garage. The kids plan to sleep all morning or go skiing, while their mothers expect them to clean up their rooms, their fathers expect them to wash the car. Saturday has the same number of hours as any other day. It should be twice as long.

Sunday, on the contrary, should be cut in half. By afternoon, nobody can think of anything to do and it is too late to organize a picnic or go to the movies. The Sunday papers are strewn all over the living room, and the TV is on but nobody is watching. Lethargy hangs heavy in the air and tomorrow is inescapably Monday.

LBJ Appoints Davis To Education Panel

AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to a seven-member National Advisory Committee on Adult Basic Education which will advise U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe on guidelines for adult education programs. His term expires June 30, 1969.

The newly established committee will hold its first meeting in about a month, with Howe as chairman. Besides advising Howe on policy matters it will review the administration and effectiveness of federally supported basic adult education programs, and make recommendations in an annual report of its findings.

L. A. Social Workers Win Ruling on Strike

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO social workers here won a major court victory leaving their right to strike intact and awarding them an estimated $250,000 in fringe benefits lost because of a 1966 walkout.

The decision came on a petition by Social Workers Local 535, a Building Service Employes affiliate, charging Los Angeles County officials with reprisals against nearly 2,000 strikers after a 17-day work stoppage last June.

Superior Court Judge Bernard S. Jefferson turned aside the county's claim that the strike was illegal, saying California law was unclear on the issue.

He also held that county officials, in a letter to the union seeking a truce meeting, had made promises not to retaliate against the strikers—promises the union said were broken when hiring anniversary dates were changed, resulting in sharp losses in sick pay, vacation pay and seniority governing wage increases.

Local 535 struck the county welfare system in a dispute over wages, a demand for collective bargaining and other working conditions.

Although Judge Jefferson did not heed the union's plea for court-directed collective bargaining, he said:

"There is a changing climate in the matter of the place of unions in the field of employer-employe relations as it relates to governmental employment . . . Agreements between governmental bodies and their employes . . . will undoubtedly be specifically authorized by governing bodies . . . in the not too far distant future."

On the reprisal issue, the court set aside a county rule, as applied to the social workers' strike, which declares that an unauthorized absence from work of more than three consecutive days is a "break in service."

Testimony indicated similar breaks in service at times were okayed by lower echelon administrators.

One woman member of Local 535 had testified the county's action against strikers would deprive her of $4,000 in sick and vacation pay.

ACWA Wins Hikes In Puerto Rican Pact

Aguadilla, P.R.—Wage increases, overtime pay and seniority protection were among benefits won by the Clothing Workers for 150 new union members at the Wilrico, Inc. plant here, a subsidiary of the Wilson Sporting Goods Co. The union won bargaining rights last November by 105-17 after losing a year earlier.

Picket Line Leads Teachers to Altar

Chicago — Romance blossomed on a teachers' picket line last March and culminated in marriage here Jan. 9 just as another strike was averted.

When Chicago teachers won a contract and called off their strike plans, Sec. Joanne Marco of the AFT local in Calumet City, Ill., and Robert Lieberman, AFT publicist, were married in St. Mary's Church in nearby Riverdale. The couple met when Lieberman was assigned to help publicize a teachers' strike last year in Calumet City's Thornton Fractional School District.

Burklund Named To SCME Board

Earl S. Burklund, a Moline, Ill. policeman, was elected a vice president of the State, County & Municipal Employes at a meeting of the international executive board in Washington.

He succeeds Charles Hungate, Manteno, Ill., who resigned for reasons of health. Burklund will represent SCME members in Illinois and Indiana on the executive board. He is a former president of Law Enforcement Officers Local 1022 and is president of the Illinois Council of County & Municipal Employes.

CWA Backs President In Call for Wiretap Ban

All forms of eavesdropping, wiretapping and telephone monitoring that constitute an invasion of privacy must be stopped except when national security is involved—"and even this one exemption must be closely guarded," the Communications Workers executive board declared in a resolution passed at a special meeting in Washington.

"In our free society, the ends of law enforcement do not justify any and all means," the board said. "Even if crime could in a degree be prevented, we should not choose the use of these ends.

"The case for continuation of wiretapping, eavesdropping and telephone monitoring is so weak, and the irreparable injury to our freedoms is so serious and certain, that there is no justification for such authority."

The executive board warmly commended the call of Pres. Johnson in his State of the Union Message for the outlawing of public and private wiretapping except in cases involving national security.

"We urge the 90th Congress to revise the applicable statutes to protect what Mr. Justice Brandeis called the 'right most valued by civilized men—the right to privacy.'"

The CWA board cited the telephone as "the major instrument of social intercourse" and noted that it provides "instantaneous, direct spontaneous and ostensibly private communication."

"We recognize that it is a fact of life that criminals make extensive use of the telephone system," the union leaders added.

"We do not admit, however, that it logically follows that broad permissive wiretapping and eavesdropping is a necessary aid to law enforcement."

The resolution called telephone monitoring "a clash between a practice long excused in the name of efficiency and the long historically-recognized right to privacy."

"We are dealing with a situation involving basic constitutional rights and one which should be strictly construed in favor of the individual," it added. "We find that telephonic efficiency pertaining to business and commercial transactions is not a higher right to which we should sacrifice our privacy."

Social Security Plan Called Good Start

Meany Hails Johnson Proposal For 20% Average Benefit Hike

Meany said the President's program will be studied in depth by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting in February and a detailed statement made public at that time.

Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens welcomed the President's proposals as a "vital first step" toward realization of the goal of adequate benefits. He warned, however, that to lift minimum benefits substantially above today's "shocking" levels, "the elderly, their families and their friends face a tough, uphill fight" in Congress.

In his wide-ranging message to Congress on older Americans, Johnson noted that nearly 2.5 million individuals receive retirement benefits based on the minimum of $44 a month, which would mean $66 for a couple, and that the average benefit is only $84, or $126 for a couple.

"Although social security benefits keep 5.5 million aged person above the poverty line, more than 5 million still live in poverty," the message said. "A great nation cannot tolerate these conditions." (Excerpts on Page 6.)

The President's specific proposals called for:

Rise in Minimums

- "An increase of 59 percent for the 2.5 million people now receiving minimum benefits—to $70 for an individual and $105 for a married couple.
- "An increase of at least 15 percent for the remaining 20.5 million beneficiaries.
- "An increase to $150 in the monthly minimum benefit for a retired couple with 25 years of coverage—to $100 a month for an individual.
- "An increase in the special benefits paid to more than 900,000 persons 72 or over, who have made little or no social security contribution—from $35 to $50 monthly for an individual; from $52.50 to $75 for a couple.
- "Special benefits for an additional 200,000 persons 72 or over, who have never received benefits before."

The President estimated the cost of the additional payments at $4.1 billion the first year and said they would lift 1.4 million persons "out of poverty this year—a major step toward our goal that every elderly citizen have an adequate income and a meaningful retirement."

He asked that the improved benefits be made effective next July 1.

To eliminate specific inequities and close loopholes in the present law, he also recommended that:

- Social security benefits be extended to severely disabled widows under 62 who now have no protection.
- The earnings exemption, or the amount a retiree can earn without having his benefits cut, be increased by 12 percent—from $125 to $140 a month or $1,500 to $1,680 annually.
- The amount above the $1,680 up to which a beneficiary can retain $1 in payments for every $2 in earnings be increased from $2,700 to $2,880 a year.
- Social security coverage be extended to an additional half-million farm workers.
- Federal service be applied as social security credit for those government employes who are not eligible for civil service benefits when they retire, become disabled or die.

The President pointed out that the limits on what a retired worker can earn and still retain his benefits are "so low" they discourage those able and willing to work from hunting jobs.

He pointed out that some farm workers do not qualify for any benefits and others only for the minimum, with the result that many must go on the welfare rolls in their old age.

Some Are Barred

He noted also that federal employes in the civil service and foreign service retirement systems are barred from social security coverage and that those with less than five years' service get no benefits if they die, become disabled or leave their U.S. jobs. Those who leave after longer service lose disability and survivor protection, he said.

To keep the social security funds actuarially sound, Johnson proposed:

- A three-step increase in the amount of annual earnings on which social security taxes are levied — to $7,800 in 1968, to $9,000 in 1971 and to $10,800 in 1974. The present maximum is $6,600, and no future increase is on the statute books.
- An increase in the social security tax rate from the present 3.9 percent (plus one-half of 1 percent for medicare) to 4.5 percent in 1969 instead of 4.4 percent as in the present law, and to 5 percent in 1973 instead of 4.85 percent.

In addition to retirement benefit improvements the message proposed a broad program of legislation to meet other needs of the aged. It included:

Public Assistance: Requiring state welfare agencies to give welfare recipients cash payments that at least meet the state's own minimum standards for subsistence, to update the standards annually and set them at no less than two-thirds the medical assistance level; and to establish a work-incentive program for old-age assistance recipients.

Medicare: Extension of medicare to the 1.5 million disabled under 65 now covered by the Social Security and Railroad Retirement Systems and coverage of foot treatment other than routine care.

The President also announced that he had ordered "a comprehensive study of the problems of including the cost of prescription drugs under medicare."

Discrimination: A law prohibiting "arbitrary and unjust" job bias because of age, covering workers 45 to 65 years old, including conciliation and court enforcement if necessary. Exceptions would apply where age is a "reasonable occupational qualification," where discharge is for good cause or where an employe is separated under a regular retirement system.

Taxes: A complete overhaul of the tax structure for elders to make it simpler and fairer and to end existing tax discrimination against senior citizens who are willing and able to work.

Exemption Change

The present basic income tax exemption of $600 and the additional $600 exemption at age 65 would be eliminated. Instead, there would be a special exemption of $2,300 for a single person or $4,000 for a married couple over 65. Any single person earning less than $3,200 and any couple earning less than $5,800 would be completely exempt from taxes.

Social security benefits, now entirely exempt from taxation, would be taxed with one-third of the total exempt. Taxes paid by persons in the higher income brackets would rise slightly.

Nursing and Health Care: Assistance to states and communities in health planning for the elderly, special pilot projects to bring comprehensive medical and rehabilitation services to the aged, expansion of visiting nurse and other home health services, and research to determine the best way of organizing, delivering and financing health services needed by the elderly.

Johnson in addition said he was requesting funds for more health facilities and better health care institutions for the aged, including full authorization of $280 million for Hill-Burton Act construction to provide new hospital beds and to modernize existing facilities.

The Older Americans Act: Amendments to increase the services and facilities available to the elderly, including housing, and expansion of programs aimed at utilizing older citizens in such volunteer programs as Head Start and VISTA.

The Republicans have proposed an 8 percent increase in social security benefits with no increase in social security taxes.

Patman Lauds Record Of Consumer Co-ops

New York—Dedicated and organized consumer action groups are coming into their own and can "counterbalance" the resources of special interest lobbyists, Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Banking Committee, told the first New York Consumer Assembly.

He commended cooperatives for their work in housing and said that "the basic principles of self-control, responsibility and self-help employed in cooperatives are in part responsible for this fine record."

Patman spoke at a luncheon which highlighted the one-day meeting called by the United Housing Federation, labor-supported builders of cooperative housing in New York City.

Co-sponsors included the Clothing Workers, locals of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Building Service Employes, Operating Engineers, Retail-Wholesale Union, Teachers, Hatters, the New York City AFL-CIO and the Metropolitan New York Consumer Council. More than 900 representatives of 44 organizations attended.

Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) of New York City told the meeting that his administration will give greater attention to consumer problems and pledged that the heads of various city departments will work with consumer groups to protect the unprotected.

Executive Vice Pres. Harold Ostroff of the United Housing Foundation, who also is president of the National Association of Housing Cooperatives, urged a commitment to the construction of housing people can afford.

"In planning and creating a better city," he said, "the elimination of ghettos, both racial and economic, deserves the highest priority."

The "expensive rehabilitation of slums" by itself will not make available open space for gardens, walks, playgrounds and sitting areas, he said. Only by thinking in new terms and creating new city patterns will space for community life become available, he added.

Author Speaks

Martin L. Gross, author of "The Doctors," was the main speaker before a panel that sought answers to the query, "Are Consumers Getting Their Money's Worth of Medical Care?"

His answer was: "Alas, too often they are not."

Good medical care is available, he explained, but it is spread thin while "insufficient and incompetent" care is common.

Doctors get poor education and "meager and unsupervised" intern and resident training, he charged in urging the establishment of a medical supervisory group to evaluate the quality of doctor and hospital care and set standards for both.

The delegates recommended that the assembly take on a continuing consumer protection role and called for greater struggle for fair prices, for consumer protections and for sound consumer legislation.

They also adopted a strong resolution calling for the strengthening of the office of Mrs. Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's consumer adviser.

Biggest Jump in Decade:

'66 Living Cost Rise Outstrips Wage Gain

The cost of living in 1966 took its greatest rise in a decade and cut down real spendable earnings of factory workers for the first time since 1960, the Labor Dept. reported.

But Commissioner of Labor Statistics Arthur M. Ross predicted that a slowing down of the rise in the Consumer Price Index over the last quarter of 1966 will continue into 1967 and that the increase for the full year "might be as much as 2.5 percent" compared with 3.3 percent last year.

The CPI reached a year-end level of 114.7 in December compared with 111 in December 1965—the largest annual rise since 1957.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics showed in a separate report that the real spendable earnings of a worker with no dependents averaged $80.86 a week during the year compared with $81.06 in 1965. For a worker with three dependents, the drop was from $88.06 in 1965 to $87.82 last year—in both cases a loss of about three-tenths of 1 percent. Real spendable earnings represent purchasing power after deduction of social security and income taxes and adjustment for changes in the CPI.

In December gross average weekly earnings were $114.68, compared with $113.99 in November and $110.92 in December 1965. Net "spendable" earnings, or take-home pay, edged up to $93.35 for the workers with no dependents and $101.31 with three dependents from $92.82 and $100.76 in November and from $91.80 and $99.92 in December 1956.

'Real' Earnings Off

"Real" spendable earnings, for the worker without dependents, dropped from $82.70 in December 1965 to $81.39 in December 1966 after registering $80.99 in November. For the worker with three dependents, the figures were $88.33 in December, $89.75 in December 1965 and $87.92 in November.

The one-tenth of 1 percent rise in the CPI for December, following a similar increase in November was regarded as continuation of the easing of inflationary pressures registered earlier last year.

Food prices, Ross said, should rise by about 2 percent this year compared with 3.8 percent last year, with prices for beef and dairy products continuing to go up but those for pork, poultry and eggs going down.

He said the price of housing will be "significantly" higher though interest rates—up 13.8 percent in 1966—should drop. Furniture and apparel costs each should rise about 2 percent, he went on, with little change in auto prices during the rest of the model year.

Higher charges for consumer services were responsible for about half the CPI rise in 1966, the BLS said, with an 8 percent jump in medical care services and other elements except rents increasing from 4.5 to 5.5 percent.

Food prices went up sharply early in the year, stabilized in the second quarter, went up again in the third quarter and down again in the fourth to average about 3.8 percent above a year ago.

The CPI rise in December was due to higher mortgage interest rates, reflecting the "tight money" situation; greater costs for home repairs and maintenance, and higher price tags on clothing, the BLS said.

Food prices averaged two-tenths of 1 percent lower than in November, reflecting price cuts in pork, dairy products and fresh fruits. Lettuce, due to large supplies, dropped more than 20 percent, but eggs and some fresh vegetables, notably tomatoes and cabbages, rose in price due to curtailed winter supplies.

The December CPI brought cost-of-living wage increases to about 71,000 workers. Some 60,000 employes, mostly in the aircraft industry, got 1 cent an hour based on the change since September. The rest got 2 cents.

Pamphlet Reprints Capitalism Speech

Labor Looks at Capitalism, a pamphlet edition of the speech AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made at the 50th anniversary world convocation of the National Industrial Conference Board in New York last September, has been published by the AFL-CIO.

The pamphlet spells out the role of the AFL-CIO within a system that, Meany stresses, puts emphasis "on people, on freedom, on free institutions and on the opportunity for betterment." Copies may be had at 10 cents each or $7.50 per 100 from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Renewal Urged Of Appalachia Regional Aid

Pres. Johnson asked Congress to extend the Appalachian regional development program, declaring it has brought "new hope" to 18 million people living in the 12-state region.

The President praised the "partnership" of the states and the federal government in the Appalachian Regional Commission, declaring: "Let us continue that partnership for there is still much to be done to bring into Appalachia a full share of America's prosperity."

The program has strong bipartisan support and Congress is expected to renew its authorization with little controversy.

In a letter to the presiding officers of the House and Senate, Johnson cited construction of 51 hospitals and 52 vocational schools under the program, with work under way on 790 miles of highway development.

In addition, he noted, "new libraries, airports, college classrooms and water resource projects are being pursued to completion" and "thousands of workers have been trained, hired and added to the payrolls."

The President said that his forthcoming proposal for merger of the Departments of Commerce and Labor will include a recommendation that regional economic development programs be coordinated through the new department.

Campbell Unit Ratifies First Pact

Paris, Tex.—A first contract providing a 5 percent wage increase and other features of pacts with other units of the chain was ratified by Packinghouse Workers employed at the Campbell Soup Co. here.

Farm Workers' Skits Dramatize Pay Plight

Delano, Calif.—AFL-CIO farm workers demonstrated their need for a living wage in dramatic form before a board of arbitration and DiGiorgio Corp. officials during arbitration hearings here.

The union workers presented more than 100 exhibits demonstrating their plight and then drove the point home during a hearing recess. Members of Teatro Campesino—the Farm Worker Theater—acted the role of improverished agricultural hands from real life, in a skit they wrote themselves.

The worker-actors, led by Luis Valdez, were warmly applauded by their audience, which included members of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, who won bargaining rights for more than 5,000 DiGiorgio workers last August and November at the giant firm's Delano, Arvin and Borrego Springs ranches.

The actors won't get the final verdict on their performance until late March or early April, when Arbiters Ronald Houghton and Sam Kagel rule on issues left unsettled in negotiations. Included are wages, overtime, unemployment compensation, a health and welfare fund, insurance protection, travel time, pensions and vacations.

UFWOC bargainers came to terms with DiGiorgio management earlier on union security, grievance procedure, dues deduction and other contract details now in effect.

Talented Field Hands

Valdez' little-theater actors are all members of the Latin American community and most have worked as field hands all their lives.

"They have immense talent," said AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher. "Their take-off of characters in the life of a farm worker can really break up an audience."

Assistant AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Irwin L. DeShetler was in the audience. A favorite presentation by the troupe portrays the farm worker who, as summer walks across the stage, encounters a ranch official draped with dollar bills and stuffs them into his pocket all during the harvest season. As he stuffs, an actor dressed to represent an agricultural agent takes the bills away and, when summer ends, the campesino finds himself with empty pockets.

The arbitration hearings were conducted over a three-day period. During one recess, UFWOC leaders took all interested visitors to the free clinic that serves the medical and dental needs of Delano ranch workers without charge, thanks to the donated services of volunteers.

Another free service, acknowledged with thanks by the union, was that of the Building Service Employes, Bay District Joint Council, whose research and negotiating service director, Richard Liebes, summarized the case for the UFWOC, whose own representatives also participated—Cesar Chavez, Larry Itliong and Dolores Huerta.

The committee is aiming at more elections in the spring at two other fruit orchards in the Marysville, Calif. area, Kircher said.

Wage Floor Hikes Pump $1 Billion into Economy

An additional billion dollars in purchasing power will be pumped into the economy in the 12 months beginning Feb. 1 as new minimum wages go into effect under labor-backed 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Sharing it will be an estimated 5 million workers at the lowest end of the pay scale. Some of them will benefit from a rise in the basic wage floor from $1.25 to $1.40 an hour for those already covered by the act, but most of them will come from the ranks of 8 million workers protected for the first time with a minimum of $1 an hour.

The minimum for workers already covered by the act goes to $1.60 an hour on Feb. 1, 1968—a step toward the AFL-CIO's goal of $2. On the same date the pay floor for the newly-covered workers will rise to $1.15 an hour and an additional 1 million now unprotected will be covered by the act for the first time. Minimums for the newly-covered will rise to the $1.60 level in steps—to $1.30 on Feb. 1, 1969; to $1.45 a year later and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1971.

The workers covered this year for the first time include more than 1.5 million employes of retail establishments with gross annual business of $500,000 to $1 million, the present limit. The 1 million additional workers who will come under coverage of the act for the first time in 1969 will be employes of retail businesses with volume of $250,000 to $500,000.

Workers already protected will continue to be paid time and a half for overtime after 40 hours. The premium rate must be paid to the newly covered after 44 hours a week; after 42 hours beginning Feb. 1, 1968 and after 40 hours a year later.

AFL-CIO goals, in addition to the $2 minimum, include universal coverage as one of the major weapons in the war on poverty, double time for overtime, and the 35-hour week.

D.C. Building Trades Spur Apprentice Drive

Representatives of four building trades unions and 170 counselors from elementary and secondary schools in the District of Columbia took part in the second annual "Careers through Apprenticeship" conference sponsored by the D.C. Apprenticeship Council and the D.C. Board of Education.

Counselors attended workshops where members of the unions' joint apprenticeship committees explained requirements and advantages of careers in the skilled trades. Members represented Plumbers Local 5, Steamfitters Local 602, the Carpenters District Council and Local 126 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Dir. Hugh Murphy of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training and School Supt. Carl F. Hansen urged the counselors to include more apprenticeship information as a part of their services to students.

The union representatives announced their willingness to visit the schools with more information, with Dir. Edward B. LaCovey of the D.C. Apprenticeship Information Center coordinating the trips.

Enforcement Drive Opens As Wage Floor Is Boosted

80,000 Win 15% Hike in Dress Pact

New York—Two-step wage increases totaling 15 percent were won by the Ladies' Garment Workers for 80,000 dressmakers employed by members of five groups of manufacturers in an eight-state area.

A new three-year agreement will provide a 9 percent wage hike effective Feb. 20 and an additional 6 percent raise a year later, substantial boosts in wage minimums, an additional paid holiday, and strengthening of contract language governing work on imported garments.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg, reporting the settlement at a union executive board meeting in Miami Beach, called it the best in ILGWU history and one setting new high wage standards for ladies' garment workers in the United States.

Stulberg said the new pact sets a pattern for negotiations involving 10,000 New York embroidery workers and will also affect talks for 10,000 children's wear makers. In coming months, he said, it will serve as a guide for 200,000 workers in the cloak, sportswear and knitgoods industries.

The new agreement covers 40,000 workers here and an additional 40,000 employed elsewhere in the state and in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Delaware and Maryland.

Laborers Map Pension Portability

The Laborers have moved to set up what may be the largest portable pension program in the nation with ultimate protection for more than 400,000 construction laborers throughout the union's jurisdiction in the United States and Canada.

Basically, it would permit a laborer to move from one geographical area to another without losing his pension benefits or protection. Where provisions of individual funds differ, the union said in a statement, pensions will be tailored to fit each beneficiary.

The Laborers' general executive board has approved a reciprocity form which each local pension fund will sign and file with the international union.

About 100 pension plans have been set up by locals or district

WHITE HOUSE CEREMONY marking the Feb. 1 increase in the minimum wage and expansion of coverage was addressed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan. At his side are Pres. Johnson and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. Keenan said the higher minimums will benefit both the poor and businessmen who will benefit from the additional billion dollars in consumer buying power.

At White House Ceremony:

Johnson Hails Labor For Wage Law Role

Pres. Johnson paid tribute to labor's leadership in the fight for a higher minimum wage at a White House ceremony marking the inauguration of a $1.40 wage floor for 32 million workers already under the Fair Labor Standards Act and the inclusion of additional groups of workers under the law.

Most organized workers are not directly affected by the federal minimum, the President noted, because collective bargaining has brought them higher pay.

Nevertheless, he said, "union after union and leader after leader in the workers' movement in this country have spent time to see that their . . . fellow workers had the benefits of this legislation."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, speaking for the trade union movement, told the White House gathering that the billion dollars in added purchasing power resulting from the higher minimum will be a big boost to the entire economy.

"Not only workers who have been in the poverty class will benefit," Keenan said, "but the business community will also reap its full share in growing sales."

He termed the new law "an outstanding victory for Pres. Johnson, who fought hard for this measure, for millions of Americans whose lives are certain to be brightened, and for America itself, which has scored a major victory in this war on poverty."

Johnson told the gathering that as a young congressman he was brought into the campaign to pass the first minimum wage law by David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers and other union leaders.

The payroll increase resulting from the latest amendments will go "where it is needed most," the President said, and will bring "minimum wages closer in line with minimum decencies."

While there may be some "very small increases in prices," he said, "the American people will accept

Meany Issues Call To Central Bodies

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO opened a nationwide drive for vigorous enforcement of the new wage-hour law and set up machinery to help all workers—union members or not—who are shortchanged by chiseling employers.

Federation Pres. George Meany outlined labor's enforcement program in a letter to Pres. Johnson and in letters to all AFL-CIO state and local central bodies.

The program calls for each central body to set up machinery to receive and help process complaints of wage law violations from all workers in its area—including employes of unorganized shops and businesses.

The unorganized now "have no place to go," Meany said. "I hope each central body becomes such a place."

In his letter to Johnson, Meany termed the addition of more than 9 million workers to coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act and the increase in the wage floor "by far the greatest single victory up to now in the war against poverty in America."

He noted that nearly 5 million workers were scheduled to receive pay raises Feb. 1 to bring those already covered by FLSA to a $1.40 minimum and to guarantee newly-covered workers $1 an hour. The direct impact of raising the wage floor will add $1 billion to the purchasing power of those in greatest need.

"Only one circumstance could prevent this memorable legislative advance from fulfilling our hopes, and that is widespread violation of its terms," Meany wrote the President.

He stressed that "a law is only as good as its enforcement, and in this instance enforcement poses a special problem."

Meany pointed out that last year

LBJ Urges Attack on Pollution

By Gervase N. Love

A vigorous attack on air pollution, in which the states, cities and private industry would join the federal government, was urged by Pres. Johnson in a message to Congress on "Protecting Our National Heritage."

The President recounted the steps taken under clean-air legislation enacted since 1963, recalled the four-day siege of Greater New York by polluted air last Thanksgiving, and warned:

"The pollution problem is getting worse. We are not even controlling today's level of pollution. Ten years from now, when industrial production and waste disposal have increased and the number of automobiles on our streets and highways exceeds 110 million, we shall have lost the battle for clean air—unless we strengthen our regulatory and research efforts now.

"Federal action alone cannot master pollution. The states, the cities and private industry must commit themselves more fully, more effectively and with a new sense of

Wyoming House Votes RTW Repeal; Measure Faces Stiff Fight in Senate

Cheyenne, Wyo.—A move to repeal Wyoming's 4-year-old "right-to-work" law has won initial success with passage in the state House of Representatives by a 34-27 vote. The measure now goes to the Senate where it faces strong opposition.

Final House passage of the repeal measure came after the bill survived a key vote in which the House overturned a Labor Committee recommendation of "do not pass." Seven Republicans joined with the 27 Democrats on the final vote.

In the Senate—where a repeal attempt in 1965 failed by one vote—the bill is expected to face a Labor Committee log-jam of House-passed measures. The bill must be acted upon before the Feb. 18 adjournment deadline. The Senate is made up of 18 Republicans and 12 Democrats.

Prior to the convening of the legislature, Republican Gov. Stanley K. Hathaway stated that he would not seek repeal, but that he would consider the legislature's action to be the will of the people.

The swift floor action which saw the bill move out of the House in a matter of minutes came as a surprise to the gallery which had prepared for prolonged debate and emotional fireworks. Under an agreement between party leadership, the entire House was called into attendance and the measure put to an immediate vote.

Earlier, in House Labor Committee hearings, Wyoming State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. John Holaday testified that the effects of the law had been to cause the state "dis-

Dressmakers Win 15% Hikes In New Pact

Negotiators were led by Stulberg and Gen. Mgr. Charles S. Zimmerman of the Dressmakers' Joint Council, an ILGWU vice president. Shop chairmen, meeting shortly before settlement at Manhattan Center here and in Scranton, Pa., authorized the negotiators to call a strike if they did not win major wage increases.

Zimmerman said the raises and new minimums will bring dressmakers substantial relief from living cost rises and mark the first step toward closing a wage gap between the dress industry and others.

The union reported two changes benefitting shipping clerks. Effective next June 1, employer contributions for health and welfare benefits will rise from $7 to $16 per worker. Starting Feb. 1, 1969, the clerks will be included for the first time in ILGWU national retirement fund coverage, with employers contributing 4.5 percent of payroll.

New minimums for those who work 35 hours a week in New York City will rise in two steps to $115 a week for cutters and graders, $85 for samplemakers, $68 for examiners, $75 for drapers, $65 for cleaners and others, $67 and $72 for shipping clerks. Minimum piecework rates will be raised to $2 an hour for finishers, $2.25 for operators and $2.65 for pressers.

Workers in shops outside New York City will get similar raises, except that operators in the Northeast area, mainly Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, are guaranteed a minimum wage of $1.80 an hour in February and $2.05 a year later.

The ILGWU said 80 percent of the workers covered by the agreement are women. The metropolitan dress market produces 60 percent of all U.S. dresses with a wholesale value of $1 billion a year, it said.

Clothing Union Drives Add 1,300 in South

Rockwood, Tenn. — Successful organizing drives in the South have added more than 1,300 new members to the Clothing Workers in recent months, the union announced.

Representation elections have been won and first contracts signed at the Warren Shirt Co., Campaign, Tenn., where the contract was ratified by an ACWA local of 200 members; and at three plants of the Apparel Corp. of America.

Delay Encountered

An organizing drive at the Roane County Mfg. Co., maker of military ponchos and raincoats, began early last year when the firm was known as the T & W Mfg. Co. Last August the union won a National Labor Relations Board election here but the company changed ownership and its name, which delayed negotiations on a contract for the plant's 800 workers.

Following the Roane victory, two other Apparel Corp. plants accepted the union when a card check showed that a majority favored the ACWA. Contracts also have been achieved at the two—for 200 workers in Cordele, Ga., and for 100 employes at Limestone, Tenn.

Agreements at all three Apparel Corp. plants call for two annual wage increases of 10 cents an hour each, three weeks' paid vacation, more paid holidays and the ACWA health, life and retirement insurance plans. Members also receive other benefits under the standard Cotton Garment agreement, the union reported.

SHOP CHAIRMEN of dressmaker locals in New York metropolitan area hear final reports at Manhattan Center from Ladies' Garment Workers leaders on negotiations that brought a 15 percent wage increase and other gains for 80,000 members in eight states. Speaking is Gen. Mgr. Charles S. Zimmerman of the Dress Joint Council. ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg is at far right.

Emergency Panel Opens Rail Shopcraft Hearings

Six railroad unions urged a presidential emergency board to heed the plight of 150,000 shopcraft workers described as steadily falling behind an ever-rising cost of living and the wages of other skilled workers with comparable jobs.

Union spokesmen, backed by almost unanimous referendum votes in favor of strike authorization, told a board named by Pres. Johnson that the 5 percent increase offered by rail management will come nowhere near closing the "widening differential" between the pay and fringe benefits of skilled railroad mechanics and those with similar skills in other industries.

Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. was among the first witnesses to testify as hearings began. Others included Attorney Edward J. Hickey, Jr., and Robert R. Nathan Associates, Inc., for the unions — the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Besides "substantial" pay boosts the unions want the board to recommend a cost-of-living escalator clause, shift differentials, and better overtime, holiday and vacation rules.

The unions spelled out their proposals in notices served last May on nearly 200 freight and passenger lines. The goals, they emphasized, were set in response to the "insistent urging" of members in railroad shops.

When bargaining failed to produce an agreement, the National Mediation Board called the parties back to the negotiating table during the period Oct. 19 to Jan. 6. The board then reported to Johnson that a strike "threatens substantially to interrupt interstate commerce" and deprive the country of "essential transportation service."

The President named David Ginsburg, Washington lawyer who was a member of a previous panel in the airline machinists' dispute; Dean Frank J. Dugan of the Georgetown University Graduate School of Law, who was a panel member in a 1964 shopcrafts mediation; and Pres. John W. McConnell of the University of New Hampshire, former mediator.

Ginsburg announced when hearing started that the unions and managements involved have agreed to extend the 60-day "cooling off" period mandated by the emergency provisions of the law from Mar. 28 to Apr. 12. No strike may be called, therefore, until after the April date.

Pension Review Panel Includes Two Unionists

Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Leonard Lesser, general counsel for the Industrial Union Dept., have been named by the Treasury Dept. to a panel to advise the department during a current review of regulations for integrating private pension, annuity, profit-sharing and stock bonus plans with social security.

AFM Elects Davis As Vice President

Palm Beach, Fla.—Pres. Hal C. Davis of Musicians Local 60, Pittsburgh, Pa., a member of the international executive board since 1963, has been elected an international vice president to succeed Pres. William J. Harris of the Dallas, Tex., local, who resigned.

At the same time Pres. Victor W. Fuentealba of the combined Baltimore, Md., Locals 40 and 453 was seated on the international executive board, which is meeting here. Fuentealba, whose music put him through the University of Maryland Law School, serves on the labor law section of the American Bar Association.

'Unalterably Opposed':

Labor Hits Reagan On Tuition, Taxes

San Francisco, Calif.—Organized labor in California is "unalterably opposed" to tuition charges for state college and university students, state AFL-CIO leader Thomas L. Pitts said in an open letter to the University of California board of regents.

Asserting that there has been much heat but little light shed on the controversy since Gov. Ronald Reagan (R) called for tuition charges, Pitts said labor is "deeply alarmed" by the possibility that "America's greatest university" should be subject to political shifts "unrelated to the economic realities of the state's higher education needs."

Pitts is executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO. His letter gave the state federation's views on budget and tax issues and urged the board to reject the Reagan proposal to charge tuition—a proposal that would change a policy existing since 1868, Pitts said.

He emphasized that:

- Tuition would hit hardest at families earning less than $10,000 a year, at a time when automation is "demanding higher skill requirements from all the segments of our workforce."
- The percentage of revenue that could be raised by charging tuition could be better raised by increasing charges for the "many services" the university now supplies free or at a nominal cost to agriculture and industry.
- No state growing at a rate of more than 500,000 residents a year can afford to cut its educational budget 10 percent, as the Reagan administration proposes.
- The university budget must be expanded, not contracted.

Faculty Losses Feared

Pitts expressed the fear that the "furor of the past few weeks" over the proposed tuition charges and the firing of University Pres. Clark Kerr will jeopardize the university's standing and lead to the loss of "gifted professors and administrators" as well as students.

The root cause of the state's revenue problem, Pitts wrote, is that the total tax structure is too regressive—that too much of state and local revenues comes from sales, property and other consumer taxes and "not enough from tax sources based on the ability-to-pay principle."

On the tax issue, Pitts pointed out that the state personal income tax produces only 12 percent of general fund revenues. By way of contrast, he noted that New York relies on its personal income tax for some 40 percent of its revenue.

Proposals to provide property tax relief by imposing a 1 percent increase in the sales tax would be "simply replacing one regressive tax with another," he warned. He urged the regents and other groups to join labor in seeking at least to double the state income tax range to the rate that prevailed in California before World War II.

Present Costs $1,850

On the tuition issue, Pitts pointed out that the average UC student now pays $1,850 a year for fees, room and board, books and other necessities "to get a college education in our tuition-free university system."

The imposition of a $100, $200 or $300 tuition charge, Pitts asserted, "would hit the educational hopes of youths from families in the lower-income brackets much harder" than those from families in the $14,000 and over bracket.

Reagan's proposed budget asks that tuition ranging from $150 to $280 a year be imposed on top of existing $135-$275 "fees" in the university and state colleges.

Solid Stand In Strike Wins Seniority Issue

Ionia, Mich. — The Furniture Workers announced the successful completion here of a four-months' strike against the A. O. Smith Co., giant complex owning 40 U.S. plants with $385 million yearly volume of business.

The union said members of its Local 420 held out until they had won maintenance of seniority rights —chief issue in the walkout—along with wage hikes of 18 to 49 cents an hour and other benefits.

A new two-year agreement provides two additional half-days off to make Christmas Eve and New Year Eve holidays, gives dependents the same insurance coverage as employes, provides worker sick benefits from the first day of hospitalization, establishes paid funeral leave, and sets up a special fund to finance insurance claims that arose during the strike.

SPECIAL GUEST at executive committee meeting of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. was a visiting African union leader, J. Essa-Adu Lansana of Sierra Leone. Shown at the session are, from left, Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Stage Employes, ULLICO Pres. Edmund P. Tobin, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Lansana and Pres. Patrick Gleason of Retail Clerks Local 1500, New York.

councils with their employers, the international union reported. Each is negotiated individually and has, in accordance with the law, an equal number of union and employer trustees.

The executive board instructed Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi to enlist regional officers in persuading local bodies to have the blanket reciprocal agreement signed quickly.

Sec.-Treas. Peter Fosco estimated that the portability provisions will cover more than 300,000 construction laborers by the end of this year.

Moreschi said the international union will provide any technical assistance the locals may need.

Locals also will be encouraged to merge small pension plans into larger plans already in operation, Moreschi said, so as to cut administrative costs and pay larger benefits with the money saved. When a retirement program is negotiated in an area where none existed before, he added, the bargaining local or council will be urged by the union's regional office to enter into an existing plan rather than to initiate a new one.

Moreschi also announced establishment of an international union pension plan for members working in small units in industry. Basically, he said, it will be comparable to those of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and of a small number of international unions in that it will operate nationally, with all the advantages of large-scale administration, instead of consisting of a collection of small plans each covering a handful of workers.

Pension Changes

The executive board carried out instructions of the international convention, held in St. Louis last September, and made some changes in local and district council pension plans relating to coverage of full-time officers and employees.

The eligibility requirement was cut from 15 to 10 years; the amount of salary on which a pension is computed was raised from a $10,000 annual maximum to $20,000 and a top benefit of $500 a month. A widow whose husband had 10 years of service at the age of 55 was made eligible for a lifetime pension of half his benefit.

The reduced eligibility requirement and the widow's pension also were applied to international staff representatives, the board announced.

The international union has established a new contract analysis section, Moreschi revealed.

It will analyze each lower-level agreement before it expires with special reference to pension clauses and also health and welfare provisos, an area into which the union plans on moving quickly, he said.

Trainmen Fight Ruling On Joint Talks

The Railroad Trainmen served notice that they will appeal a ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Alexander Holtzoff that the union must bargain jointly and not separately with U.S. railroads over the size of train crews.

The BRT called the lawsuit "an important test of the issue of national versus local bargaining." If Holtzoff's ruling stands, and is interpreted to mean that multi-employer bargaining is required, the result could be considered a "harsh setback" for rail labor generally, it said.

Union attorneys filed a motion for stay of Judge Holtzoff's ruling and his injunction against a strike on three railroads—the Boston & Maine, Atlantic Coast Line and the Des Moines Union Railway.

The basic issue, they said, is whether the BRT "has violated a positive mandate of the Railway Labor Act in refusing multi-carrier negotiations." Asserting that it has not, they asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to reverse the Holtzoff order on the grounds that the Norris-LaGuardia Act prohibits such no-strike injunctions, that there is no basis for an injunction, and that "no meaningful bargaining can take place" until the injunction is removed.

The railroads filed suit, charging that the BRT had not exhausted its remedies under the Railway Labor Act. During hearings before Holtzoff in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, BRT Pres. Charles Luna charged that the three carriers preferred national negotiations as an "excuse" to seek more compulsory arbitration.

Elevator Constructors Set Nationwide Strike

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Elevator Constructors announced that in the absence of a satisfactory contract the first walkout in 45 years would begin at midnight Feb. 3 against the National Elevator Mfg. Industry, Inc., and 70 member firms.

The strike would involve all elevator constructors and maintenance employes except those in New York City, where the union's local has a separate agreement.

The IUEC has notified all locals that the strike will not affect hospitals or national defense projects. In addition, locals have been advised to have members on duty 24 hours a day for the duration of the strike to answer emergency calls where the public is in danger.

More than 400 independent firms will be asked to sign an interim agreement covering the period of the expected strike. Those that do not sign will also be struck, the union said.

Negotiations on new contract terms began last October and were extended for 30 days past the Dec. 31 expiration date. Talks ended in stalemate Jan. 24, the union reported.

It said the dispute with the NEMI involves a new formula on wages and the industry group's demands for changes in travel and transportation terms in effect for 40 years. Both parties agree that the wage formula must be changed to include fringe benefits but they are in "total disagreement" over what the changes should be, the union reported.

Since 1921 the wage rate has been determined by averaging the wages of the five highest-paid building trades, according to the union. Its major employers include Otis, Westinghouse, Dover and Haughton.

WIGS AND WIGLETS, gowns and furs did for New York Office Employes Local 153 what nothing else did. Displayed by 22 attractive feminine members at a fashion show, they lured an unprecedented crowd to a general membership meeting that spilled out of the union hall into the corridor and adjacent rooms. At top are models on a center aisle walkway wearing a "mini-dress" (left) and a hostess gown (right). Below, some of the more than 1,000 members who turned out—especially for the wigs and wiglets.

NLRB Order Hits Mayor In Mississippi

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered the mayor of Pontotoc, Miss., population 2,180, to put an advertisement in a local newspaper notifying employes of a local furniture manufacturer that he will stop interfering with their right to join a union and be active in it.

The board upheld a ruling by Trial Examiner Herbert Silberman that Dean Industries, Inc., launched an unlawful drive to defeat the Upholsterers and benefited from a town campaign, spearheaded by Mayor Howard Stafford, to have Dean workers repudiate union application cards they had signed.

The cards were enough to achieve recognition, which management refused to grant. Because of the company's misconduct the board ordered it to bargain despite the union's loss in a 1965 election.

Stafford was found to have acted as an agent of the company in lining up the town bankers, merchants and nearby publishers against the union and in getting the workers to drop their membership.

Dean Industries went to Pontotoc about 1962 under the sponsorship of the County Development Association, organized to "entice or help industry establish in Pontotoc to give our people jobs," the mayor testified. The county leases the plant to the company under a favorable rental arrangement and taxes.

Steelworkers Add New Unit in Canada

Hamilton, Ont.—The Steelworkers won bargaining rights for 1,500 employes of the National Steel Car Co. in their second organizing effort in less than a year.

Network Newscasters Get $350 Pay Floor

Network news broadcasters heard on national radio and television chains have approved a new contract giving them a minimum of $350 for a five-day week, Exec. Sec. Donald F. Conaway of the Television & Radio Artists announced.

The agreement also provides that no more than 50 percent of commercial and sustaining fees up to $700 a week is recapturable by the networks except in the case of sustaining radio news, when 100 percent is recapturable. Any amount above $700 is retained by the employe.

Any time a newsman appears on a sponsored TV or radio program he must be paid a minimum of $150 per half-hour or $100 per 15-minute period in addition to the basic salary.

The new contract applies to network reporters, correspondents, news analysts and commentators. It was negotiated after they had rejected an earlier tentative agreement with a $300 minimum, and is retroactive to Nov. 15. Conaway said the new pact was unanimously approved by AFTRA members in Washington, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles, and added that he anticipates no difficulty in the required approval by the union's national board.

The agreement provides for a five-day week with no limit on the number of hours to be worked each day. A newsman required to work on his day off must be paid a minimum of $90 for the day or be given a compensatory day off. If his schedule requires him to work on Christmas Day, New Year's Day or Thanksgiving Day, he must be paid a minimum of $180. However, he has the choice of taking instead two compensatory days off, or taking half the premium pay—$90—and one day off, Conaway said.

The networks agreed to participate in the union's pension and welfare plan, to incorporate all company insurance programs into the contract, to pay additional compensation for hazardous work, and to give four weeks' notice or four weeks' pay in case of termination, plus a week's pay for each year of service except in cases of wilful misconduct.

Signers of the agreement with AFTRA were the American Broadcasting Co., Columbia Broadcasting System, National Broadcasting Co. and Mutual Broadcasting System.

Pollak Appointed To Brussels Post

Harry H. Pollak, former AFL-CIO international affairs representative, has been appointed labor attache to the U.S. Mission to the European Communities, with headquarters in Brussels.

He will advise the mission on labor matters in its dealings with such international bodies as NATO, the European common market, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Intl. Federation of Christian Trade Unions and others which have their headquarters in the Belgian capitol.

Between 1950 and 1962, Pollak represented the U.S. labor movement on assignments in many parts of the world, served on labor-management panels dealing with international affairs and in 1961 acted as labor representative in setting up the Peace Corps. In 1962 he joined the federal service as U.S. Information Service labor adviser in Japan.

State Suits Challenge Section of Wage Act

States seeking to avoid paying the federal minimum wage to their school and public hospital employes have challenged the constitutionality of a key section of the wage-hour amendments which went into effect Feb. 1.

Among the 9 million newly-covered workers are 1.3 million school employes and 2 million hospital employes. Most of these are employed by state or local governments.

Texas, Maryland and a growing number of other states have asked U.S. courts to rule that the federal government has no right to set minimum conditions of employment for state and local workers.

A U.S. district judge in Maryland issued a temporary restraining order holding up enforcement of these provisions and a hearing before a three-judge federal court is scheduled for late March.

Regardless of the outcome, the decision is expected to be appealed to the Supreme Court.

Justice Dept. attorneys will defend the constitutionality of the expanded coverage and the State, County & Municipal Employes announced that its attorneys will file a supporting brief in defense of the law.

The union's executive board was in session when the first suit was filed, by Texas. It quickly passed a resolution authorizing participation in the legal defense, noting that extension of the act to state and other public employes was "an important advance."

SCME Vice Pres. Don McCullar, himself from Texas, said the "excuse of protecting states' rights cannot justify the fact that there has been no action by the state of Texas to establish a fair minimum wage or overtime provisions for public employes."

this as a better answer than denying human beings a decent wage."

The men and women who will benefit from legislation were not at the White House ceremony, the President noted, but "those who have worked for them and fought for them are, the members of Congress who could hear their voices and heeded their plea, the leaders of the workers in this country who had done so much to help the people of their own union, but decided to do something to help all people."

The labor delegation to the ceremony included, besides Keenan, AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and Hunter P. Wharton, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Present also were top government leaders including Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, and congressional leaders who helped steer the wage-hour bill to enactment.

The President also received a telegram from the executive board of the Ladies' Garment Workers hailing the new minimum wage as a "giant step forward" and "a dramatic reminder of the rapid and real advance we have made toward the goals of the Great Society."

Screen Actors Ratify TV Commercial Pact

Hollywood, Calif.—By a vote of more than 99-to-1, eligible members of the Screen Actors Guild approved a new three-year contract for filmed commercials with the television and advertising industries that will yield the performers an additional $5 million a year.

The tally was 8,188 to 75—the heaviest vote recorded in the union's history. The contract, jointly negotiated with the Television & Radio Artists, covers the three major TV networks, the Association of National Advertisers and the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

Kerner Asks Minimum Pay Law in Illinois

Springfield, Ill.—Gov. Otto Kerner (D) asked the Illinois Legislature to enact a minimum wage law matching the federal rates of $1.40 this year and $1.60 in 1968.

The governor said Illinois is the only major industrial state without a minimum wage law. He termed a $1.40 pay floor "a subsistence standard in today's world."

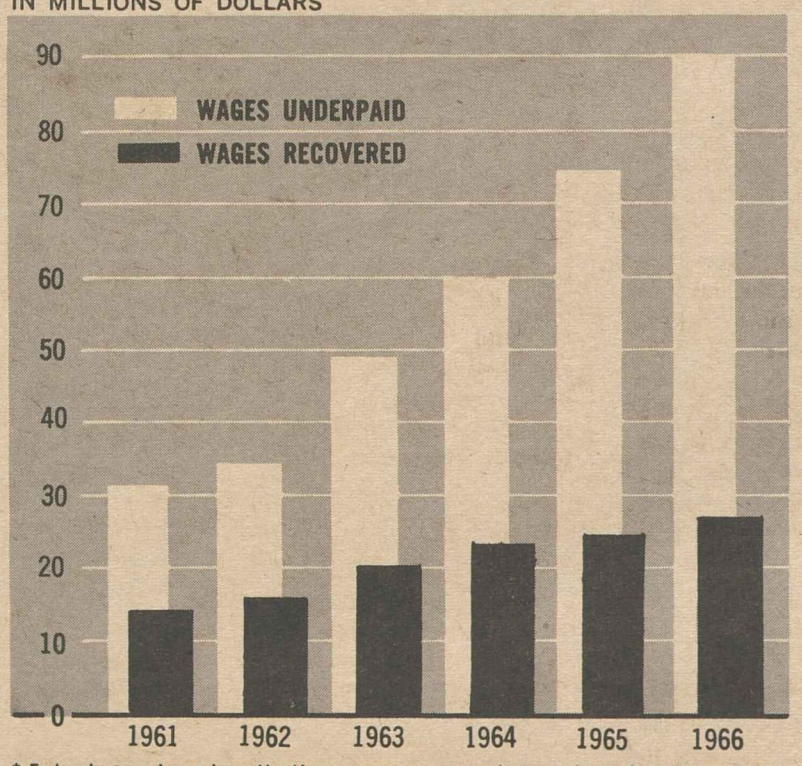
In the same message to the legislature on human resources, Kerner asked it to:

- Expand the state's fair employment practices act to cover firms with 10 or more employes.
- Permit collective bargaining for public employes with "proper safeguards" against strikes.
- Set up a commission to review what he termed "hopelessly archaic" state labor laws.
- Provide a health care program for migrant workers.

The governor said he will have a later message on unemployment compensation.

WAGE-HOUR UNDERPAYMENTS*

IN MILLIONS OF DOLLARS



* Federal wage-hour investigations uncover a growing number of underpayments, but the amount recovered in behalf of workers lags far behind. It is estimated these investigations, based on spot-checks of firms and on worker complaints, still miss about half the violations.

'Giant Stride':

Pay Floor Hikes Aid 5 Million Workers

Nearly 5 million low-paid workers received raises Feb. 1, and an article in the February issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist describes in detail the changes in the wage-hour law which brought this about.

It analyzes "the broadest extension of coverage since the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act—the addition of 9.1 million workers to the 32.3 million previously covered. It tells who these workers are and the manner in which they are covered. The Federationist article was written by Rudolph Oswald, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The first step of the new amendments took effect Feb. 1, when the minimum wage for persons previously covered by the wage-hour law moved up from $1.25 to $1.40 an hour. At the same time, more than 8 million additional workers came under the law. An additional million will be covered on Feb. 1, 1969.

The newly covered workers will start with a $1 an hour wage guarantee and gradually catch up to those already covered through annual increases. Most but not all of the new group will also be protected by the overtime provisions of the law, starting after 44 hours the first year, dropping in two annual steps to the 40-hour standard.

A year from now, on Feb. 1, 1968, the wage floor for those at the $1.40 level goes up to $1.60 an hour. The newly covered group moves up to $1.15 an hour. The minimum for this group will continue to advance 15 cents a year until farm workers reach $1.30 and other workers catch up to the $1.60 level.

Major Changes

Here's how the wage-hour changes affect major groups of workers:

Manufacturing: Most factory workers are already covered by the FLSA, but a substantial number, especially in the South, will benefit directly by the pay hikes.

Construction: Previously only workers employed in firms doing at least $350,000 worth of business were covered. Now all construction workers are covered. Of particular importance is the requirement for time-and-one-half rates for overtime applied to small, non-union contractors.

Retail Trade: About 1.7 million workers will be brought under coverage. Previously only employes of firms with annual sales of $1 million were covered. The sales test dropped to $500,000 on Feb. 1 and will drop further to $250,000 in 1969. Still unprotected will be some 3.5 million workers in stores doing less than $250,000 business a year.

Hospitals: All non-professional hospital and nursing home employes are covered, adding 2 million persons. Coverage exists regardless of the size of the institution or whether it is private or public, profit or non-profit. Special overtime provisions cover these groups.

Schools: Coverage of non-teaching employes of both public and private schools added 1.3 million workers to FLSA. The inclusion of state school and hospital employes has been challenged in court tests brought by four states.

Laundries: All laundry workers are now covered, adding 500,000 workers.

Restaurants: For the first time restaurant workers will be covered—about 500,000 of them. Those employed in restaurants with annual sales of at least $500,000 were covered Feb. 1, those in establishments with a $250,000 sales volume will be brought in on Feb. 1, 1969. Restaurant workers are not covered by overtime provisions of the law. In addition, if an employe regularly receives more than $20 a month in tips, the employer may offset up to 50 percent of the minimum wage requirement by the actual amount of tips received by the worker.

Hotels: Some 300,000 hotel and motel workers are brought under coverage, under the same conditions applicable to restaurant workers, including the offset for tips.

Federal Agencies: The $1.40 minimum, rising to $1.60 next year is applied to federal blue collar workers on a prevailing wage schedule, to employes of Post Exchanges, officers' clubs and commissaries run by the armed forces in the United States and U.S. territories, and to employes of contractors providing services to the government. Federal employes in the Panama Canal Zone must be paid at least the minimum wage for those newly-covered.

Farm workers: An estimated 400,000 farm workers will be covered under special provisions covering certain types of agricultural work. The test of coverage is described in the Federationist article.

Gaps Remain

The article also deals with smaller groups of workers affected by the 1966 wage-hour amendments, including taxi drivers, loggers, students, severely-handicapped workers among others.

While stressing the importance of the major expansion of coverage enacted by Congress, the article also points to "gaps and weaknesses" remaining in the law.

Some 11 million workers are still not covered, including domestics, persons employed in firms with annual sales under $250,000 and most farm workers.

Nevertheless, it concludes, the improvements made "represent a giant stride towards meeting labor's goals."

Meany Spurs Central Bodies:

AFL-CIO Wage-Hour Drive Seeks Vigorous Enforcement

Labor Dept. investigators found that "some 430,000 workers were underpaid a total of $90 million by employers who flouted the FLSA" and the departmetnt estimates that "only about half the violators were caught."

The new amendments increase the number of covered workers by almost 30 percent, Meany noted, and the number of establishments to be checked by nearly 60 percent.

This extension of coverage "will enormously enlarge the inspection task," he said. He termed the President's budget request to Congress for additional wage-hour inspectors "a necessary first step."

To supplement this, Meany told the President, the AFL-CIO is undertaking its own campaign to assist workers in processing complaints of wage-hour violations. He urged the President to "make sure that both employers and the administrators of this law know that you intend to have fair labor standards for all—in fact as well as in name."

The problem of enforcement was pointed up by the Labor Dept.'s wage-hour administrator, Clarence T. Lundquist, at a news conference.

Lundquist said he could add 175 additional wage-hour investigators to the present staff of 1,000 if Congress approves the full budget increase sought by the President.

He acknowledged, in reply to questions, that even after the new investigators are trained the Labor Dept. would not be able to inspect as high a proportion of firms as it did last year.

Enforcement problems are always greater following a change in the law, he said, and the government will have to depend to a greater extent on violations being called to its attention, rather than ferreted out by investigators.

Meany, in his letter to central bodies, pointed out that the Labor Dept. "has never had enough inspectors to do the job" and "it is up to us to help."

Procedure 'Cumbersome'

The procedure for workers to file individual complaints that they are not being paid the legal minimum "is just cumbersome enough to be discouraging," Meany noted, "especially for the unorganized people who have to operate on their own."

He called on each central body to:

- Set up a wage-hour enforcement committee to receive and help process complaints.
- Publicize the creation of the committee, stressing its availability to all workers, especially the unorganized.
- Help the worker bring his complaint to a wage-hour investigator and press for prompt action by the government.
- Keep tabs on the outcome of all cases and be alert to unnecessary compromises that give the worker only a portion of the money due him.

Emphasizing the importance of the program, Meany reminded central bodies that "more often than not the cheaters on the wage-hour law are in competition with organized shops and depress the wages of all."

An article in the February issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist points up the problem of enforcement, including the difficulty of collecting back wages when violations are uncovered.

70% Claim Loss

Only $27 million of the nearly $90 million underpayment found by wage-hour investigators during the 1966 fiscal year was actually recovered by the workers who were short-changed. If an employer refuses to pay up for past violations, either the worker or the Labor Dept. has to bring a court suit.

"Too often," the Federationist article points out, "the collection suits are never brought, especially where the workers involved have no union representation and fear employer reprisal."

The article also quotes a Labor Dept. estimate that 1.77 million employes were underpaid at some time during the two-year period, 1964-65, an average of $172 per worker. Over 343,000 establishments were involved in violations of one or more provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The bulk of the violations represented failure by employers to pay time-and-one-half overtime rates.

Adding to the enforcement problem this year is coverage, for the first time, of a large group of farm workers.

CLC Names Fryer As Research Chief

Ottawa, Ont.—John Fryer, British-born economist who once was an intern in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been appointed research director of the Canadian Labor Congress, CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin announced.

He had been the CLC's assistant research director since 1965 and succeeds Dr. Eugene Forsey, who has been giving full attention to writing a history of the labor movement in Canada and who now becomes director of special projects.

Frey, 28, received a bachelor's degree from the London School of Economics and a master's degree from the University of Pittsburgh. He was a research associate with the Packinghouse Workers prior to joining the CLC.

Letter to Central Bodies On Wage-Hour Program

Text of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's letter to state and local central bodies on enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act:

On Feb. 1 the new wage-hour amendments will go into effect, not only raising the federal minimum wage but extending its coverage to more than 9 million workers and to 700,000 new employers.

It is clearly in the best interests of the AFL-CIO, as well as in the national interest, to see that the law is observed.

Unfortunately, the wage-hour division of the Dept. of Labor has never had enough inspectors to do the job. Furthermore, the procedure available to workers for filing individual complaints is just cumbersome enough to be discouraging, especially for the unorganized people who have to operate on their own.

The next issue of the American Federationist, which you will shortly receive, describes the new law in a special article. The article also discusses enforcement procedures. You will see that they are complex.

Pres. Johnson's proposed budget calls for additional federal inspectors, as I noted in a letter to him, a copy of which is enclosed. But the enforcement job will be so greatly increased by the new amendments that still other measures are needed.

It is up to us to help in the enforcement of this law. Organized workers can, for the most part, appeal for help to their own unions. The unorganized have no place to go. I hope each central body becomes such a place.

I urge each of you to let it be known that you are ready, willing and able to handle all wage-hour complaints, from any source. Here are some of the steps you might take:

1. Establish a standing committee on wage-hour enforcement, to receive and help to process complaints.

2. Issue a news release announcing the creation of the committee, and stressing your readiness to assist all workers, especially the unorganized.

3. When complainants come in, get in touch with the nearest wage-hour field office on the enclosed list. Set up an appointment for the complainant in the most convenient subsidiary field station. Obviously it is not possible for a worker at the minimum wage level to travel a long distance to lodge a complaint.

4. Press the wage-hour office for prompt action. To workers who are being gypped under the wage-hour law, speed is vital.

5. Compile a record of the outcome of cases that come to your attention. The official Dept. of Labor statistics indicate that because of negotiated "compromises," even workers who have been upheld have collected only about a third of what was owed them. Compromise is all right in its place, but the law is the law, and it provides little enough at 100 percent.

As you well know, this program is not just charitable. More often than not the cheaters on the wage-hour law are in competion with organized shops and depress the wages of all.

Let's make the most out of a very good thing—and one for which the AFL-CIO can take full credit.

Text of Meany Letter to the President

Text of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's letter to Pres. Johnson on new wage-hour protections:

Dear Mr. President:

On behalf of the AFL-CIO, let me offer our warmest congratulations as the new amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act approach their first effective date, February 1.

The enactment of these amendments, on your recommendation, will surely be remembered as one of the most outstanding achievements of the 89th Congress and of your Administration.

The inclusion of 9 million additional workers under the act's coverage, and the increase in the wage floor, constitute by far the greatest single victory up to now in the war against poverty in America.

All forms of poverty are evil. But the least excusable of all its forms is poverty imposed by wages at a less-than-subsistence level upon workers who are fully and usefully employed.

The amendments which are about to take effect will go a long way toward extirpating that abuse. Nearly 5 million of the nation's lowest paid workers will have their wages raised. And as you have pointed out, the new minimum wage will, for the first time, inch above the poverty level. Surely this is in keeping with the ideals and objectives of those who conceived the law. Since you were among them, this must be a matter of great satisfaction to you, as it is to us.

We also share your confidence that these FLSA improvements—like all previous ones—will also be of vast benefit to the national economy and thus to all Americans. In the next 12 months alone an additional billion dollars will be added to consumer buying-power by the direct impact of this statute. The indirect dividends will be even greater. The business community will reap its full share in growing sales from the relief of exploited wage-earners.

Only one circumstance could prevent this memorable legislative advance from fulfilling our hopes, and that is widespread violation of its terms.

You know, as we do, that a law is only as good as its enforcement, and in this instance enforcement poses a special problem.

Even under the previous law, according to the Dept. of Labor, verified violations doubled in the last five years, and the department estimates that only about half the violators were caught.

The new amendments, while increasing the covered workers by almost 30 percent, will raise the number of covered establishments—that is, employers—by nearly 60 percent.

Since it is establishments rather than employes which need to be checked, we believe a substantial increase in the number of wage-hour investigators is essential.

Last year, some 430,000 workers were underpaid a total of $90 million by employers who flouted the FLSA—and these figures cover only those who were discovered. The new increases in the minimum wage will further tempt chiselers, and the new extension of coverage will enormously enlarge the inspection task. Your budget message to the Congress has taken cognizance of this need and provides for more enforcement apparatus.

This is, we believe, a necessary first step in translating the promise of this new legislation into the positive good we know it can be.

For our part, we are launching a campaign through our state and city central bodies to offer assistance to all workers—including unorganized workers—in processing complaints of wage-hour violations.

We know that you share our view that laws are written to be observed. We trust you will make sure that both employers and the administrators of this law know that you intend to have fair labor standards for all—in fact as well as in name.

The Minimum Wage Impact

THE FEB. 1, 1967, increase in the federal minimum wage to $1.40 an hour and extension of the law to an additional 8 million workers will predictably set off a flurry of reports of layoffs, closed businesses and a general wailing about how the country is once again on the brink of ruin.

The reports will come from those who believe that $1.40 an hour is an "extravagant" wage; that workers should be thankful there are benevolent employers to provide jobs, and never mind the wages.

The $1.40 an hour will bring a worker employed for a full year at 40 hours a week the munificent annual salary of $2,912—still short of the $3,000 a year income that the government has drawn as the poverty line.

Of the 5 million persons who will receive increases this month under the new amendments to the Wage-Hour Act, many of them will be protected by the law for the first time and will receive $1 an hour. They will not reach the top minimum of $1.60 an hour—that will go into effect for previously covered workers Feb. 1, 1968—until Feb. 1, 1971.

If an increase in the minimum wage to $1.40 for those presently covered by the law and a floor of $1 an hour for those covered for the first time will make or break a business or industry, then it has been guilty of the cruelest form of wage exploitation.

BUT THE EVIDENCE is overwhelmingly against those who raise the cry of ruination because a worker is guaranteed $1 to $1.40 an hour.

In January 1963 the secretary of labor reported to Congress the effects of a first-step increase in the minimum wage to $1.15 in 1961 and the expansion of coverage to 3.5 million more workers. The secretary declared that the minimum wage increases "had no discernible effect on the nationwide level of employment in the industries affected. On an overall basis employment has risen in these industries since the 1961 amendments took effect."

In January 1965 the secretary reported again, in accordance with the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act, that "recent experience has indicated that the extension of coverage to low-wage industries has not in fact curtailed employment. Even more important, the idea that substandard wages should be retained in some occupations and industries to provide marginal jobs is in direct contradiction to our goal of eliminating poverty."

In January 1966, after reviewing the record for the four previous years during which the minimum went to $1.25 and newly covered workers reached maximum protection, the secretary reported:

"The strong—and only—indication from the record is that reasonable increases in the minimum rate have no retarding effect on an expanding economy and do not result in larger unemployment than there would have been in the absence of such increases."

THE 1967 INCREASE and expansion of the minimum wage is expected to add $1 billion in purchasing power for the 12 months beginning Feb. 1. This will be money in the hands of low wage earners who will spend it to improve their impoverished standard of living. It will signal a major victory in the war on poverty.

On Feb. 1, 1968, when the minimum moves to $1.60 an hour, the country will have moved past the poverty line for those covered by the new top rate. The exploiters and the chiselers will raise a new cry, for their kind never quite gives up. But they will be hauled wailing and kicking, as in the past, into a society where the working poor is a disappearing breed.

In Economic Message:

President Sets Forth Program To Extend Attack on Poverty

The following is excerpted from a section of Pres. Johnson's Economic Report to Congress on "Helping the Disadvantaged."

THE UNITED STATES is the first large nation in the history of the world wealthy enough to end poverty within its borders. There are many fronts in the War on Poverty. We are moving forward on them all.

There must be full employment so that those qualified and able to work can find jobs. . . . The unemployment rate last year was the lowest in 13 years.

Those not now fully qualified must be given the education and training, the health and guidance services which will enable them to make their full contribution to society. . . . We have greatly increased our aid to education and enlarged our training programs, and we will expand them further.

For those who will be unable to earn adequate incomes, there must be help—most of all for the benefit of children, whose misfortune to be born poor must not deprive them of future opportunity. . . . We have increased our income support, and we will increase it further.

Wherever the poor and disadvantaged are concentrated, intensive and coordinated programs to break the cycle of deprivation and dependency must continue and be reinforced. . . . We have instituted these programs in hundreds of cities and rural areas; we are expanding them and designing others.

Completely new proposals for guaranteeing minimum incomes are now under discussion. They range from a "negative income tax" to a complete restructuring of public assistance to a program of residual public employment for all who lack private jobs. Their advocates include some of the sturdiest defenders of free enterprise. These plans may or may not prove to be practicable at any time. And they are almost surely beyond our means at this time. But we must examine any plan, however unconventional, which could promise a major advance. I intend to establish a commission of leading Americans to examine the many proposals that have been put forward, reviewing their merits and disadvantages, and reporting in 2 years to me and the American people.

Our system of public assistance is now 30 years old and has obvious faults. The standards of need set by many states are unrealistically low; benefits are further restricted by excessively stringent eligibility conditions. In some respects the system perpetuates dependency.

1. State standards of need are miserably low. In 18 states a family of four is presumed able to manage for a month on $45 a person—or less. And in many states, actual payments average far below their own standards of need.

It is time to raise payments toward more acceptable levels.

As a first step, I ask the Congress to require that each state's payments at least meet its own definition of need; and that its definition should be kept up to date annually as conditions change.

2. With minor exceptions, payments under public assistance are reduced dollar for dollar of earnings by the recipient, removing any incentive to accept part-time work. We should encourage self-help, not penalize it.

It is time to put an end to this 100 percent tax on the earnings of those on public assistance.

I shall therefore ask Congress to enact payment formulas which will permit those on assistance to keep some part of what they may earn, without loss of payments.

3. Many recipients of public assistance are capable of receiving training which would ultimately make them self-supporting.

I therefore urge the Congress to make permanent the Unemployed Parent and Community Work and Training program associated with Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), and to require all states receiving federal support under AFDC to cooperate in making community work and training available for the unemployed parents of dependent children.

The coexistence of job vacancies and idle workers unable to fill them represents a bitter human tragedy and an inexcusable economic waste. One of society's most creative acts is the training of the unemployed, the underemployed, or the formerly unemployable to fill those vacancies.

A dynamic economy demands new and changing skills. By enabling workers to acquire those skills, we open opportunities for individual development and self-fulfillment. And we make possible higher production without inflationary pressures.

I shall ask the Congress for funds to support a new and special effort to train and find jobs for the disadvantaged who live in urban ghettos.

I shall also propose legislation to improve the effectiveness of the Federal-State Employment Service.

Morgan Says:

Unemployment Problem Needs More than Horatio Alger Offers

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

A MAGAZINE called Nation's Business, published by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, may have a good thing going.

It has come up with private industry's answer to the unemployment problem. It is offering, in effect, to give away jobs.

Morgan

The question is whether this will prove to be the most productive give-away of all time or whether it is a cynical comment on government efforts, admittedly expensive and clumsy though many of them have been, to enhance the chances of the unfortunate for a bigger stake in this land of golden opportunity.

In an editorial under the inviting title, emblazoned in red ink, "We Can Get Anybody a Job," the January issue declares:

"The editors . . . guarantee that there is a job available for every person in this country who is willing and able to work."

Backing this offer is the National Employment Association, a nationwide group of private employment agencies, whose president, A. G. Hayes, says:

"By able we mean any person of integrity who is physically capable of working. By willing we mean any person who has enough desire to work that he will, if necessary, take some training, move to another location and settle for a job reasonably consistent with his qualifications."

Nation's Business is not widely read by the nation's unemployed, of whom the 1966 average was 3 million, according to the Labor Dept. Nevertheless one ten-thousandth of that number, some 300 persons, have answered the editorial ad so far and two of them have been placed. That is a tangible, if modest, beginning.

There is a great deal to be said for the Chamber of Commerce philosophy that there is a certain virtue in hard work and that some conceptions of the welfare state blight honest initiative. But there is a little more to this problem than reflected in the old-fashioned and still favored Horatio Alger syndrome.

The editorial quotes Robert O. Snelling, an employment agency executive, as follows:

"The Bill of Rights offers no protection of the ego. It gives us the freedom of the pursuit of happiness. It doesn't guarantee that society will bring you a happiness package and lay it in your lap. You've got to do your own pursuing."

Well, let's just pursue that little thought through the columns of your favorite newspaper or magazine for a moment. Cash prizes for the latest numbers game at your neighborhood supermarket. A fabulous tropical vacation, all expenses paid, in some gasoline contest. Valuable free gifts at the opening of the newest suburban shopping center, et cetera.

One of the strongest coil-springs in the selling pitch, soft or hard, of American merchandizing historically, is mounted on greed and "something for nothing."

Are the needy less susceptible to that psychology than the more successful wage-earner? Did the Better Business Bureau ever blackball a firm for its enterprise in selling a TV set to a family on relief? Has the Chamber of Commerce risen in righteous indignation to denounce a used car dealer, or a new car dealer, for that matter, for selling a customer something he couldn't afford and, it might be added, with hidden usurious interest rate on an installment plan he couldn't understand?

Though its author, Sen. Paul Douglas, is no longer in Congress, Pres. Johnson called for a truth-in-lending bill in his State of the Union message. It would have been enacted years ago except for the powerful lobbying pressures of business and banking interests against it.

THE POINT I'm trying to make is that certain exploitative aspects of standard business practice can erode initiative just as surely as an extravagant government handout. There is not a shadow of a doubt that some relief and welfare programs, at various levels of government, have done more damage than good to the poor and the indigent.

Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John Gardner would be the first man in Washington to admit, sadly but candidly, that there are countless welfare cases across the land who are beyond salvaging. There are, also, countless welfare workers who have grown so bureaucratically rigid in their jobs that they too are contributing little or nothing to solving the problem of poverty.

Now the federal government, belatedly, but with a certain amount of imagination and courage, is trying a new approach which involves treating the poor as people instead of as a tax deduction for a contribution to charity. Like all pioneering efforts, this involves waste and mistakes and it will take a long time to find the right answers.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is perfectly entitled to try its approach. Anybody interested in its offer of a job should write to the editor of Nation's Business, Washington, D.C. If all 3 million jobless write in, it may pull the Postoffice Dept. out of the red.

Steel Unionist Finds:

Labor's Goals in Russia, U.S. Provide an Absolute Contrast

THE ABSOLUTE contrast between the goals of American trade unions and those of Russia's so-called unions was drawn recently on the network radio program, Labor News Conference, by an American unionist just back from serving with a U. S. mission in Russia.

Meyer Bernstein, a technical adviser to the U. S. delegation to the Economic Commission for Europe and a member of its steel committee, said that in the USSR wages, hours and working conditions "are all set by the government," not negotiated by the unions as they are in the United States.

In America, he said, the primary goals of unions are "the rights, benefits and privileges" of the members. In Russia, he pointed out, these are "the last things" of concern to their so-called unions.

Russian unions are "a labor control—a labor mobilization force" responsible for "making sure that the production plan is fulfilled and exceeded," said Bernstein, who is international affairs director for the USWA.

"The union agrees to meet certain production goals" and "obligates itself to mobilize the work force toward this objective," he said. Workers with records of tardiness, absenteeism or inefficiency "are tried by workers' courts" which also levy punishments, he said.

BERNSTEIN SAID he went to Russia not as an American union official, but as a member of the Economic Commission for Europe's steel committee.

"I'm the only union man who is a member of the committee," he noted, and was named to the group "only because of my experience in the steel industry."

Reporters questioning Bernstein on the AFL-CIO produced interview, featured weekly on the Mutual broadcasting system, were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine and William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

REP. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS, a Mississippi-style Democrat who bolted in 1964 to support Sen. Goldwater against the national candidate of the Democrats, Pres. Johnson, lost his battle for restored committee seniority in the House Democratic caucus and promptly announced he would hereafter boycott the caucus.

Williams was stripped of his Commerce Committee seniority (No. 2, and he would be chairman now) by the party caucus in 1965.

The issue was not whether Williams had a right to vote in the presidential election as his conscience commanded (he did, of course). It was whether the Democratic Party nationally could continue to tolerate a substantial number of party-bolters in the South who, on a more or less regular basis, repudiated the national candidates and platform during presidential years but then claimed the House committee seniority to which alleged national party membership entitled them.

This game has been going on ever since 1944. It led in 1948 to the Dixiecrat Party that nominated Strom Thurmond, then governor of South Carolina, now switched-over Republican senator, for the presidency against Harry S. Truman.

The Dixiecrats carried four states against Truman—South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. Mr. Johnson lost all four of them in 1964 to former Sen. Goldwater, by various devices such as support of supposedly "unpledged" electors against Democratic electors by the state party machines.

The party-bolting game by southern segregationist and self-proclaimed "states' rights" Democrats was played in 1960 against John F. Kennedy. Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi attended the Democratic National Convention, participated in the debates, had the freedom of the platform—and then went home and supported "unpledged" electors who cast eight Electoral College votes for the late Sen. Byrd of Virginia, not the national party nominee, Mr. Kennedy.

At least three Democratic House members publicly and avowedly opposed Kennedy, and might well have been deprived of committee seniority then and there—but liberals lacked the relative strength they have now in the party caucus, and they also lacked the support of the mortally ailing Speaker, Sam Rayburn.

AFTER ABOUT a quarter of a century of experience with extremist Southerners who were Democrats in the House for committee seniority purposes but seldom or never for presidential election purposes, northern and western House members felt the system must be broken.

Moreover, they had the strength to make the issue when the great tide of Democrats elected with Mr. Johnson took their places.

They used the Democratic caucus to make a distinctively party decision that sacrifice of committee seniority must hereafter be viewed as a potential penalty by would-be party-bolters.

They stripped Williams of his Commerce Committee No. 2 ranking and dropped him to the bottom. They did not deny him committee membership or a vote in the caucus. They did not attempt to dictate his votes on specific legislative issues. They simply said he could not use House Democratic machinery to rise to a committee chairmanship, a position in which he would be handling major legislation proposed by an administration he had sought to defeat in election.

They made the decision stick when Williams this year sought to regain his No. 2 seniority. They defeated him in the caucus by a 134-100 secret ballot vote. One reason is that northern and western Democratic strength remains relatively high in the House, while southern districts are being gobbled up by Republicans. House Democratic membership from Old Confederacy states has dropped from more than 100 to 83.

"THE LAST THINGS" that concern Russia's so-called trade unions are the "rights, benefits and privileges" of workers, said Steelworkers Intl. Affairs Dir. Meyer Bernstein (center) on Labor News Conference. William Eaton (left) of the Chicago Daily News and Alan Adams of Business Week questioned Bernstein about his recent tour of steel mills in the USSR as a technical adviser to the U.S. delegation to the Economic Commission for Europe.

How to Buy:

Housewares, Furniture, Bedding Due for Spring Price Increases

By Sidney Margolius

WORKING FAMILIES have a little relief this winter from high food prices because of the seasonally larger supplies of meat.

Most other living costs are still rising. Electric housewares, furniture and bedding manufacturers now are planning boosts. Increases on mattresses, especially lower-priced lines, are expected for this spring. The annual midwinter furniture and bedding sales in February offer an opportunity to beat these forthcoming price hikes.

Families shopping for a TV set will find new measurements in use for screen sizes. The Federal Trade Commission ruled that the previous diagonal designations such as "19-inch" misled the public. The actual viewable diagonal of the so-called "19-inch" screen really is 18 inches, and of the "23-inch", only 22. Now the measurement must be given in terms of the actual picture area. Reliable retailers now will describe the former 19-inch set as 172 square inches, and the 23-inch, as 282 square inches.

One leading TV manufacturer has reduced prices on color TV sets by $25-$50. The TV industry had outsmarted itself before Christmas. Manufacturers had expected a rush to buy color sets. They advertised sets at $500 nationally. But when demand seemed strong for a while, they concentrated production on the more expensive consoles retailing at, for example, $700. When people went to look for the $500 sets, they found few of those but an abundance of the expensive sets. The public balked.

In their expectation of a color boom—and they enjoyed one for a while—the manufacturers also neglected quality control as they stepped up production. On top of that, they concentrated on production of sets and neglected production of parts. A satisfactory supply of parts is very essential to color television because of the additional service problem, a leading appliance chain president says.

For 1967, the now-chastened manufacturers are producing more of the lower-price sets, so that average industry prices will be about $40 less.

Average tags on black and white sets also are moving down by about $10, largely because of increased production of smaller "second" sets.

While higher furniture prices are threatened, prices of rugs and other floor coverings remain at low levels. Nylon rugs especially are priced low this year because of the competition of a new type of rug made of polypropylene fiber.

The "poly" carpets sell in the same $6-$8 range as fair-quality grades of continuous filament nylon. Keep in mind that all "nylon" carpets on the market are not the same quality even though made of the same fiber. You need to compare the weight, density of pile and closeness of weave.

Too, while continuous-filament nylon carpeting is good value at present reduced prices, don't expect miracle performance from it.

YOU HAVE to expect, and live with, at least a somewhat crushed look if you use a moderate-price carpet in heavy traffic areas. You will get some of that even with costlier carpeting. You can minimize these disadvantages to some extent by choosing a dark shade, especially if you have young children and in heavy traffic areas.

Carpets made of polyester have been improved, and are being marketed widely. In fact, polyester carpets are expected to become a leading type, just as polyester has become the leading synthetic fiber for clothing. The price of polyester carpeting is higher than that of nylon or polypropylene. It is usually found at $10 to $13 a yard like the acrylic-fiber carpets (Acrilan and Orlon).

Pork, poultry, eggs and some beef cuts are all comparatively reasonable at this time. The price reductions on beef are small and reluctant. Producers are holding back some stock until market prices rise again in the spring. Pork prices, too, will start going up again soon. Smoked calis and butts especially still offer good value. The drop in egg prices is a real help.

The heavy supplies and low prices of canned salmon are also an aid to price-harried families this winter. The U. S. Agriculture Dept.'s Food & Home Notes points out that pink salmon currently sells for about 20 cents a pound can less than red. They are equal in nutritional quality. Canned tuna is even cheaper.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Weather Bureau's Copping Out On Its Job of Forecasting Rain

By Jane Goodsell

THE WEATHER BUREAU is copping out on its job of predicting the weather. It quotes the odds pro and con, and leaves it up to the public to decide whether a "40 percent chance of precipitation" merits carrying an umbrella.

This is irresponsible and cowardly behavior, unbecoming the Weather Bureau whose job it is to go out on a limb and predict, boldly and without equivocation. Needless to say, it is expected to predict accurately but, should it err, it must steel itself to accept manfully the taunts, jeers and raised fists of an irate populace.

Distressing as it is, this recent cop-out comes as no surprise. During recent years it has become increasingly apparent that the Weather Bureau has lost its nerve and is no longer willing to risk it out on that limb.

For a number of years now, television viewers have been subjected to a tedious, long-winded briefing session known as The Total Weather Picture. During this interlude, the TV audience is treated to an interminable explanation, illustrated with maps, charts and graphs, of meteorological factors: high and low pressure areas, warm fronts and cold fronts, storm routes, air masses and off-shore wind velocities.

Following this comes a rundown on temperature readings all over the country, after which the audience is finally rewarded with a local weather forecast: It should be a nice day tomorrow with no noticeable precipitation unless the low-pressure area which is forming to the east moves in, in which case the warm air mass could be forced out, resulting in a strong influx of cold air, which could cause turbulence which might. . . ."

NOW REALLY. One could get a more decisive, less evasive prophecy from a fortune cookie.

The Weather Bureau may claim that all this extraneous information educates people to understand the many complex factors which affect weather. I say that it's a cowardly subterfuge to get itself off the hook.

By impressing on us that the weather is too problematical to predict with certainty, the Weather Bureau is reneging on its obligation to tell us what to wear tomorrow and whether or not to call off the picnic. That's the Weather Bureau's job, and it should face up to it, and quit burdening the public with its problems.

Okay, so maybe the weather can't be predicted with 100 percent certainty, but what can in this unpredictable world? The Weather Bureau must adapt to uncertainty along with everyone else. It must speak out, fearlessly and forthrightly, and accept philosophically the possibility of having to eat its words.

25 Millionth NLRB Ballot To Be Cast This Month

Some time this month a worker will drop a ballot in a box and be identified as the 25 millionth voter in an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch said the board will observe the occasion with appropriate ceremonies.

In 1935, when Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act, the right of workers to organize was the cause of nearly half of all labor disputes, McCulloch recalled. In 1965, less than three one-hundredths of 1 percent of the time lost by strikes was over union recognition, he said.

McCulloch cited this statement by the late Sen. Robert F. Wagner (D-N.Y.), father of the labor act: "Democracy cannot work unless it is honored in the factory as well as the polling booth; men cannot be truly free . . . unless their freedom extends into the place where they earn their daily bread."

NLRB elections have been conducted for as many as 78,000 voters—in 1941 at the Ford plant in River Rouge, Mich.—and as few as two.

In its first year the board held 31 elections for 7,734 voters with an average participation rate of 80 percent. During the last fiscal year the NLRB held 8,324 elections for more than 500,000 eligible voters with a 90 percent rate of participation.

Planning, Compassion Urged:

Automation's Price Need Not Be Misery

TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE is inevitable but the hardships which it frequently causes are not, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research reports in Labor Looks at Automation, a new pamphlet.

Mechnical marvels like the Push Button Miner and the newest mechanical cotton picker have left a trail of misery in their wake, it says, noting that coal mining employment in 1966 was about 75 percent below what it had been in 1948, with three-story-high machines cutting and loading 266 tons an hour with a crew of three.

Similarly, "millions of small farm owners, sharecroppers, tenant farmers and regular hired hands have been uprooted." Some are migratory workers and many have drifted to the cities in search of a job, the department notes.

These things occur, the report says, "partly because of national indifference and partly because those who introduce change are too often concerned only with what is technically possible and financially profitable." It adds: "If employers planned the manpower aspects of a change-over with the same care and detail they normally devote to investment, layoffs . . . other kinds of hardship could be avoided."

Citing a Labor Dept. study of five mass layoffs caused at least partly by technological change in city areas, the pamphlet notes that more than 40 percent of the displaced workers remained unemployed for a half-year or more and asked:

"Is this the price America must pay for technological progress?"

American labor, it points out, believes that progress does not require such human sacrifices. However, "to transform the abundance which automation makes possible into a genuine blessing for all, "America needs understanding, compassion and a sense of urgency." The report continues:

"It needs compassion to develop programs and to adjust the speed of . . . change, when necessary, to avoid dumping masses of workers, polluting the environment, and otherwise hurting human beings. And it needs to match its understanding and its compassion with a sense of the urgency of providing good jobs, adequate incomes and decent living conditions for all Americans."

Labor Looks At Automation, Publication No. 21, may be obtained from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Single copies are free. Prices are 25 cents each for orders of 1 to 100, $21 per hundred.

Story of Insurance Unions

A HISTORY of unionism in the life insurance industry is traced from the 1895 convention of the former AFL to the present in a 245-page paperback book, "Organizing the Insurance Worker: A History of Labor Unions of Insurance Employes."

The author is the Rev. Harvey J. Clearmont of the Franciscan Order, who after attending the 1955 convention of the former Insurance Workers of America, delved into the history of union organization in the industry and wrote a thesis on the subject to win a doctor of philosophy degree.

The book, published by Catholic University of America Press at $4.25, relates the problems faced by agents in trying to organize and bargain collectively against the formidable opposition of powerful companies.

Pres. William A. Gillen of the Insurance Workers, reviewing the book in the IWIU newspaper, said "such a study has long been needed." But, Gillen says, the volume is "one version" of history reflecting in large part the personal opinions of the author. Gillen reported that much of it is devoted to the "manipulations" of the leadership of the United Office & Professional Workers, a union expelled from the former CIO in 1949 as Communist-dominated.

Keenan Hits 'Tight Money':

Action Urged to Spur Funds for Housing

A four-point program to reverse the drop in housing construction resulting from "tight money" was proposed by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers before the National Action Conference on the Tight Money Crisis.

"Unless firm and decisive steps are taken to assure the flow of loan funds, at reasonable interest rates, to this vital but money-starved sector of the economy," Keenan warned, "there is no likelihood that residential construction, already hard hit, can recover in the months immediately ahead."

Keenan, an AFL-CIO vice president and a veteran of the fight for better housing, urged:

● Fulfillment of the promise that "every American is entitled to a decent home," with government-aided programs for those who cannot afford what housing is available at current interest rates.

● Larger housing program fund authorizations by Congress.

● Full funding and full use of all authorizations already made by Congress.

● "Strong" measures to reduce interest rates and increase the amount of money available for home-building.

Keenan blamed the sharp drop in already inadequate housing starts on the rise in interest rates and the drying up of the money market.

"Last year, we built 20 percent fewer homes than we built the year before," he said. "The year before, we were not building enough homes to meet the needs of our people. So a situation that was already serious has become truly critical.

"The recent very slight easing of rates in a few instances has had a negligible effect on the general (interest) rate structure. It is most certainly not enough."

(The Chase-Manhattan Bank of New York last week lowered its prime interest rate from 6 percent to 5.5 percent. Several other major financial institutions followed by lowering their rates from 6 percent to 5.75 percent.)

Interest Too High

With an increase of 10 percent in interest costs in the past year, Keenan said, "many people who need homes cannot afford them now."

The dream of a decent home for every American family should be a reality, he said, but won't be "unless we step up the rate of housing construction and increase the flow of money into housing."

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger was sharply critical of the Federal Reserve Board for "slamming on the brakes whenever unemployment moves down below 4.5 percent of the labor force."

Such action in December 1965, he charged, lowered the bars on job opportunities for those who need work most—the unskilled, least educated, disadvantaged and the Negroes—and also "threw residential construction into a deep recession."

The country cannot afford a monetary policy that "prices money far out of the reach" of the ordinary citizen, he said, adding a warning that "the dangerous policies" of the recent past can be repeated as long as monetary policy "is left in the hands of an uncoordinated, so-called independent agency, such as the Federal Reserve."

"It's time to end the independence of the Federal Reserve system and to bring it fully into the U.S. government structure," Goldfinger added. "Moreover, it is time to develop a fully coordinated economic policy which would include monetary policies as well as policies on taxes, expenditures, investment and manpower."

Hall Charges Labor Dept. Is Misusing Law

Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall has charged the Labor Dept. with using its investigatory powers under the Landrum-Griffin Act to "walk into unions on fishing expeditions" and to "fabricate cases against unions in behalf of other agencies which lack the authority" to make such investigations.

Hall cited as an example a case growing out of a fight between several seamen at an SIU hall in Duluth, Minn.

In October 1962, according to Hall, a Labor Dept. investigator stationed in Minneapolis read a story in the Duluth News Tribune relating that a Duluth man received a lacerated lip when assaulted by two men at a meeting in the union hall.

The injured man refused to press charges and no arrests were made. The Labor Dept. was not involved but the investigator traveled to Duluth, visited the homes of union members and instigated a proceeding which resulted in the indictment of four SIU men on more than 20 counts alleging L-G Act violations, Hall related.

Two of the four were acquitted by a jury and two were found guilty on one count each. The convictions were reversed on appeal and on May 17, 1966, the trial judge dismissed the indictments, according to the SIU president.

Withdrawal of the charges, Hall said, reflected the fact that the government "never had a case in the first place."

He recalled that the American labor movement expressed concern over "fishing expeditions" into internal union affairs in May 1965. At that time an AFL-CIO Executive Council subcommittee was authorized to meet with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz on the nature of investigations conducted by the department.

Hall cited recent charges by the National Maritime Union that it had been named a defendant in a Labor Dept. proceeding in an act of "political spite."

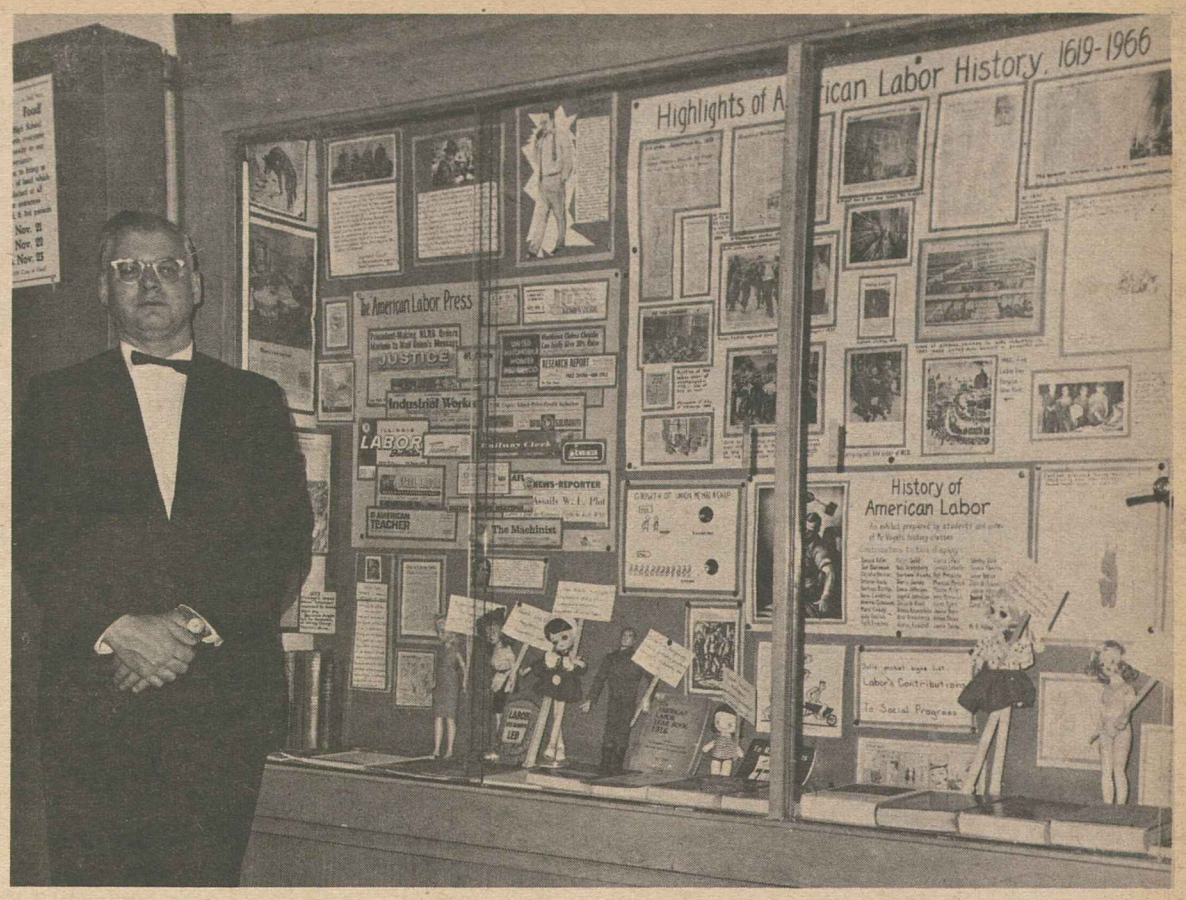
Ohio Central Body Elects New Officer

Columbus, O. — The executive board of the Ohio AFL-CIO named Warren J. Smith, 34, as secretary-treasurer to succeed Robert D. Bollard, who resigned last month to work for the State, County & Municipal Employees.

A former employe of the Superior Coach Co., Lima, O., Smith worked for the former Ohio CIO Council after his discharge from the Army in 1955. He became assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the merged body in 1959 and legislative representative in 1961. He is a

Jailing of Unionist By Argentina Hit

New York—A joint protest against the imprisonment of Eustaquio Tolosa, leader of Argentina's dockworkers, has been sent to that country's government by Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union and Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen.



HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS may often get a distorted view of the labor movement from their textbooks and teachers, but not those at Bowen High School in Chicago. Virgil Vogel, for 25 years a member of the Teachers, stands beside an American labor history exhibit he mounted at the high school. It shows excerpts from the labor press and photos of labor's struggles, and features dolls carrying picket signs with union demands for the 8-hour day, better working conditions, free public schools, collective bargaining, medicare and other social goals.

New Study Reveals School Texts Present Distorted View of Labor

The average union member's conviction that organized labor doesn't get a fair break in the schools is borne out in a "disturbing new book," John A. Sessions, staff representative in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, writes in the current issue of the American Federationist.

The book is "Labor in Learning," by Will Scoggins of the Institute of Industrial Relations at the University of California at Los Angeles. Scoggins studied 27 textbooks used in Los Angeles County 11th grade history classes and 43 textbooks used in 12th grade government and American problems classes, and according to Sessions his volume reflects this "distressing judgment":

"What is included in the textbooks invites, encourages and even demands an anti-labor judgment from the reader."

Sessions notes that textbooks are handsomer today than ever before "but, in their approach to labor and related problems, there has been slight improvement."

"In most textbooks," he continues, "organized labor is treated mainly as a source of violence and disruption to the economy. Rarely is there any attention paid to the economic causes of strikes or to any worthwhile benefits coming out of them.

"And there is virtually no attention given to the fact that most collective bargaining is conducted in an atmosphere of peaceful negotiations and that 85 percent of all labor-management agreements are reached without a work stoppage ever taking place.

"These facts are not recorded in the strange world of the textbooks, where unions mean strikes and strikes mean that everybody always loses."

Sessions points out that Scoggins' conclusions jibe with those reached earlier by Prof. Robert Doherty of Cornell University in "Teaching Industrial Relations in High Schools." He quotes Doherty's conclusion:

"There is no question in my mind, now that the survey is completed, that by and large students receive an inadequate, often distorted and sometimes biased picture of the role of labor unions and the practice of industrial relations."

Sessions condemns many textbooks for "opiniated writing . . . familiar in the editorializing of the more anti-union newspapers" but "distressing to find . . . peppered throughout social studies textbooks."

Facts Twisted

Often, he adds, they are "factually inaccurate." Focusing as they do on strikes and violence, he says, they "ignore the terms that a student must know if he is to understand collective bargaining."

Sessions calls "The Negro in Modern American History Textbooks," written by Irving Sloan and published by the Teachers, a "useful companion" to Scoggins' book.

While none of the 13 commonly used junior and senior high school textbooks examined "does as good a job as one might wish," he says, the writers have made a greater effort "to make up for past neglect of the Negro than they have done in the case of labor." He continues:

"The reason is quite clear: civil rights groups have been far more aggressive than unions about seeing that the issues which concern them are adequately treated."

But none even now does an "adequate" job of presenting the story of the Negro in American history, he says, though they may no longer write sympathetically about slavery and slave-owners.

The Scoggins, Doherty and Sloan studies, Sessions writes, "demonstrate that textbooks in the social studies and history do not deal realistically with the crucial issues of American life."

"Recent amendments to the National Defense Education Act added history and economics to the list of subjects covered by that law," he says. "This provides an opportunity for the U.S. Office of Education to take new leadership in improving the quality of teaching and teaching materials in these fields.

"Local unions and local central bodies also can play a useful role by taking time to look critically at the textbooks used in their city school systems.

"If these books are as inadequate as most of them seem to be, the unions might discuss possible remedies, such as supplementing them with objective teaching materials available from the Joint Council of Economic Education. The chances are they will receive a sympathetic hearing because most responsible educators must be embarrassed by the texts presently available."

Mailing Equipment Can Get New Life

Any local or central body buying new mailing equipment is invited by Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of central bodies, to do a good turn with its old machinery by giving it to a smaller labor unit instead of trading it in.

The trade-in value is usually so low, Smith observed, that sometimes it seems hardly worth while. But one central body's outdated equipment could be a real asset to another operating on a small budget, he pointed out.

Locals and central bodies are asked to check with Smith at AFL-CIO headquarters before trading in their old equipment.

Kenneth Thomson, SAG Founder, Dies

Hollywood, Calif.—Kenneth Thomson, in whose Hollywood home the idea for the Screen Actors Guild was born in 1933, died here after a short illness. A native of Pittsburgh, Pa., he was 68.

Five other actors joined in working out the basic proposal for the SAG at the meeting in Thomson's home. One was his wife, Alden Gay Thomson, who survives.

He was SAG's first secretary and later became executive secretary, a salaried post. In 1943 he joined a talent agency but returned to the SAG as an assistant executive secretary of the Composers & Lyricists Guild, the position he held at the time of his death.

During his film career, he was featured in more than 80 movies. He was on the board of the Motion Picture Relief Fund and during World War II, was chairman of the Hollywood Victory Committee, which supplied overseas entertainment.

At Washington Parley:

Government Unions Confer on Problems

Representatives of 35 unions with more than 800,000 members employed by the federal government looked at five years of growth under the presidential order granting union recognition and found it good—but not good enough.

The setting was a two-day conference arranged by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. Participating were union officers and staff officials who have hammered out collective bargaining agreements with virtually every agency in government.

They spoke of problems of bargaining with the Post Office Dept. for hundreds of thousands of workers, and of bargaining for workers at a small installation under restrictions imposed by layer after layer of regulations trickling down from higher government headquarters.

Progress Cited

They aired complaints, discussed solutions, and at the same time acknowledged that their unions had come a long way since 1962 when Pres. Kennedy issued Executive Order 10988, giving unions exclusive bargaining rights when they represent a majority of workers.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler pointed to the progress made as a forerunner of the growth still to come.

Union membership in the federal civil service has doubled in the past five years, Schnitzler noted, and the percentage of union organization among federal workers has jumped from 20 to 40 percent.

The newly appointed undersecretary of labor, James J. Reynolds, was among the featured speakers at the conference.

Otto Pragan, AFL-CIO assistant education director and coordinator of the conference, led a discussion on the scope of bargaining under the executive order and the wide differences of interpretation among government agencies as to the permissible areas of negotiations.

A common complaint, he noted, is the lack of authority given to local level management negotiators. Some agencies have been willing to accept mediation as an aid in resolving bargaining disputes, Pragan noted, but "most have not."

There were sessions on organizing, keynoted by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher, on legislation with AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and on developing services to members.

From the lively floor discussions as well as remarks by speakers, the consensus emerged that there's nothing wrong with collective bargaining in the government service that more meaningful and broader collective bargaining couldn't cure.

'Work' Group Proposes New Union Curbs

The National Right to Work Committee has an interim legislative program it would like Congress to adopt while working towards a long-range goal of a federal law abolishing the union shop.

That goal, the committee observed in a press release, "may still be several years away." Meanwhile, it wants Congress to pass laws to:

- End the tax exemption on unions that have union shop agreements.
- Prohibit a union shop unless a state passes a law specifically permitting it. At present, federal law allows workers and employers to negotiate a union shop except where prohibited by state law.
- Repeal the union shop authorization Congress wrote into the Railway Labor Act in 1951.
- Amend the National Labor Relations Act to abolish the requirement that unions chosen by a majority of workers bargain for all workers in the bargaining unit. Under the "work" committee's plan, a union would represent only its own members.

Revised 'Weep' Film Ruled Just as Illegal

An employer who added a "right to work" trailer and prologue to the anti-union film "And Women Must Weep" did not thereby change the illegal character of the film, a National Labor Relations Board aide has ruled.

Trial Examiner Paul E. Weil recommended that the Southwire Co., a wire cable manufacturer at Carrollton, Ga., be ordered by the board to stop exhibiting the film to any present or prospective employes. His recommendation also would prohibit the company from discouraging membership in the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers by firing union supporters or by threatening plant closing, loss of jobs or saying it would never sign a union contract.

Every Friday morning for six months, Weil found, the firm conducted an orientation program for new employes during which it showed the "Weep" film. Management claimed the film was not the same as one it had been ordered, in a 1966 ruling, to stop showing, because of an opening and closing statement by a "right to work" supporter hailing the "film you are about to see" as a "true story" and urging workers to join the National Right to Work Committee.

Ruling that the two films are equally unlawful, Weil said "the thrust of the picture is to show dramatically, and in fact horrendously, the impact . . . of action taken by an apparently wildly excitable majority of union members who engaged in a strike, marked by violence and criminal activity, over a completely unjustified issue."

The alleged theme of support for the "RTW" concept is an "almost complete nonsequitur" to the action portrayed in the film, Weil said, adding: "The real theme is that unions cause violence, hatred, distrust and community upheaval and the real warning . . . is that if you bring a union into a town, you subject it to the possibility" of similar violence.

Fired Twice

The examiner found that management had, for the second time in three years, fired a union supporter on a pretext that he had been soliciting union members on company time, and ruled that he be reinstated with lost pay. In 1964 the company fired the same unionist but reinstated him in 1966 when ordered by a court to do so.

The "Weep" movie, purporting to document a 1957 strike of the Machinists at the Potter-Brumfield Co. plant in Princeton, Ind., has been called by the union a fictional account by professional actors using a contrived script. In a rebuttal documentary film," "Anatomy of a Lie," the IAM shows the strike was provoked by company actions, was voted by most of the 400 local members and was not accompanied by the violent scenes portrayed in the film.

The NLRB has ruled repeatedly that "Weep" film showings paint a false picture of union activities and interfere with the "climate" of board-conducted elections.

Boilermakers' Parley Backs Maritime Bills

The fight to restore America's position of eminence as a sea power can be won only in Congress, Pres. Russell K. Berg of the Boilermakers told representatives of the union's ship construction and repair lodges at a meeting in Washington.

The delegates, after a comprehensive briefing on worsening conditions in the merchant marine, visited senators and representatives in quest of support for key legislation.

Such action, Berg told the meeting, was in keeping with the union's policy of working with other interested groups in order consistently to maintain a strong position before Congress.

The delegates specifically urged support for five bills introduced in the House by Chairman Edward Garmatz (D-Md.) of the Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee.

One measure provides for the creation of an independent Maritime Administration, a goal strongly backed by the AFL-CIO. The others were aimed at promoting ship construction in this country and restricting the eligibility of vessels built or rebuilt in other countries or registered abroad from carrying cargoes restricted to U.S. ships.

Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. reviewed the department's program to alert members of Congress to the seriousness of the maritime problem. He said he was not discouraged by last November's election results, calling the present Congress "pretty good" and claiming "we can work with it."

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. pointed out that Pres. Johnson in his budget message to Congress asked less than minimal shipbuilding subsidies.

Recent proposals for building merchant vessels abroad "deserve no more than enough attention to be promptly discarded," said Pres. Edward M. Hood of the Shipbuilders Council.

Other speakers included Harold M. Buoy, legislative assistant to Berg, Sec.-Treas. Homer E. Patton and Vice Presidents Maywood Boggs, Ernest Awe and Charles F. Moran. The meeting was called by the union's Iron Shipbuilders Marine Council, the director of which, Page Groton, presided.

Senate Confirms Henning as Envoy

The Senate has confirmed Pres. Johnson's nomination of former Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning as U.S. ambassador to New Zealand.

Henning was research director of the California AFL and AFL-CIO from 1949 to 1959, and was director of the California Dept. of Industrial Relations when the late Pres. Kennedy appointed him to the Labor Dept. post in 1962.

Maritime Trades Dept. Appoints PR Director

Appointment of Lawrence G. Molloy as public relations director of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. was announced by MTD Pres. Paul Hall, who also heads the Seafarers.

Molloy has been public relations counsel for the Longshoremen and editor of the union's publication, the Longshore News. He is a resident of Paramus, N.J., and has been active on an industry level for most of his career in the transportation field.

Rubber Union Staff Changes Fill Key Posts

Akron, O.—Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers has announced the appointment of Dir. Robert L. Hill of the union's District 1 as the international union's new organization director.

Hill was first president of URW Local 101, at the U.S. Rubber Co. in Detroit, and has been an international staff member since 1940.

His appointment was one of a series Bommarito made public. The others:

Kenneth F. Thornbury, former assistant research director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, as research director.

Organization Dir. Rex C. Murray, who led the first sitdown strike in American industry at the General Tire Co. plant here in 1937, as special representative in the URW arbitration services office.

Donald C. Tucker, assistant director of District 1, as director.

Field Rep. Robert E. Garber as special representative to work in the URW Research Dept.

Acting Dir. Curtis Treen of the Pension & Insurance Dept. as director.

PANEL MEMBERS at a session of the two-day AFL-CIO Conference on unions in the federal government are (from left) Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. J. Stanly Lewis of the Letter Carriers, Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks, and John A. urgency, to America's struggle against poisoned air."

Johnson called for enactment of an Air Quality Act of 1967 which in many respects paralleled the statement of policy adopted by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention.

The statement declared that the federal program "should be strengthened by increasing grants-in-aid to state air pollution control agencies, to establish strict federal performance criteria, to provide strong enforcement machinery," and to expand efforts to provide "economically feasible techniques of reducing air pollution from motor vehicles, industrial and municipal contaminants."

The President's proposals seek Congressional action in six areas:

- Emission control levels for those industries that contribute heavily to air pollution, to be determined by the secretary of health, education and welfare in consultation with the industry involved.
- Establishment of regional air quality commissions to enforce control measures in airsheds that cut across state and local lines.
- State inspection of auto pollution control devices beginning with 1968 models with federal grants to help the states establish their inspection programs.
- Improved enforcement procedures to end delays under the Clean Air Act of 1963.
- Acceleration of research into the health effects of fuel additives and their contribution to air pollution.
- Intensified and broadened efforts to understand and control air pollution with a 50 percent increase in funds for research into such "immediate" targets as motor vehicle emissions, smoke and odors from diesel engines, alternative means of propulsion, sulfur dioxide emissions and low sulphur or sulphur-free fuels.

"America's air pollution problem emerges from our success as a modern nation," the President said. "Sources of pollution may be environmental villains, but they are also social and economic necessities.

"Our task is to determine how to abate the poison they pour upon the air, without seriously diminishing the benefits they provide. Surely this is not beyond the capacity of a great nation's productive and scientific genius. Clearly, it is an absolute necessity for the health of the American people."

In other sections of his "natural heritage" proposals, Johnson recommended:

- Creation of a special Highway Safety & Beauty Trust Fund to be financed with the receipts from two percentage points of the excise tax on new autos.
- The development of power from geothermal steam springs on federal lands, such as the geysers in Yellowstone Park.
- Research programs to increase scientific knowledge of the seas' resources, both mineral and food.
- The development of research into rapid and low-cost excavation techniques to reduce the cost of placing utility lines underground.
- A comprehensive study of the problems involved in maintaining adequate and low-cost supplies of non-fuel minerals.
- A study of energy resources and development of a coordinated energy policy on a governmentwide basis.
- A National Water Commission to develop recommendations, guidelines and long-range plans for the most effective use of available water resources, with concentration in the battle against pollution of entire river basins.

- Establishment of new national parks in the redwoods area of Northern California, in the North Cascades area of Washington, in the Potomac River Valley of Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia, and in the Apostles Islands of Wisconsin.

- Establishment of the San Rafael Wilderness Area in Los Padres National Forest, California.
- Establishment of a national system of scenic rivers and trails and a $142 million appropriation for the purchase of recreation lands.

"There is much to be done," Johnson said. "And we are losing ground. The air and water grow heavier with the debris of our spectacular civilization. The domain of nature shrinks before the demands of commerce. . . .

"Here in America we started out to do more than simply endure. We intended to live as men should live, working hard, raising families, learning, building—and breathing clear air, swimming in clear streams, finding a part of the forest or the shore where nobody else was.

"If we are to have that America, we shall have to master the consequences of our own prosperity—and the time to begin is now."

4,350 Unionists Take Civil Defense Training

The labor training program of the Office of Civil Defense was presented to 4,350 union leaders in 18 states in the last nine months of 1966, according to Michael F. Smith, labor liaison representative with the OCD.

The program, which is voluntary, was given before 18 state central bodies, 62 local central bodies, the Postal Clerks, Shipbuilders and Building Service Employes, as well as several building trade bodies.

Broadened GI Benefits Proposed by President

A $250 million a year expansion of benefits for members of the armed forces, veterans and civilian employes of the government serving in hazardous combat areas was recommended by Pres. Johnson in one of a series of messages to Congress.

The President proposed a 4.5 percent boost in the pensions of 1.4 million disabled veterans and their widows and dependents; an increase in GI life insurance from the present $10,000 maximum to a $12,000 minimum and a $30,000 maximum scaled to pay, and higher monthly allowances for veterans attending college under the G.I. Bill.

School Benefits

A "Vietnam Conflict Servicemen's & Veterans Act of 1967 would enlarge opportunities for educationally-disadvantaged veterans, increase their education allowances, boost group life insurance and pensions, and assure that no veteran's pension would be cut because of higher federal retirement benefits such as social security.

It would give veterans serving on or after Aug. 5, 1964, disability compensation at full wartime rates, disability pensions for veterans and death benefits for widows and children, special medical benefits for severely disabled pensioned veterans, and $1,600 toward the purchase of specially-equipped autos for veterans with specific disabilities.

The education section would boost the present assistance allowance of $100 a month for an unmarried GI to $130. A married veteran with children now receives $150 regardless of the number of children. Johnson's plan would give him $10 for each additional child after the first.

At present a GI going through high school loses one month of college eligibility for each month he spends in a secondary school. Johnson asked Congress to grant full eligibility at the college level regardless of the time spent finishing high school.

THE LOSS OF JOBS, income and population during the four years of Wyoming's "right-to-work" law are pointed out by Wyoming State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. John Holaday (left) to Democratic state legislators Harry Schaefer, O. R. Daily and Edwin Whitehead. A bill to repeal the law has been passed by the lower house of the legislature.

'Work' Law Repeal Bill Goes to Wyoming Senate

astrous loss of income, employment and population."

In a lengthy document spelling out the state's economic losses since 1963, Holaday declared that the "blight of 'right-to-work' will only cause the state a further downward slide."

All the economic data of the last four years tell the shocking story of the law's harm, he stated. "Visual evidence of closed refineries, foreclosed homes and shutdown businesses reinforced the depressing facts of the statistics," he told the committee.

Each legislator received a copy of Holaday's testimony as well as figures which showed that since January 1965, when Indiana repealed its "right-to-work" law, its per capita income had jumped nearly 10 percent, as related to the national average increase of 6.5 percent during the same period.

Wyoming since 1963, has dropped from a position where it was $18 per person above the national average in per capita income to $188 per person below that figure.

Other economic indicators furnished to the Wyoming legislators showed that since enactment of the state's "right-to-work" law:

- Personal bankruptcies have risen by 30 percent. Private employment has dropped 2.9 percent while increasing by 6.7 percent in the rest of the nation.
- Wyoming citizens have moved away at the rate of 8.2 percent in the last five years, the highest move-out rate in the nation.
- Home foreclosures have quadrupled to where they are now twice the U.S. rate.
- New car ownerships—an indication of prosperity—are up 23.3 percent in the nation, but only 4.5 percent in Wyoming.
- While construction has risen by 8 percent in the U.S., it has dropped by 17 percent in Wyoming.

At the time Wyoming enacted its law, the bill swept through both houses and onto the governor's desk in 28 days. The day of final passage was marred by the presence of National Guard troops and city police dogs in the leigslature, though there had been no demonstration nor larger-than-normal crowds of citizens interested in the bill's fate.

Film Exchange Pact Provides $10 Pay Hike

New York—Wage increases totaling $10 a week over two years were among the benefits negotiated by the Theatrical Stage Employes for nearly 6,000 film exchange workers in the United States.

The first $6 of the wage hike was made effective Dec. 1, 1966, and the remaining $4 next Dec. 1.

Studios Covered

The two-year nationwide agreement covers the employes of M-G-M, Paramount, 20th Century-Fox, United Artists, Universal, Columbia, Buena Vista, National Film Service, Bonded Film Service and National Screen Service.

Also increased in two steps were employer payments into the IATSE national pension fund—up from $4.50 a week to $5.25 as of Jan. 1 and to $5.625 next July 1. That should raise the maximum retirement benefit above the present $80 a month, IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh said.

Other gains include three weeks' vacation after 10 years of employment, reduced from 11 years; three weeks of severance pay after three years of service instead of four, with the severance schedule rising to 15 weeks after 26 years, instead of the former 28.

The employers also agreed to increase hospitalization benefits from 21 days to 120; to allow two hours off for voting on state and national election days, and to give up to five days for funeral leave after a death in the immediate family.

Results Justify Extension:

U.S. Urged to Renew Appalachia Aid Plan

Labor "strongly supports" renewal of the Appalachian regional development program, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Miles C. Stanley, president of the West Virginia State AFL-CIO and chairman of the 11-state AFL-CIO Appalachian Council, said the active backing labor gave to establishment of the program two years ago has been fully justified by its results.

Stanley testified before a Senate Public Works subcommittee which is considering an Administration bill to authorize $263 million in new expenditures to carry the program until mid-1969.

The federal funds spent and committed so far, Stanley said, have made possible new and improved highways and access roads, vocational-technical schools, sewage treatment plants and other "catch-up" programs.

These and similar programs under way "will enable the region to become more self-reliant" and "could not have been done" without federal assistance, he emphasized.

New Atmosphere

The inter-state cooperation through the Appalachian Regional Development Commission, Stanley noted, has created "a new atmosphere" which has broken down outmoded traditions and largely buried political partisanship. It has spurred increased state and local spending to overcome the region's "legacy of neglect," he said.

"It will take a great deal of time and effort," he testified, to ensure that Appalachia shares the benefits of national economic growth. He urged renewal of the program "as part of the national attack on poverty" and to carry out the nation's full employment goals.

Extension of the program, Stanley said, should include funds for adult leadership training classes and workshops "to improve citizen participation at the local level." He asked that the bill spell out clearly "adequate safeguards against plant piracy and runaway employers." And prevailing labor standards must continue to be protected on construction projects, he urged.

Stanley spoke strongly against efforts to gut Great Society programs—"which actually account for only about 10 percent of the budget."

"It would ill serve this nation to engage in the defense of freedom and social justice abroad, and to default on our duties to our own poor and destitute right here at home," he said. "We have the greatest confidence in our economy to continue to provide abundance for all."

The Administration bill, introduced by Senate Public Works Committee Chairman Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), calls for direct appropriation of funds to the Appalachian Regional Commission. Presently Appalachia funds are scattered in several agency budgets. The bill would also extend the program to 26 Mississippi counties.

Party Bolter Loses Bid for Old Seniority

House Democrats refused to restore the committee seniority of Mississippi Dixiecrat John Bell Williams. The party caucus voted 134-100 to continue the penalty imposed on Williams in the last Congress for his open support of GOP Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater.

The decisive vote was a needed victory for liberal Democrats. Their morale, and prestige, had been shaken by the narrow two-vote margin by which an earlier caucus picked a liberal over a conservative for a key Ways & Means Committee spot.

Williams would have been chairman of the Commerce Committee this year had he not been stripped of his seniority two years ago.

He sought this year to move from the 15th ranking spot on the committee to the Number 2 rank, which he had held in the 88th Congress. This would have given him the chairmanship of a key subcommittee.

Rules Committee Chairman William M. Colmer, also of Mississippi, offered the resolution to move Williams up. After it was soundly beaten in a secret ballot vote, Williams announced that he would decline to serve on any House committee "if I can't be accepted as a Mississippi Democrat."

As Congress moved through its fourth week, most committees had at least an initial organizing session and some had already held hearings—including the Ways & Means Committee, which was readying a bill raising the federal debt limit for quick action in the House.

The Rules Committee, bolstered by two new liberal Democrats, put its own rules in order, agreeing on regular weekly meetings rather than sessions at the call of its conservative chairman.

There were moves in some other committees to curb somewhat the traditional powers of the committee chairman. The House Education & Labor Committee is expected to readopt the rules it wrote last fall when it trimmed the authority of then-Chairman Adam C. Powell.

Republicans and conservative Democrats on the House Banking & Currency Committee took similar steps to limit the power of a liberal chairman, Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.).

The House Appropriations Committee put off until a later meeting decisions on chairmanship and membership of key subcommittees. Subcommittees play an important role in determining the money that goes into government programs. A big gap was left by the recent death of Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.), who had headed the subcommittee on Labor Dept. and Health, Education and Welfare appropriations.

The Senate also had an organization issue on hand—a legislative reorganization bill drawn up by a joint House-Senate committee. Several compromises were reached to meet objections to features of the bill and a number of amendments were pending.

Ohio Court Upholds Rail Full Crew Act

Columbus, O.—Ohio's Railroad Crew Law still requires a fireman in the cab of passenger, freight and yard locomotives though it was enacted in 1902 and last revised in 1913, Judge Fred J. Shoemaker ruled in Franklin County Common Pleas Court.

The court acted in dismissing a suit brought by 15 railroads seeking to have the legislation declared inapplicable to diesel operation.

"The dangers sought to be avoided when the statutes were enacted," said the court, "have not lessened to such an extent that the minimum crew requirements are now clearly unreasonable and arbitrary."

He pointed out that the fireman, the only employe other than the engineer required by law in the cab of the locomotive, "was the only other employe able to operate" the engine.

Firemen Busy

"He spent as much as 90 percent of his time doing duties other than tending the firebox in yard service," Judge Shoemaker said.

Full crew laws were not an "undue and unreasonable" burden on commerce when they were enacted, he said, adding that there is no evidence that when applied under present conditions, "they have any substantially different impact on commerce."

The railroads' suit was contested by the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, with support from the Railway Conductors & Brakemen.

BLFE Pres. H. E. Gilbert said the victory safeguards the jobs of 14,000 Ohio firemen and brakemen, and is "vindication" of the union position that states can protect railroad safety within their borders.

Oil Workers' Staffer George Jenkins Dies

Denver, Colo.—George E. Jenkins, administrative assistant to Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil Workers and a specialist in oil industry bargaining, died in Mercy Hospital of a heart attack. He was 60.

For 10 years he was assistant to B. J. Schafer while the latter was vice president of the union. He joined Grospiron's staff in 1965, when Grospiron was elected president and Schafer secretary-treasurer. Survivors include the widow and three sons. Burial was in Littleton, Colo.

Apprentice Project Keyed to Minorities

A pilot program to channel minority group members into skilled trades apprenticeships in New York City, developed by the Workers Defense League with the help of private financing, is being expanded to three additional areas with the aid of federal funds, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced.

The project will be conducted jointly by the WDL and the A. Philip Randolph Education Trust. It will involve the expenditure of $277,688 to prepare young men, particularly Negroes and Puerto Ricans, to take apprenticeship entry tests in four major training areas—manufacturing, construction, utilities and trade and service.

Some 4,000 youths will be interviewed, tested for qualifications, screened and then given intensive tutoring comparable to the preparation other young men go through to take college entrance examinations.

It is estimated 375 of the prospects will be placed in apprenticeship programs—100 each in New York City, Buffalo, N.Y., and Cleveland, and 75 in Westchester County, N.Y.

Wirtz signed the contract with WDL Pres. Roland Watts and Bayard Rustin, chairman of the Randolph trust, signing for their organizations.

"Every effort will be made to go out and find those boys who can qualify to become craftsmen through these programs," Wirtz said.

He promised a "realistic approach" to a problem "to which there is no simple answer," and indicated the program will be built around the WDL's experience with the pilot project. This demonstrated, he and Watts said, that unfamiliarity with the examination procedure, even more than the subject, was the greatest bar to success in the qualifying tests.

Those enrolled in the program will be given medical examinations, tests, counseling and referral to other jobs if they fail to qualify. The period of preparation will run from three to six weeks, depending on the individual.

Apprenticeship Information Centers, the Neighborhood Youth Corps and state employment services will cooperate in recruiting aspirants. Raymond Murphy, Jr., who has been running the WDL program, will direct the new project.

Both the old and new programs have the strong support of organized labor. Rustin said the pilot program could not have succeeded "without the cooperation of men like Pres. Peter Brennan of the New York City Building & Construction Trades Council and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO."

Annual CSA Parley Set for Apr. 16-20

Local action for better community health services will be the theme of the 12th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services, April 16-20, at the Hotel Commodore in New York City, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis announced.

General sessions and workshops will cover community health facilities, treatment of alcoholics in industry, medicare, blood banks, rehabilitation services, and medical frauds and quackery.

Highlight of a dinner meeting April 20 will be presentation of the Philip Murray-William Green Award to Dr. Albert B. Sabin for his contribution to development of the oral anti-polio vaccine.

Some 500 community services representatives of AFL-CIO unions and observers from cooperating health and welfare agencies are expected to attend the conference.

Johnson Asks Aid for Children, Youth

Seeks Help For Poor at Critical Age

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson urged Congress to "act now" to help millions of American children overcome handicaps of poverty, slum environment, broken families and ill health.

Johnson laid out a 12-point program of bold experimentation in new fields of children's services and expansion of existing programs which he said have proved their worth.

The theme of the President's "message on America's children and youth" was that "the early years are the critical years," the disabilities acquired in childhood "cripple the man and damage the next generation."

Johnson asked Congress to break new ground with free dental care for 100,000 needy children, summer camps built by the federal government but run by local governments or private groups, one-stop child and parent centers in poverty neighborhoods, federal seed money to develop new approaches to rehabilitate delinquents.

In a broad range of programs, the President called on states and localities to match and expand the federal effort and appealed to individual citizens to volunteer their services—in some cases their homes.

Urgency Stressed

Sprinkled through the message were words such as "urgency . . . potential . . . beginnings . . . promise," and the President's concluding statement summed up the goal of all the programs in these words:

"We look toward the day when every child, no matter what his color or his family's means, gets the medical care he needs, starts school on an equal footing with his classmates, seeks as much education as he can absorb—in short, goes as far as his talents will take him."

To bring the nation further towards that goal, the President proposed these major steps:

• An expansion of the highly successful Head Start program, which has been helping to prepare four-to-six-year-olds for school. The program would be carried on to the early grades through a school-operated "Follow-Through" program involving more individual attention, creative courses and teachers trained in child development. At the other end, the age would dip down to the three-year-old level, with some ex-

Joblessness Rate Remains Unchanged at 3.7 Percent

1966 Pact Gains Top 4 Percent

Major collective bargaining agreements negotiated during 1966 provided wage and fringe benefit gains averaging above 4 percent the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

A survey of 775 agreements, each covering more than 1,000 workers, showed these patterns:

• Spread over the life of the contract, the median package came to 4.1 percent a year, compared with 3.3 percent in 1965 agreements. The wage portion of the settlements averaged 3.7 percent a year, compared with 3.3 percent in 1965 and 3 percent in 1964.

• The median first-year wage increase was 4.4 percent in 1966, compared with 3.8 percent in 1965 and 3.2 percent in 1964. Many contracts of more than one year's duration carried bigger increases the first year than in subsequent years.

A separate tally of construction contracts showed a median 6.6 percent wage and benefit package negotiated in 1966, about the same as the previous year. The median first-year wage increase was somewhat higher, however—5 percent in 1966 compared with 4.5 percent in 1965.

The BLS major agreement survey covered contracts affecting about 2.75 million workers. It excluded, in addition to construction agreements, contracts in the service, government and finance fields.

Non-Farm Jobs Reach New Peak

By Robert B. Cooney

The national rate of unemployment hung at 3.7 percent in January, unimproved from a month earlier while the job picture continued strong, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The department said the post-Christmas job decline — usually considerable—was less than seasonal this time, leaving total and non-farm employment at record levels. Since more people were drawn into the labor force than had been anticipated, the jobless rate held high.

With the January job report, the Labor Dept. put into effect what it called "an improved system for measuring employment and unemployment." The main changes greatly increase the survey sample, eliminate 14 and 15-year-olds from the labor force reports and tighten the definitions of who is unemployed.

The Labor Dept. said the new definitions would have no significant impact on the job figures. The new system lowers the jobless rate by about one-tenth of 1 percent. Under the former definition, the January 1967 jobless rate would have been 3.8 percent, the same as for December. These rates now become 3.7 percent.

Arthur M. Ross, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, speculated that the ordinarily large post-Christmas job decline was checked because employers retained Christmas help to fill pre-existing vacancies or to have a more adequate labor supply.

He said the present lack of job vacancy data prevents his agency from testing this theory.

In NLRB Examiner's Report:

Union-Busting Firm Assailed on Tactics

Labor law violations of the J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., have been so persistent and the testimony of management witnesses so untruthful that "it begins to appear doubtful" that any legal remedy can right the wrongs done to Stevens employes, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has concluded.

The examiner was Boyd Leedom, formerly NLRB chairman in the Eisenhower Administration. The Stevens firm, second largest textile chain in the nation and an important government contractor, is headed by Robert T. Stevens, secretary of the Army in an Eisenhower-era Cabinet.

In a report upholding union charges of widespread unfair labor practices in Stevens' Carolina plants, Leedom scored management not only for repeatedly violating employe rights but also for setting policies that he said led many company supervisors to lie on the witness stand.

Leedom declared that "an unending series of unfair labor practices by an employer may result in permanently thwarting concerted action by employes." Conceivably, he said, "other arms of government, with a different approach, may have to take action" if Stevens employes' rights are ever to be enforced effectively.

The former chairman also advised another approach—a "signal from the top" and a "complete conversion" of the Stevens way of doing business.

In his findings, Leedom noted that "those who take an oath to tell

Texas Farm Workers Press Strike, Boycott

Rio Grande City, Tex.—Striking South Texas farm workers are counting on pickets, a public boycott and the growing support of the clergy to win a union contract from the corporation-owned La Casita farm, which sprawls along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Strikers and their supporters, including priests and ministers, have been hauled off to jail—in company pickup trucks when police patrol cars were filled. But the AFL-CIO's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has responded by stepping up picketing and challenging a state anti-labor law banning "mass" pickets.

The consumer boycott is aimed at the vegetables and melons grown at the struck farm and marketed under a variety of labels. The workers have been on strike since last spring and many are veterans of a 400-mile march to the state capital in Austin last summer which drew national attention to their plight.

The UFWOC has responded to a campaign of harassment and arrests by mass picketing at the entrances to the big corporate farm, which is a subsidiary of Harden Farms of California.

The pickets are undaunted by Texas Rangers, who have been stationed in the area since the strike began, and local law officers. But La Casita did erect a fence across what had been a public road to

Chemical Union Breaks Discrimination Barrier

Clarksdale, Miss.—The Chemical Workers broke the racial discrimination barrier in a first contract with the Planters Mfg. Co., a cottonseed oil firm whose predominantly Negro work force voted for union representation nearly three years ago.

In the course of the successful, uphill fight for equal job rights, the Chemical Workers established the precedent that a union—as well as aggrieved workers—can bring a complaint under the Civil Rights Act. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission first said a union couldn't be a complaining party, then reversed its ruling after the Chemical Workers initiated a federal court suit against the company.

Judge Claude S. Clayton of the U.S. District Court for Northern Mississippi upheld the union's complaint of illegal race discrimination at the Mississippi plant and ordered the company to bargain with the union to remedy the conditions.

After the company complied, the judge ruled that the contract negotiated with the Chemical Workers

"remedied" the discriminatory conditions which violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The new three-year agreement, approved by Judge Clayton as meeting the terms of his order, incorporates the no-discrimination provisions of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

Jobs Upgraded

It also provides job upgradings and non-discriminatory seniority provisions including preference for present employes over new hires for any job within the plant.

At the time the ICWU won bargaining rights, none of the 95 Negro workers earned as much as any of the 20 white workers, and only five were paid above the federal minimum wage.

Under the new agreement, more than half the Negro workers are moved to higher pay grades and seven will be advanced to pay parity with white workers.

The union's civil rights complaint charged that Negro workers received only four days of vacation a year, contrasted with two weeks for white workers. The new agreement sets a uniform standard of two weeks vacation after four years, with one week for lesser service.

Pay Grades Established

A system of 10 labor grades was negotiated by the union, resulting in the large-scale upgradings.

The ICWU said that before the agreement differentials for skilled or semi-skilled jobs performed by Negroes were no more than 5 cents an hour over the base rate. Under the new agreement, differentials up to 23 cents an hour are provided.

Periodic pay raises are provided through the life of the contract and the ICWU put a 50-cents-an-hour price tag on the value of the contract.

ICWU Pres. Walter L. Mitchell noted that the case overturned a pattern of discrimination in which jobs were divided into "white" and "Negro" categories and Negroes were paid at a lower rate than the skills would justify.

Reuther Resigns Seat on Council

The officers of the Auto Workers have sent the following telegram to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany:

"This is to advise that by unanimous action of the UAW international executive board we have been directed to and hereby do resign effective immediately from the positions we respectively hold on the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the AFL-CIO General Board and AFL-CIO Standing Committees.

"In addition Pres. Walter P. Reuther has been directed to and does hereby resign from the board of directors of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the African-American Labor Center."

The telegram is signed by Reuther, Sec-Treas. Emil Mazey and Vice Presidents Leonard Woodcock and Pat Greathouse.

In addition to serving on the Executive Council, Reuther was chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy and Organization committees, and served on the Legislative, Political Education, Intl. Affairs and Public Relations committees.

Mazey, who represented the UAW on the General Board, served on the Civil Rights and Community Services committees; Woodcock on the Social Security Committee.

Texas Farm Workers Battle for Union Pact

keep pickets farther from the entrances.

A La Casita official said that the farm owned the road.

The latest arrests included five Catholic priests from San Antonio, and five strikers. They were taken into custody for calling out to nonstrikers in the La Casita fields to persuade them to quit work and join the strike.

The priests and strikers were on private property adjoining La Casita with permission of the owner when they were arrested. They were booked for disturbing the peace—two miles from the nearest house.

Pres. H. S. Hank Brown, of the Texas AFL-CIO immediately called for an investigation of the arrests by the Justice Dept., and such an investigation has reportedly begun. Two of the priests reported that Justice Dept. agents had contacted them and taken depositions.

La Casita grows and markets lettuce, celery, carrots, peppers, tomatoes, melons and other vegetables under several names including La Casita and Hi-Goal.

What makes the boycott especially difficult is that these brand names rarely appear on the grocer's shelf. The merchandise is sold and shipped in bulk under these names and then repackaged in small quantities by jobbers or grocers.

UFWOC is attempting to trace vegetable shipments to grocers. The union then plans to put informational pickets at the stores selling La Casita products.

The arrest of the 10 persons last week was just the latest act of harassment against the striking farm workers.

Two weeks earlier two strike leaders were pulled out of a small group of strikers gathered near a gate to La Casita and thrown in jail.

In protest, other strikers, marched and prayed outside the run-down, old Starr County jail during the night and four of those praying were also arrested.

Late last year 10 people, including several students and strike leaders Tony Orendain and Bill Chandler, were arrested and spent over a week in jail before being released on bail. Last summer, the farm workers dramatized their plight and their desire for a union by staging a 400-mile march from Rio Grande City which began on the Fourth of July and ended with 20,000 Texans joining them on the State Capitol steps on Labor Day for a giant rally.

UFWOC organizers, and the strikers themselves, have continued to emphasize that their goal is a union contract with La Casita, which employs about 300 persons regularly and up to 500 seasonally.

But their struggle also has called attention to their low wages and the fact that Texas has no general wage and hour law. The legislature for the first time is giving serious consideration to passage of such a law.

Longtime Union Foe Signs ACWA Pact

Knoxville, Tenn.—The Clothing Workers won a first contract for 1,500 workers here at the Apparel Corp. of America plant. The plant, organized after 20 years of effort, is one of four Apparel Corp. plants recently won by the ACWA. Two others are at Rockwood and Limestone, Tenn., and Cordele, Ga.

Freedom of Choice:

Cities Program Aims At Rooting Out Ills

"The major domestic concern of our time," the under secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development writes in the AFL-CIO's magazine, is "the need to make cities livable for ourselves and future generations of Americans."

Under Sec. Robert C. Wood acknowledges that for some years the problems of the cities have been mounting rather than lessening. The "continuing surge of people" into metropolitan areas "has multiplied the problems of urban growth and decay," he notes.

His article in the February issue of the American Federationist details both the problems and the new efforts the federal government is making to overcome them.

The "uneven and unequal" pattern of urban growth, Wood says, has increased disparities between central city and suburbs "in income, in social composition and in land use."

In the midst of apparently prosperous metropolitan areas, Wood calls attention to "the neglected neighborhoods—the blighted and slum areas whose physical decay helps breed the social decay that is reflected in such things as rising crime rates, school dropouts and disorder in the streets."

He describes the government's newest approach—the model cities program launched by the Administration and Congress last year—in this way:

"The central thrust of the model cities program is to make livable again entire neighborhoods in the older cities and to reclaim the opportunity for residential urban life."

He explains that it requires a city to develop a comprehensive plan, more than a patchwork approach, which would make neighborhoods better places to live and raise families as well as replace substandard housing. Cities that come up with such plans would receive grants "to fill in the chinks" of existing federal aid programs.

Complementing the central cities program are other new federal programs of grants for metropolitan area development and federal mortgage aid for privately-built "new cities" which, it is hoped, will include parks and open spaces, along with housing for varied income groups to break through the economic stratification that has marked much of suburbia.

The "basic philosophy" of the cities programs, Wood says, is "to give people options—to allow them to choose where they want to live, where they want to work and where they want to play."

He points out that:

"The metropolitan areas, in which such large numbers of our population reside, do not now provide the options of clean air and clean water, of a variety of land use patterns, or of choices of communities in which one can freely go and buy a house based only on the amount of one's income."

Wood points out that the trade union movement has "repeatedly" demonstrated its concern for the future of the cities. He sees the future offering labor and other concerned groups new opportunities for leadership in shaping housing and urban programs leading to a better life in tomorrow's America.

Court Upholds Musicians on Wage Rules

New York—The right of the Musicians' union and its locals to establish and enforce wage scales and other conditions of employment has been upheld in a U.S. Court of Appeals ruling, AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin reported.

The appellate court upheld most points of a 1965 district court decision dismissing an anti-trust suit against the AFM and its New York Local 802. However it reversed the lower court and held, by a 2-1 margin, that the union can't require orchestra leaders performing at weddings, parties and other "single engagements" to charge minimum rates for their services.

The court majority said in effect that orchestra leaders act as employes in steady engagement work and in television and recording fields, but as management in a single engagement club date.

Kenin said the most important part of the decision was the upholding of most of the long-standing union rules which were challenged in the court case. He said union attorneys are considering seeking Supreme Court review of the part of the decision dealing with single club dates.

Union Starts Foundation As Tribute to Dubinsky

Miami Beach, Fla.—The Ladies' Garment Workers executive board has established the David Dubinsky Foundation and voted to finance it with $1 million in honor of its retired president's 75th birthday on Feb. 22.

The foundation's fund, the ILGWU board said, will serve as a source of awards and grants over the next 12 years "to causes and institutions in line with the traditional objectives of the ILGWU, with a special view to those not covered by regular ILGWU contributions and to the encouragement of promising and pioneering new enterprises."

The executive board acted on the basis of a resolution passed at the last convention instructing it to name a special committee "for an appropriate celebration" of Dubinsky's "significant anniversary."

The foundation resolution noted that during Dubinsky's 34 years as president, the ILGWU gave more than $50 million to "many causes of a humanitarian character and that there still are "many worthy causes and institutions that deserve assistance, especially in their initial and experimental stages."

The executive board limited the grants and awards to a range of $5,000 to $50,000 a year, but not in excess of $100,000 in any one year.

The administering committee, the board said, will be composed of two representatives of the ILGWU, one each from the general labor movement and the fields of education and philanthropy and one from Dubinsky's family—all to be elected by the board.

Award Covers 40,000:

NMU Seamen Get Pay, Pension Hikes

New York—Arbitrator Theodore W. Kheel has handed down an award giving wage and pension benefit increases to 40,000 National Maritime Union members who sail 650 deep-sea vessels for 55 shipping companies.

Resolving a contract reopening dispute, Kheel awarded base wage increases of $25 a month to seamen in entry ratings, $30 to all other ratings, with overtime rates rising 15 cents an hour for entry ratings, 20 cents for all others.

The new rates become effective next June 16. On that date the companies also will increase their rate of contribution into the NMU pension and welfare plan by an amount large enough to increase the present monthly pension to $250 for those retiring at any age after 20 years of service, and to provide proportionate increases for other pensions under the plan, Kheel decided. There will be no increase in the lump sum death benefit or the special $50 disability benefits now provided.

The arbiter directed the companies to instruct their representatives on the pension board to approve the pension benefit increases. Also, the award provides that shipowner contributions to the pension fund shall be increased by an amount large enough to fund accrued liability for all prior service on a 25-year basis from June 16, 1967, with the exception of fleets averaging more than 20 years in age. The latter shall be funded within 15 years.

Pension benefit gains also were won by the Marine Engineers in parallel arbitration hearings. Arbiter David Cole ordered improved funding for pension plans covering 6,000 licensed engineer officers on 672 U.S.-flag vessels. In the future, all accrued liabilities for past service over a period of 15 to 25 years are to be fully funded by ship operators in two groups—the Maritime Service Committee and the Tanker Service Committee.

Kheel said the NMU award "achieves a condition of stability this industry sorely needs," adding that "it is of critical importance to the future of the American merchant marine to maintain this condition of stability."

Under his award, the NMU would be permitted an immediate reopening to seek additional matching increases if the companies agree to higher rates with any other Atlantic and Gulf Coast seagoing union.

The union reported that shipowners also agreed to contribute 35 cents per man per day for the NMU upgrading and retraining program.

Pres. Joseph Curran said in a statement that the agreement was won after "long, tough negotiations" and that, while it does not give the NMU everything it asked for, nevertheless "it adds up to a very substantial advance, one of the greatest single advances for seamen."

"One of the most important gains," Curran said, "in addition to the money in the pocket, higher pensions, training contributions etc., is the provision for stronger funding. This is a costly item for the shipowners but it gives our members a solid guarantee—and without such a guarantee, no pension means much."

PLANT GATE demonstration of support by 600 members of AFL-CIO unions in Los Angeles and Orange Counties helped the Rubber Workers win an election at Mattel Co. toy plants in California by 1,500-587, defeating an attempted raid by Mine Workers District 50, unaffiliated. The campaign drew wide support from area unions, including the new United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. (See story this page.)

Tugmen's Strike Wins 30-Hour Week, 800 Jobs

New York—Harbor tugboat crews here have won a new contract providing for four crews per boat instead of the present three, 40 hours' pay for 30 hours of work; pension benefit increases, and protection against job losses if owners automate their boats.

After a week's strike and negotiations aided by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, members of Marine Local 333 of the National Maritime Union ratified a new three-year contract featuring a shorter work week and detailed automation provisions. The pact covers 3,500 workers on 450 tugs, tankers and barges in harbor service.

The four-crew system was achieved without loss of income or benefits. The tugs have two crews aboard at all times. Under the old contract, each crew spent 20 days aboard and 10 ashore. The new pact calls for two crews aboard and two ashore, thus decreasing the "captive" time on board and increasing the time a tugman can spend with his family, according to Capt. Joseph O'Hare, local union president.

The new contract means a straight 33.33 percent increase for tugmen in the form of time off, but management's over-all costs will drop to 26 percent because of the elimination of oilers on certain types of vessels, O'Hare said. Oilers will be retained as engineers and will help make up the 800 crewmen needed for the new shift.

O'Hare, who first went to work as a tug crewman more than 40 years ago, called the new pact "one of the really big milestones" in the progress of the boatman "from less than a third-class citizen, in the days when we stayed on the boats seven days a week with no time off at all," to a point where a boatman can spend more time with the family and take part in community life.

The new contract means better benefits for the time a crewman must spend aboard the tugs. Until now he has worked 20 days a month to earn 10 days off, the union explained.

Under the four-crew plan, he will earn a day off for each day spent aboard a tug. He will retain his present premium pay for Saturday and Sunday work, and for the eight holidays named in the contract.

Vacations will continue to accumulate at the present rate of a day for every month of employment. Employer pension payments will increase $7 per man per month, and benefits will rise by $25 to $50 a month.

Negotiations were based on figures published last April after a study by Haskins & Sells, accounting firm hired jointly by union and management under terms of the 1964 contract. O'Hare credits union Sec.-Treas. William Quick and Actuary Philip Slater for the "pencil work" that went into the settlement.

Giant Textile Firm's Union-Busting Assailed by 3rd NLRB Examiner

the truth should do so." As for remedies open to the NLRB, he recommended a "cease and desist" order directing the Stevens chain to halt its threats, intimidation and interference with the rights of employes to take part in union activities; and an order restoring 13 fired workers to their jobs, with backpay to their discharge in 1965 or 1966.

Third Decision

The decision—the third of its kind by an NLRB hearing officer against the big textile chain for interfering with organizing drives by the Textile Workers Union of America—brought demands for a congressional investigation into textile industry conduct. The demands come from TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Dir. of Organization Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"Nearly four years have passed," Pollock said, "since the proceedings against J. P. Stevens began. Not one of the 101 unlawfully discharged workers has yet been reinstated." He continued:

"Trial Examiner Leedom has found that a conspiracy exists in the southern textile industry that has 'denied thousands of employes . . . such economic benefits as may flow' from the labor act." Like two other examiners, Leedom called for new remedies—a "matter to which the 90th Congress should turn its immediate attention," Pollock declared.

"The fact that Stevens, while cynically indulging itself in mass violations of federal labor law, continues to fatten on millions of dollars of federal contracts is a matter for the Johnson Administration's immediate attention," he said.

"There is no justification whatever for rewarding lawbreakers with federal contracts."

The TWUA began an organizing effort in 1963 at Stevens plants in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., Piedmont, S.C., and Greenville, S.C. Management launched a program of opposition that drew repeated union charges of unfair labor practices. Three examiners have now found the company guilty of unlawful conduct and a fourth charge still awaits a hearing.

The NLRB adopted the examiner's findings in one case, which Stevens has asked the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn. In that case, the board ordered management to rehire 71 fired workers. Stevens also has filed exceptions to an examiner's rulings in another case where 17 workers were found to have been unlawfully discharged. The board has not yet acted on the latter.

In the latest case, Leedom found violations by Stevens management so flagrant that he recommended the same extraordinary remedies to protect Stevens employes that were set forth in an earlier case. He advised that Stevens be ordered to grant the union "reasonable access" to all company bulletin boards for a one-year period, and that a "responsible official" be required to read the board's findings to all employes "during working time" and "by departments and by shifts."

Reviewing the testimony of "numerous witnesses who hold positions in middle and lower management echelons of the Stevens firm," Leedom said the facts prove the company "and the persons who share in the responsibility of forming its policy" are "predisposed to defeat the union and the employes . . . even though such opposition involves violating the Labor-Management Relations Act."

Noting that most company witnesses who testified about the firing of union members were "good and decent citizens" with long careers in management for a concern that is well known nationally for many products, Leedom concluded that many of such witnesses lied on the witness stand "without compunction" and in the conviction that it was the accepted and right thing to do.

NLRB reports indicate, Leedom noted, that Stevens is not the only giant of the textile industry in the South that "seems to be rejecting the national labor law."

Benefits of Law Denied

Whether this is due to a coincidence, to a "common understanding" or a fear of jeopardizing its competitive position, Leedom said he does not know, but observed that "whatever the reason, thousands of employes and wide geographic areas are being denied such economic benefits as may flow from the labor act."

Leedom said he is convinced that "substantially all the law violations" of the Stevens firm "must stem from the decision of one man or a very few men at the top of the management structure; and a signal from the top would not only correct the offenses committed against the employes, but would relieve personnel in the lower levels of management of the obviously distasteful duty of participating in an active program" of perverting justice.

Leedom found that in discharging two veteran employes when they became ill, Stevens management acted on a pretext. Such practices, he commented, are "so out of tune with a humane, civilized approach" to industrial relations that "they should shock even those least sensitive to honor, justice and decent treatment."

Such an employer attitude, he said, "suggests retrogression to the unbelievable practices involving child labor" and a review of it "should bring about a complete conversion" in the Stevens way of doing business.

600 Unionists Help URW Win Election

Hawthorne, Calif.—The Rubber Workers emphatically beat back a raid by the unaffiliated Mine Workers' District 50 to retain bargaining rights for 3,881 workers at two Mattel Co. toy plants here and in the City of Industry.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 1,500 for the URW, 587 for District 50 and 43 for no union.

A major event was a plant-gate demonstration of support for the URW by 600 members of area unions. The demonstration was sponsored jointly by the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee and the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO under newly elected Exec. Sec. Sigmund Arywitz.

The plant-gate turnout drew broad support from many unions, including a large delegation from the young United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez and Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong also helped by meeting with Mattel workers and urging them to stay with the URW, the latter union reported.

URW Pres. Petter Bommarito and Organization Dir. Robert Hill met with the workers and joined the demonstration.

The election campaign was jointly conducted by the staffs of the URW and the two-county organizing committee headed by Dir. William Gilbert.

Foundation for Security

IN THIS ISSUE of the AFL-CIO News appears a series of questions and answers on the President's proposals to modernize, improve and strengthen the social security system. The questions are based on queries raised by workers and critics—friendly and unfriendly to the social security program.

The questions, and the context in which they are raised, reveal a mixture of misinformation, lack of information and distortion. They disclose, also, the great distance the country has traveled since 1935 in providing basic protections for its people through social insurance programs.

The lack of information flows almost directly from the success of a system that has established the social security card as an unquestioned way of life; when a young worker applies for a job he fills out an application for a social security card along with a series of other forms that are part and parcel of today's world of work.

These may include, in an organized shop, forms dealing with health and welfare and pension programs, credit unions, tax withholding forms for federal and state government and many others—all signifying security and protection for the worker and his family.

TO THE YOUNGER WORKER the social security card may signify something about old age and retirement—something too far off for immediate concern. He gets little or no information about survivors' benefits for his wife and children, disability benefits if he is injured. The link is not quickly made, perhaps, that adequate retirement funds and medical care for his parents or his wife's parents will prevent a potentially serious drain on his own income.

To those who have put in their years in the work force, who recall the poorhouses of another generation, the fate of a family stripped of its wage-earner, the stark poverty of disability, there is no need to argue the merits of the "best buy" qualities of the social security system.

But the younger worker, or his middle-aged colleague who has improved his own security through union-negotiated wage increases and improved fringe benefits, have in some cases fallen prey to the critics of the social security program and their distorted and phony arithmetic and economics.

The best answer to the critics is the answer provided by the giant insurance industry, which once bitterly fought the creation of the social security system but today uses it as the basis of its sales approach.

Any young worker planning for his future, for the security of his family and his parents, will find the insurance agent noting that "social security will provide so much and so much . . . let's see where we go from there."

The social security system is the basis of every worker's future protection; it is the foundation on which everything else is built. Today that system must be strengthened and improved to provide even greater protection and security for a new generation of workers as well as those who have already put in their time.

'It's Your Best Buy!'

Landmark in Sight:

A Lot Has Happened to NLRB Since 25 Million-Voters Ago

SOMETIME during February an American worker—now unknown—is expected to make labor history.

He will be the 25 millionth voter in a representation election held by the National Labor Relations Board.

His historic ballot, like the 24,999,999 ballots before it, will help determine whether he and his fellow workers wish to have a union represent them in collective bargaining with their employer.

To understand why the NLRB is proud of the event requires some historical study. The board was first set up in 1935 under the original National Labor Relations Act—the so-called Wagner Act.

Since then, the act—through Taft-Hartley—has been amended to impose restrictions on labor activity, but one of the original functions of the board still remains—to conduct representation elections through secret ballots.

It hasn't always been easy. In conducting elections in every state of the union, plus Puerto Rico and Guam, NLRB representatives have traveled by mule train, snow shoes, automobiles, airplanes, railroad trains, trucks, small boats and ocean liners. They have set up voting booths in factories, warehouses, mills, movie studios, logging camps, stadiums, boxcars, truck terminal restrooms and have even pitched a circus tent for use as a polling place.

The NLRB estimates that one out of every three members of the American working force at one time or another has participated in an NLRB election. Statistics of the past 32 years show the immense growth in the number of elections held each year.

During its first year, the NLRB held 31 elections involving 7,734 voters with an average participation rate of 80 percent.

During its last fiscal year, it held 8,324 elections—more elections than the individual participants during the first year. More than 500,000 workers cast ballots, with an average 90 percent participation rate.

While admitting that there have been setbacks and some still unresolved problems, NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch declared:

"Workers covered by collective bargaining have increased six-fold; employers and labor organizations have reached agreement and signed contracts which specify improved wages, hours and safer working conditions for millions of Americans; and the nation has experienced unprecedented industrial growth and prosperity."

HE NOTED that back in the 30s, nearly half of the country's labor disputes had as their major issues union recognition and other aspects of the right of workers to organize.

"Violence in organizational strikes, although bloody and sometimes fatal, was commonplace," he said, adding: "Thirty years later, 1965, less than three one-hundredths of 1 percent of the many days lost by strikes resulted from walkouts to obtain recognition of employes' bargaining agents."

While the record is good, it could be a whole lot better, as McCulloch himself admitted. There are still great areas of the country, notably the South, and important industries where resistance to labor organization is powerful and unscrupulous. NLRB files show proof of that.

They show an amazing number of ways employers and their lawyers have devised to beat back union attempts at organization. There is not a day in the week when the NLRB does not come up with a trial examiner's report or a board decision involving employer chicanery on the representation election front; threats to shut down the shop; promises of reward for those who vote against the union; the use of racial hatreds, especially in the South; the illegal questioning of workers on their feelings about unions; spying on union organizers and organization meetings; the use of public opinion and overt pressure on workers by local Chambers of Commerce and even churches; the illegal firing of known union men. The list of devices is never-ending.

And only recently Nation's Business, official organ of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, completed a series of articles on "What To Do When The Union Knocks". "What To Do . . ." was all very legal, but it didn't add up to a very pleasant picture in the light of the long-held American policy that unions are good for the nation. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Man's Progress Means Little When King Winter Takes Over

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

CHICAGO—At this time of year, the advice of Horace Greeley notwithstanding, do not go West young man; and for that matter don't go East, North or South, either. Stay home.

Contrary to Mark Twain's complaint, a lot of people have done a lot more than talk about the weather, but they still haven't done enough to keep vast areas of this powerful, industrialized nation from being utterly crippled by a winter storm. Still, we restless Americans are a country of gypsies and we insist on moving around, driving through or flying over, come hell, high water or the Chicago blizzard of 1967. This inevitably results in colossal bottlenecks in which travelers are trapped in airports, bus stations, railway depots or in a roadside snowdrift like a fly in amber and not nearly so handsomely preserved. The vast extent of our mechanization renders us in a meteorological abnormality more helpless and far less reasonable and adjusted to our fate than a ward of paraplegics.

Morgan

Washington, the political power center of the world, becomes a basket case at the first sign of a snowflake, let alone the robust storm that has just hit it. Schools close, government workers are let out early so they can spend more time in the stalled homeward-bound traffic, diplomatic dinners are postponed, conventions are delayed, bars are filled, church services are emptied and hotel rooms become more priceless than key votes to lobbyists who hoped to get back to home base for supper and find themselves instead locked inside the District of Columbia for the night.

There is one refreshing thing about this silent curtain which falls to freeze the country's mobility. The more critical weather conditions become, the less devious in their reports airline passenger representatives are forced to be. They're giving out the information as they get it, instead of keeping you on tenterhooks until it's too late to do anything but slump into an airport waiting-room seat surrounded by your baggage, like a lonely sheepherder overtaken by nightfall on a bleak hillside, obliged to keep an eye on his flock while snatching 40 winks in between.

Actually, once you simmer down and your frustration surrenders to the realization that you are surrounded by circumstances beyond your control, you are able to become slightly philosophical about it all. Here we have perfected air conditioning, flameless and sootless heating, anti-freeze, snow-tires, sonar, radar, ground-control approach for aircraft, closed-circuit television, laser beams, weather satellites and altitude balloons. Then the winds blow, the snow falls and the ice freezes and we're back in the 19th century. We're in much worse shape, actually, because granddad has long since traded the bobsled and team of horses for a hardtop convertible with a tiger in the tank which has just become immobilized by a skid into a 15-foot drift.

IT'S GOOD FOR US now and then to have the wind taken out of our nylon sails and be reminded that man is still a little fellow when he confronts the forces of nature. It is possible that the opulence of easy living has carried the more fortunate of us, which economically speaking would be the majority of the population, beyond the point of no return.

Chicago, the nation's second largest city, where the elements can be harsh with monotonous regularity and whose seasoned citizens are supposed to be inured to them, has had more than three feet of snow in less than two weeks. This record fall was the downfall of a lot of nerves. When more snow followed the initial blizzard, some people panicked and mauled each other in markets in attempts to lay in emergency supplies. A psychologist observed that this behavior very likely reflected a feeling of insecurity and should be probed further—against the time, presumably, when some enemy pointed a storm of nuclear warheads at us.

Be that as it may, winter's own hostile behavior should remind us that there may be a good deal of purposelessness in our frenetic pace and that we are driving ourselves faster and faster between points only to be confronted with the question of what to do with the time saved at the other end.

One answer, of course, is to spend it in traffic jams between airport or surface station and final destination. And I, for one, can hardly wait to see what the traffic patterns, aloft and aground, will be when we start to fly the SST, the supersonic transport.

But on second thought I'll have to wait. That's about all I've been doing for two days since I set out from Washington for a flying 24-hour assignment in the Midwest without consulting King Winter himself.

Labor News Conference:

AFL-CIO to Help All Workers Charging Wage-Hour Violation

DETAILS of organized labor's drive for full compliance with the new federal minimum wage law were spelled out in a network radio interview.

AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald said Pres. George Meany has called on state and local central bodies throughout the nation to create wage-hour committees to help both union members and unorganized workers process violation complaints and to effectuate meaningful enforcement of the law.

Workers and employers need information and interpretation of the new wage and hour provisions so that both understand their rights and obligations, Oswald said during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that since the new law will apply to 60 percent more establishments than in the past, there will be "serious problems" in detecting violations, and more wage-hour inspections are needed.

Even before coverage was expanded, he said, the Dept. of Labor was "able to investigate only about 5 percent of the (covered) establishments in any one year," and "it is estimated that only one-half of the current violators are ever found." Pres. Johnson's fiscal 1968 budget, now before Congress, provides for more enforcement apparatus.

Last year alone, he added, workers lost some $60 million because of employer violations of the federal minimum wage law.

OSWALD NOTED that the new law will add $1 billion to the earned income of workers in the first year alone and create "new jobs for the people who provide services—who are the most needy in our communities."

The new law, effective Feb. 1, gives minimum wage protection to 9 million new workers, principally in retail stores, hospitals, nursing homes, hotels, motels, schools, larger farms, laundries, restaurants and construction, beginning at $1 now, and going in yearly 15-cent steps to $1.60 in 1971. For workers previously covered, the minimum wages went to $1.40 on Feb. 1 and goes to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968.

Questioning Oswald were Wallace Terry, labor correspondent for Time magazine, and Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press.

Excerpts from Text:

President's Message On Children, Youth

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message to Congress on America's children and youth.

IN 1905, this nation hummed with industrial growth—and Jane Addams discovered a boy of five working for a living by night in a cotton mill.

Thirteen percent of the laborers then in the cotton trade were child laborers. All across the nation, in glass factories, in mines, in canneries and on the streets, more than 2 million children under 16 worked—full time.

By 1912, the Federal Children's Bureau was established. The long battle to end child labor moved toward victory. Congress had pledged its power to the care and protection of America's young people.

Upon that pledge, the Congress, the Executive Branch and the states have built public policy—and public programs—ever since.

In fiscal 1960, the federal government invested about $3.5 billion in America's children and youth. In fiscal 1965 that investment rose to $7.3 billion. In fiscal 1968 it will increase to over $11.5 billion.

We are a young nation. Nearly half our people are 25 or under—and much of the courage and vitality that bless this land are the gift of young citizens.

The Peace Corps volunteer in Bolivia, the Teacher Corps volunteer in a Chicago slum, the young Marine offering up his courage—and his life—in Viet Nam: these are the Boy Scouts, the 4-H Club members, the high school athletes of only a few years ago. What they are able to offer the world as citizens depends on what their nation offered them as youngsters.

Knowing this, we seek to strengthen American families. We also seek to strengthen our alliance with state and local governments The future of many of our children depends on the work of local public health services, school boards, the local child welfare agencies and local community action agencies.

Recent studies confirm what we have long suspected. In education, in health, in all of human development, the early years are the critical years. Ignorance, ill health, personality disorder—these are disabilities often contracted in childhood: afflictions which linger to cripple the man and damage the next generation.

MUCH REMAINS to be done to move toward this goal. Today, no less than in the early years of this century, America has an urgent job to do for its young.

Even during these years of unparalleled prosperity:

- 5.5 million children under six, and 9 million more under 17, live in families too poor to feed and house them adequately.
- This year 1 million babies, one in every four, will be born to mothers who receive little or no obstetric care.
- More than 4 million children will suffer physical handicaps and another 2 million will fall victim to accidents or disease.
- One million young Americans, most of them from poor families, will drop out of school this year—many to join the unhappy legion of the unemployed.
- One in every six young men under 18 will be taken to juvenile court, for at least one offense this year.

Our nation can help to cure these social ills if once again, as in the past, we pledge our continuing stewardship of our greatest wealth—our young people.

We look toward the day when every child, no matter what his color or his family's means, gets the medical care he needs, starts school on an equal footing with his classmates, seeks as much education as he can absorb—in short, goes as far as his talents will take him.

We make this commitment to our youth not merely at the bidding of our conscience. It is practical wisdom. It is good economics. But, most important, as Franklin D. Roosevelt said 30 years ago, because "the destiny of American youth is the destiny of America."

We can shape that destiny if we act now.

SPELLING OUT the details of organized labor's drive for full compliance with the new amendments to the federal wage-hour law, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald (center) predicted that enforcement problems will be "serious." Social Security: Questions & Answers

Q: The papers say the President is asking for an "average" 20 percent increase in Social Security pensions. Who would actually get how much?

A: Every retirement benefit would be raised at least 15 percent. The biggest proportionate increases would go to the 2.5 million retirees who now get only the minimum of $44 a month ($66 for a couple). These minimums would become $70 and $105. Also, the minimums for retirees who were covered for 25 years or more of their working lives would rise to $100 for an individual and $150 for a couple.

The special benefits for persons 72 or older who never qualified for Social Security pensions—a provision adopted along with medicare in 1965—would be $50 rather than $35 a month ($75 instead of $52.50 for a couple). And another 200,000 persons would be added to the 900,000 eligible for such benefits.

For other pensioners—the vast majority—the basic increase would be 15 percent. Unless you're in one of the categories listed above, that's what you'd get.

Q. Can you tell me in simple terms—not in a lot of tables—how much we're going to pay for this?

A: Let's just look at the next three years. You are now paying 4.4 percent in Social Security taxes on everything you earn, up to $6,600 a year. Under the present law, the rate will go up to 4.9 percent in 1969.

The new proposals would raise your tax rate to 5 percent (instead of 4.9 percent) in 1969. But before that—next year, in 1968—it would increase the earnings base to $7,800. This would only affect those who earn more than $6,600 a year. It would mean that they would have Social Security taxes deducted for more pay periods, until their earnings exceed $7,800. In 1970, the earnings base would be raised again, to $9,000. In the same way, this would affect only those earning more than $7,800.

So much for the big picture. Now for the dollars and cents. Let's say you earn $3.50 an hour—$7,000 a year. In 1968, the President's proposals would cost you an extra $17.60.

If you still earn $7,000 in 1969, the higher tax rate will add another $42. But $35 of this is already scheduled; only $7 would be added by the proposed improvements.

So by 1969, then, you would pay $59.60 more on a $7,000 income than you're paying this year—slightly over $1 a week. But more than half ($35) is coming anyway. The improvements would cost you only $24.60, less than 50¢ a week.

Here's how to estimate your own added taxes:

If you make less than $6,600 a year, you'll pay 60¢ more on each $100 you earn, beginning in 1969—a maximum of $39.60 a year. That's the bottom.

If you make more than $9,000 a year, you'll pay $52.80 more in 1968; $99.60 more in 1969 and $159.60 more in 1970. That's the top.

Remember that most of this tax increase is already written into law. The new bill would amount to only 10¢ on each $100 of earnings.

(The President's proposals include tax rate and earnings-base projections as far ahead as 1989. But since the Social Security System will undoubtedly be reexamined and revised long before then, these long-range figures are not really relevant.)

Bear in mind that you're not just paying for a retirement program. You're paying for a Social Security package that includes many other benefits.

Q: You mention "other benefits" in the package. Like what?

A: To start with, there's medicare for the aged. That's part of the package. And as most Americans came to realize during the campaign for medicare, it provides financial protection for the young by meeting the medical costs of the old. (The President proposes to extend medicare benefits to those who are drawing disability payments under Social Security or the Railroad Retirement Act, even though they're under 65—about 1.5 million persons, all told. He also suggests some other improvements. But the proposed changes can easily be absorbed by the higher wage base.

Next, there's the disability insurance mentioned above. Social security benefits are payable to all those covered by the system, regardless of age, if they are totally unable to work for a year or more; a lifetime income if catastrophe strikes. And there are family allowances. A worker who was disabled at an early age could draw as much as $78,000 to support his family, even at present benefit rates.

Then there's protection for your survivors, often overlooked. A lump-sum death benefit, and monthly payments to your widow and dependent children. That's Social Security in the best sense of the word, and it's part of the package, too. A widow with two small children could collect more than $65,000—again, at present levels. Many youngsters have had a chance to finish school and go to college because Social Security provided a basic income for their fatherless family.

Too little is said about this immensely important aspect of Social Security. Very few young husbands are able to provide against their own sudden death. They are paying the day-to-day costs, buying and furnishing a house, immersed in current problems. Yet the young are also mortal. Social Security prevents a tragedy for one from becoming a disaster for all.

Q: Even so, it looks to me like I'll be paying 5 percent of everything I earn, by any reasonable estimate, no matter how much my wages go up. Couldn't I buy myself just as much protection from a private insurance company for that kind of money?

A: No. A number of right-wing columnists, and many honest but uninformed persons, are spreading this story, but it just isn't so.

Let's try to put the facts in focus.

A young man of (say) 25, just entering the workforce, could not buy, for the amount he pays in Social Security taxes, a private annuity policy that would pay as much as the present Social Security retirement benefit 40 years later. This will continue to be true, for as taxes rise, so will benefits.

This young man could buy a private policy that would pay about 25 percent more than present Social Security retirement benefits IF he could add the employer's equal tax payment to his own.

That's a very big IF, and it's not the only one.

To maintain his private policy, the young man would need to have 40 uninterrupted years of earnings high enough to pay the premiums. Social Security, in contrast, absorbs periods of layoff, unemployment and wage cuts. A worker can earn maximum benefits over a 10-year period.

But that's only part of the story.

- The private policy would set a fixed, dollar benefit payable on maturity; Social Security benefits have gone up periodically in the past and are sure to rise in the future.

- The private policy would cover retirement income only, except for some insurance provision in the event of death. It would not include (at this price) any disability coverage, much less medicare. Except for a flat life insurance payment, it would offer nothing to survivors, as described above.

This kind of protection could not be bought at any price, much less twice a worker's Social Security tax. To cite only one reason, Social Security (unlike private insurance companies) does not need to show a profit, and pays its executives by government rather than by executive-suite standards.

There are other considerations:

- As a practical matter, how would a worker latch on to the money the employer now pays in Social Security taxes on his behalf?

- How many young workers would actually set aside the equivalent of Social Security taxes if left to their own devices?

The second point is perhaps the most persuasive. Social Security came into being during the Great Depression, which followed a period of great prosperity. Many of the elderly who most desperately needed old-age pensions in the depression had, during the previous decade, ample or even excessive incomes, from which they could theoretically have made themselves secure for life. Vast numbers thought they had done exactly that, but they were undone by a collapse of the private economy which few thought possible.

Social Security draws on the resources of the whole community—workers and employers alike—to make sure that, in the public interest and for the benefit of all, every employed person has a measure of security in his old age, or in the event of his untimely death or disability. This not only protects the improvident and the unlucky; it protects the prudent against unforeseeable disasters. No private insurance can do that.

Q: Sure, benefits will increase over the years. So will the "premiums"— the taxes we pay. You can see that from this year's proposals. Why don't we just put in a cost-of-living escalator on Social Security benefits—to keep them on a par with prices?

A: There is nothing wrong with the principle of an escalator arrangement if it is properly applied. But an escalator should not be used as a way of keeping inadequate benefits in the same place. The AFL-CIO believes that basic benefits should be raised by 50 percent quite apart from escalator provisions.

Also, an escalator clause should take into consideration living standards as well as living costs. If the general standard of American life rises, aside from prices, that of retirees and other Social Security beneficiaries should rise as well.

This doesn't rule out an escalator right now—as long as it's agreed that basic increases are also needed.

Q: But let's say I'm 35 or 40 years away from retirement. I'll pay the money all those years, but I won't get any more benefits than somebody who only paid 10 years at the same rate. Is that fair?

A: In one sense, no; in another sense, yes. Let's look.

The proposals now before Congress would set a special, higher minimum benefit for retirees who had paid Social Security taxes for 25 years or more. That's a first attempt to meet the problem.

However, if you're lucky enough to live to 65, and to have earned the maximum tax base for all those years, you shouldn't really resent it. You might have bought a life insurance policy at 25 or 30, and paid the premiums over the same period. You would be happy to reach 65, but you would lose the game. You would have won— in dollar terms—if you had died 20 years earlier.

Every insurance system is based on averages and probabilities, including Social Security. There is no way of guaranteeing that every player will get back more than he put in, or even as much. But your chances are infinitely greater under Social Security.

First, you are only putting up half your bet; the employer is matching you.

Second, there are more ways you can win. If you live to 65 you have the pension. If you die earlier you have the death benefit and survivors' support. If you're disabled before 65, or sick afterwards, you also collect.

Sure, in any kind of insurance program, public or private, some will pay more than they collect. But the odds are better with Social Security.

Q: Just the same, it seems to me that the big thing these days is the old folks—medicare, bigger retirement checks and all that. I'm not against helping the old people, but aren't we going a little too far?

A: No, we're not; even from the standpoint of the very young, if they took a good, clear look at the facts.

Sure, Social Security has generally been discussed in terms of the old folks, and some young people may be fed up with it. But actually, it's a young people's program, too.

Let's start with the young and move up.

Suppose one of the old folks gets sick. You'd be right there with all the help you could give, even though it killed you—and it might have, financially, until a couple of years ago. Not anymore, thanks to medicare. You might be stuck with the deductible but you'll get off easy. That's Social Security.

Or you're driving home late one night and some nut with hot wheels knocks you into the branches. If you're just crippled, Social Security will keep you and your hopes alive; if you're dead, Social Security will take care of your wife and kids.

But let's say you get old—and we all do. Inevitably you get the word—sorry about that, old boy, but you've had it. The pay checks stop right there.

You'll join a great big club, in which there are mighty few millionaires. The average single member has a Social Security income of less than $1,000 a year; the average couple, about $1,700.

Do you think that's "too far"? Do you think an increase of 15 percent or 20 percent—or even 50 percent —would be "too far"? Would you like to live on this kind of income?

Q: I'm not all that worried. My folks have a union pension plan and so do I. Don't most people have something else besides Social Security to protect them?

A: No. If you do, and your folks do, you belong to a very fortunate minority.

Only 15 percent of those presently retired have any sort of private pension income. The other 85 percent depend on Social Security alone.

True, the figures will change for the better. About 30 percent of the present labor force is covered by some sort of private pension arrangement. In another 15 or 20 years, this will show up in the pension statistics. But that will still leave 70 percent with nothing but Social Security.

Besides, most of the private pension plans aren't all that plush. Those in the highly-organized, high-wage, highly-profitable industries pay substantial benefits. Many others do not.

The plain fact is that the great majority of retirees have no income except Social Security, and—because Social Security benefits are too low—very many of them are desperately poor. Pensions have been raised only twice since 1954. The 1958 increase did not even restore the buying power lost since 1954. The 1958 increase did not even restore the buying power lost since

Post-Holiday Drop Checked:

January Jobless Rate Holds at 3.7 Percent

The January job report showed non-farm payroll employment, after adjustment for seasonal influences, rising by 280,000 to a record of 65.4 million. The gains occurred in all major industries except construction.

Ross, in releasing the job figures to reporters, stressed the employment increases since last September. He said there was a "continuing and surprising strength" in job gains which left employment trends stronger than other economic indicators.

He labeled as "dramatic" the 1.2 million increase in non-farm jobs, seasonally adjusted, in the four-month period September to January.

Ross listed the gains as follows: manufacturing, up 275,000; wholesale and retail trade, up 265,000; services, up 210,000; government, mostly state and local, up 300,000 and miscellaneous, up 150,000.

Thus, despite a post-Christmas job decline of 1.6 million, the drop was less than predicted and so represented an improvement after seasonal adjustment. In actual terms, non-farm jobs were up 2.9 million over the year.

The extra-seasonal job gain amounted to 35,000 in manufacturing. The only weakness, the report noted, was in transportation equipment, where auto production cutbacks reduced jobs by 11,000 more than seasonally, almost insignificant in an industry total of 2 million.

Since January 1966, manufacturing employment was up by 900,000 to a total of 19.2 million. More than 70 percent of the gain occurred in the durable goods sector.

Consistent with the long-run growth trend, the report added, the majority of the 2.9 million new non-farm jobs were in the service-producing industries. Most of the gain came in trade, miscellaneous services and state and local government.

The January report showed the factory workweek declining as expected by 36 minutes to 40.7 hours. This included an average of 3.3 hours of premium overtime, down a half-hour from December.

On the unemployment side of the picture, there were 3.2 million jobless in January. Among them were 1.3 million adult men, 1.2 million adult women and 670,000 teenagers.

Highest for Teens

The jobless rates were 2.2 percent for adult men, 4.3 percent for women and 11 percent for the 16 to 19 year-olds.

The non-white unemployed totaled 650,000 in January, one-fifth of the total unemployed. Their jobless rate was 6.6 percent—twice the white rate.

Under the new Labor Dept. definitions, a person is counted as unemployed only if he has been engaged in specific job-seeking in the past four weeks; is waiting to start a job within 30 days, or waiting to be recalled from layoff. He also must be available for work.

Eliminating 14 to 15 year-olds reduces the annual jobless total by 100,000 and the job total by 1.2 million.

The important Census Bureau household survey is now enlarged to 52,500 households per month over 449 areas instead of 35,000 over 357 areas. This yields an estimated 20 percent gain in statistical reliability, the Labor Dept. says.

Martin Ward Joins ULLICO Board

New York—Sec.-Treas. Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters was elected a director of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. at a ULLICO executive committee meeting here.

Ward will succeed his union's president, Peter T. Schoemann, who served for the past 10 years on the board of the labor-owned insurance firm.

The executive board heard a report from company officers that ULLICO has had a 15 percent gain in life insurance in force during the past year—to a total of $1.9 billion in coverage—and had paid out 15 percent more benefits to policyholders.

THE NATION needs swift modern merchant ships, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler tells a Washington luncheon meeting of the federation's Maritime Trades Dept. He pledged labor support in the struggle of maritime unions to "keep the American flag on the seas" as an arm of private industry and a vital part of national defense.

All-Out Campaign Urged To Save Merchant Fleet

Labor can help save the U.S. merchant marine from "unredeemable obsolescence" by the same kind of zeal and persistence that won the fight for medicare, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared at a Maritime Trades Dept. luncheon in Washington.

At the end of World War II, he recalled, the U.S. had a fleet of 5,000 merchant vessels carrying American cargoes under the U.S. flag.

"The heart of our war-built fleet was sold off, traded and given away," Schnitzler observed.

In peace, he said, this nation must be able to deliver consumer goods in modern ships "made by Americans and manned by Americans." In times of national emergency, he declared, "we must have a merchant fleet that is fit, fast and flexible—not worn out shells of another era."

The Soviet Union, he said, has transformed itself from a "maritime nonentity" to a major high-seas power with an active fleet of 1,422 vessels compared to the U.S. fleet of 955 ships. Soviet vessels are new—80 percent of them less than 10 years old. Seventy percent of U.S. vessels are more than 20 years old, Schnitzler reported.

"The Soviet fleet will expand by 516 vessels soon to be delivered from the shipyards. In the U.S. we have 49 ships being constructed," he noted.

The illness of the American merchant marine, he emphasized, is "neglect," that now threatens "the security of our nation and the future of our overseas commitments."

The only realistic remedy, Schnitzler summed up, is for "a genuine vessel-replacement program." But, he said, "we shall embark on such a program only when America is aware and convinced of the need, and is willing to assume the financial burden."

Noting that no group has been more aggressive than the maritime unions, Schnitzler said "over the years you have been the most vocal groups for a revitalized merchant fleet." He added:

"No one has worked harder against greater odds. Let us believe that in 1967 you, and we in the AFL-CIO, will be successful in taking the first step toward reviving the U.S. merchant marine by the establishment of an independent maritime agency."

Job Testing Institute Set At U. of Iowa

The first AFL-CIO Institute on Testing, sparked by growing use of the technique in industry, will be held Mar. 19-24 on the campus of the University of Iowa, Iowa City, Ia.

It is sponsored by the university's Center for Labor & Management and the AFL-CIO Departments of Research and Education in cooperation with the Division of Vocational Education of the Iowa Dept. of Public Instruction. Attendance will be restricted to full time union representatives and staff members.

In a letter to the presidents of national and international unions announcing the institute, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler pointed out that testing has been used in industry "to bypass established seniority systems and to deprive good unionists of employment opportunities."

The institute will stress both the technical and bargaining aspects of employe testing programs, he said, and is designed to give staff members the knowledge they need to protect the rights of union members.

Gottlieb in Charge

Prof. Bertram Gottlieb, AFL-CIO research engineer on leave to the university as visiting professor, is directing the institute. Additional information can be had by writing him at the Center for Labor & Management, College of Business Administration, Phillips Hall, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Ia. 52240.

The $60 fee includes an opening dinner meeting on March 19 and a concluding luncheon on March 24, the cost of instruction and all materials, but not housing or other meals. Rooms have been reserved for participants in the Iowa House of the Iowa Memorial Union.

NLRB Attorney Named For St. Louis Region

Gerard Fleischut, a native of Pittsburgh and a National Labor Relations Board careerist, has been named regional attorney in the board's St. Louis office. He succeeds Joseph S. Solien, recently appointed regional director.

Social Security—A Best Buy for Young and Old

1954; and the 1965 increase did not even restore the buying power lost since 1958. The two raises left retirees worse off than they had been a decade earlier.

Younger workers may not feel like shedding tears for the aged, but consider just one statistic. About a third of the aged don't have a telephone, because they can't afford it. How would you like that, come 65?

Q: But this tax thing still bugs me. Under the income tax, the more you make, the higher rate you pay. But everybody pays the same rate on Social Security, even the millionaires. Do you think that's right?

A: No, it's not—but it's not as unfair as it sounds. The benefit formulas are arranged to pay more, in proportion, to those with the lowest earnings. So while the lower-paid are taxed proportionately more when they're working, they get a bigger break when they collect.

Also, the higher wage base will bring in more money from the better-paid, which will help a little.

However, you still have a point. The present setup dates back to the Great Depression, when there was an urgent need to provide some sort of income to the aged, right away. No matter what kind of insurance system was set up, they wouldn't have anything much in the way of credits; so everyone else paid a little more to make up the actuarial difference.

This may seem pretty peculiar to later generations, raised in an affluent society. But 30 years ago, younger workers were more than willing to pay more than their share so that the elderly would have a chance to live out their lives in dignity and independence.

By now, of course, this problem is mostly behind us, but the debt remains. And so eventually the Social Security system should be enriched by a contribution from the general revenues of the federal government, which are collected more nearly according to the ability to pay. But that's down the road a bit.

Meanwhile, the system as it stands gives you the nation's best chance to come out a winner. And the odds will get better as time goes on.

Q: Let's look down the road a little farther. There's going to be a push for bigger pensions, for expanded medicare—maybe covering everyone—and all the rest. Who's going to pay for that?

A: To a great degree, you are. Let's not make any bones about that.

You want a secure old age, not lavish, but with enough money to live decently. It has to be paid for, one way or another; partly, perhaps, with a company pension plan (using money you might otherwise have had in wages) and through Social Security (half paid for by a tax on employers—money you would be unlikely to get otherwise).

You want some kind of protection against the unexpected—death, disability, chronic illness—for yourself and those you're responsible for. Only Social Security can do that job for the aged, and it does it better than anything you can buy anywhere else for anything close to the price.

Yes, Social Security is going to get bigger. It's going to get more expensive. It's going to annoy you as you pay your share.

But where could you get a better buy?

Q: But seriously—where will it all end?

A: We in the AFL-CIO hope it won't end until the Social Security concept in the United States catches up with and surpasses the rest of the world.

Of all the free, western nations—the lands of our forefathers, the creators of our national culture—we are the most laggard in social welfare, in caring for the aged, the ill and the deprived.

In part this is because we Americans set so high a price on personal self-sufficiency and freedom of opportunity; "any boy can become President" and all that. Yet the concept of adequate social welfare does not conflict with the American ideal, but rather complements it.

"Any boy can become President" if he has a fair chance. In today's society this means adequate food, adequate housing and adequate education. This chance must be open to the children of the poor widow and the young offspring of the retiree.

If West Germany can spend 17 percent of its gross national product; Belgium, 14.4 percent; Britain, 11 percent; Ireland, 8.9 percent, for social welfare, surely the United States can do better than 7 percent.

In cold fact we Americans not only do poorly by the indigent, the aged and the ill; we do poorly in protecting the young against the burden of the old. This is not just faulty in principle but short-sighted in practice. For all our sakes, let us do better.

In Message to Congress:

Johnson Acts to Help Children of Poverty

perimental programs involving even younger children.

● A new pilot program of free lunches for pre-school children not eligible for school lunch benefits. Johnson said more than 1.5 million preschool children are undernourished.

● Establishment of child and parent centers in slums with services ranging from pre-natal and infant care counseling for parents, to day care centers for children under three. The centers would also serve for training child development specialists.

● A series of expanded and new child health measures. Johnson asked an additional $100 million a year for medical care for needy children, nearly double last year's budget. He asked funds and facilities for medical examination and treatment of an additional 500,000 poor children next year. He urged expanded federal support for community mental retardation centers, including money to help staff them.

The pilot program of dental care proposed by the President would reach 100,000 children in poverty areas. "Nearly two out of three disadvantaged children between the ages of 5 and 14 have never visited a dentist," Johnson said. "They have five times more decayed teeth than their more fortunate classmates."

● Improvement of the government's "aid to families with dependent children" program, including requiring states to raise cash payments to the level the state itself has set as the minimum for subsistence and making permanent the program for unemployed parents.

● Increased social security payments for children of widows as part of the proposed social security legislation.

● Federal grants to help states improve their juvenile courts, for construction of short-term detention and treatment facilities for juvenile offenders, and to help communities operate special rehabilitation programs for juvenile delinquents and potential delinquents.

● "Legislation to provide federal funds for the construction of summer camp facilities for a least 100,000 children in 1968." Local governments or private agencies would finance and run the camps. A Cabinet-level council, under Vice Pres. Humphrey, will be set up to spur the camp program. It will seek to enlist college students and others to work in them and call a national "share your summer" conference "to encourage more fortunate families to open their vacation homes to disadvantaged children for part of the summer."

Johnson asked communities to expand summer programs, declaring: "It should not take an act of Congress to turn on a fire hydrant sprinkler, to keep a swimming pool open a little longer, or provide lights and supervision for a summer playground."

The presidential message was one of a series the President has submitted to Congress as follow-ups to his State of the Union report. It followed by a few days a proposal for a new federal attack on crime, including matching funds for local governments that step up their own crime prevention programs. The President also renewed his call for legislation restricting the sale of guns and asked a flat ban on all electronic eavesdropping and wiretapping except when authorized by the attorney general for "national security."

1966 Pact Gains Exceed 4 Percent

rates showed a median 4.2 percent or 10.4 cents-an-hour increase for manufacturing workers and a 5 percent or 13.3-cent average pay hike for non-manufacturing workers covered by major agreements.

Excluded from the BLS computations were wage changes based on long-term contracts negotiated before 1966 and cost-of-living escalator adjustments.

The number of workers affected by major agreements was smaller than in the preceding year—2.75 million compared with 3.6 million in 1965.

GOP Loses House Fight On Rise in Debt Ceiling

Republicans made a partisan political battle over a routine bill to raise the national debt ceiling so the government can pay its bills, but failed to recruit enough conservative Democrats to put together a winning coalition.

The outcome—on all three votes taken on the legislation—was a clear victory for the Administration.

It was also a setback for the conservative coalition though the division of forces was basically partisan rather than ideological.

Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee warned the GOP that it would be the height of irresponsibility, not an economy move, to reject the routine temporary increase in the debt limit which has been necessary nearly every year.

Republican leaders, however, pressed the attack. First they sought to defeat the "closed rule" under which revenue measures traditionally are considered in the House in an effort to open the bill to floor amendments. They failed by a 223-184 vote.

The next GOP move was a motion to send the bill back to committee with instructions to add two Republican amendments. One would have required the Treasury to count all "participation certificates" sold by the government as part of the national debt, subject to the ceiling. These certificates are shares in loans made by government agencies which are sold to private investors. The other GOP amendment would have lifted the 4.25 percent interest ceiling for long-term government bonds, a move the Administration viewed as encouraging higher interest rates.

The GOP recommittal motion was soundly beaten, 261-155.

The final passage vote was the closest, 215-199, as 26 primarily southern Democrats joined with 173 Republicans to cast an "economy" vote for the record. Voting for the bill were 213 Democrats and two Republicans.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

ORGANIZING can be a challenge, an opportunity and an obligation, these volunteer organizers are demonstrating by giving up a weekend of their free time. Alan Kistler, AFL-CIO assistant director of organization, is shown addressing members of 82 local unions in Iowa. Only a few of the 123 delegates were paid staff members.

Grass-Roots Organizers Urged To Utilize New Members' Zeal

By Eugene A. Kelly

Des Moines, Ia.—"The best grass-roots organizer is the new union member . . . especially the young member. Get the young ones interested and union membership will go up like a rocket."

The speaker was in his 30s—alert, informed, sure of himself. The old-timer leaned over to whisper: "He was here a couple of years ago as a volunteer organizer. Now he's on a union staff, full time."

Most of the audience of 123 were volunteers, sacrificing a day off with the family to attend the State Conference on Organizing, sponsored by the Iowa AFL-CIO, local central bodies and the national AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

The meeting was not for professionals only, but for members of union and central body organizing committees interested in the theme: "Make Iowa the first 100 percent union-organized state."

It was a grass-roots meeting, keyed to an idea that has spread through the labor movement in recent years. The delegates, who drove here from all over the state at the close of work on Friday, represented 82 local unions, 27 international unions, 13 local central bodies, one Building & Construction Trades Council and one Woman's Auxiliary. Every area but one—and that one isolated by snow—was represented.

Travel Problems

It snowed heavily that weekend. Visitors from the East had to bypass Chicago. One flew to Denver, another to Minneapolis, then back to Des Moines.

After a day of reports and discussion, this picture of what unpaid volunteers can do—in an agricultural state, even a "right-to-work" state like Iowa, emerged:

● The state organizing program, with its emphasis on every union member talking an hour a week to non-union prospects, has produced more than 60,000 names and addresses of potential members. The names are matched to plans surveyed by central bodies, and when the time seems ripe, an organizing drive is started.

● Iowa added 600 new businesses last year, attracted by Gov. Harold E. Hughes (D) and his Industrial Development Commission. A majority were non-union, and thus organizing objectives.

● Sixteen of the state's 21 local central bodies have established committees on organizing. Members must volunteer for service—no one can serve by appointment.

● Affiliated unions were on the ballot in 104 National Labor Relations Board elections in 1966. They won 67, or 64.4 percent, an achievement of which Pres. Hugh Clark of the State AFL-CIO said confidently: "We plan to do better next year."

● In four years, the NLRB election caseload has increased so much that Iowa now leads all states in elections conducted, the meeting was told.

● Union-member affiliations with the state central body have increased by 14,000 since 1963, the year the do-it-yourself organizing program was launched by AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel J. Healy and state leaders.

Other evidences of the program's effectiveness were visible at the meeting:

Nearly 15 new international union representatives are serving in the area.

The AFL-CIO has increased its full-time Iowa representatives from 1 to 3.

One union representative used to "cover" all of Iowa from his home in Moline, Ill., across the river from Iowa. Now there are three or four. Another union has 10 new locals in the state.

Union members in Marshalltown, Ia., organized the Fisher Governor Co. plant, won an election—the 11th attempt—and now run an active central body.

The grass-roots organizing drive has this theme: "You, too, can be an organizer. You don't have to wait for a full-time representative to come along."

"Somewhere, some time in your everyday life you meet, see, and perhaps talk to a non-union worker," it continues. "Has it ever occurred to you that five minutes spent with this worker, talking about the benefits of unionism and in particular the benefits your union has brought to you and your family, might some day encourage him to join an AFL-CIO union?"

Weekly Reports

The worker who volunteers to serve with an organizing committee keeps a record of his contacts, and once a week fills out a card and a report on his prospects. The report is turned in to the central body, and when enough prospects have been located in one specific plant, the formal drive is started.

Iowa spices its organizing meetings by giving away trading stamps bought by the central bodies. At the meeting here, two labor veterans were presented with attendance gifts—50,000 stamps for Mrs. Inez Pontious of the Polk County (Des Moines) Women's Auxiliary, and 30,000 for John J. Coppess of the Packinghouse Workers, Cedar Rapids.

Guest speaker at the conference was Alan Kistler, assistant director of organization for the AFL-CIO. He congratulated state unionists on their efforts but noted that, although 3.5 million new members have been organized by AFL-CIO unions since merger, the nation still has 32 million unorganized employes.

"At merger, union membership was 39 percent of all workers. Now it's 35 percent, or 34," he said. "We've got to do better, and you've got to do better."

Rallies Set to Spur Support For Social Security Boosts

LBJ Pushes Rights Bill On Housing

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson asked Congress to pass a broad-ranging civil rights bill, including open housing, because it is "decent and right" and necessary to make democratic principles "a reality for all Americans."

A similar bill was filibustered to death in the Senate last year after having passed the House, and the President acknowledged that "today the subject of fair housing is engulfed in a cloud of misinformation and unarticulated fear."

Johnson appealed to unions and industry, churches and civic groups, to help dispel these fears. And he stressed: "I cannot urge too strongly that Congress act promptly on this legislation."

The Aministration's bill, scheduled to be introduced in the House by Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and in the Senate by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), includes these main provisions:

- Legislation making it a federal offense for anyone to interfere with the exercise of civil rights guaranteed by law, including voting, purchasing a home, attending a school or obtaining service in a restaurant or hotel. It would prohibit threats as well as violence and would authorize victims of violence to bring civil actions for damages.
- A strong prohibition against discrimination in selection of federal, state or local juries on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex or economic status.
- Quicker action on job discrimination complaints by giving

ORGANIZED LABOR has done more than merely improve the welfare of its members by working for programs that benefit all Americans, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a conference of staff members called by the Operating Engineers in Miami Beach in conjunction with an executive board meeting. (See story Page 2.)

URW Shapes Proposals for Big 5 Talks

Cleveland—The Rubber Workers, due to meet the Big Five Rubber companies at the bargaining table next month, will be shooting for a "Full Employment Earnings program" that will pay laid-off workers up to 95 percent of their regular pay.

The FEEP program is one of the major planks in the union's 1967 bargaining goals adopted here at a three-day conference of the URW Intl. Policy Committee.

Top objective in this year's negotiations, said URW Pres. Peter Bommarito, will be a substantial general wage increase.

To Push Compliance:

CWA Enlists Locals In Wage-Law Drive

The Communications Workers executive board pledged full support to the AFL-CIO's drive for vigorous enforcement of the new wage-hour law and called on its 800 local unions to help.

The board hailed AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's plan to have city and state central bodies set up machinery to help every worker—union member or not—with a complaint against an employer who is chiseling on the new wage-hour standards.

In a statement "wholeheartedly" endorsing the proposal, the board said Meany had "hit on a 'natural' for the labor movement at the community level. Leadership by local central bodies in publicizing the import of the new legislation, particularly with respect to workers not previously covered, can create a variety of opportunities for labor both in public service and in generating good will among workers previously hostile or indifferent to organization—and, indeed, may open doors to heretofore unpromising organizing situations."

The CWA board called on the union's locals to "play an active and imaginative role—working in conjunction with the local and state bodies with which they are affiliated—in implementing the AFL-CIO's program."

Noting that the CWA calls itself "the community-minded union," the board commented: "Seldom will we find a more challenging opportunity to put our dedication into practice than by providing a helping hand up to those now standing on the lowest rung of the economic ladder in our communities."

The resolution pointed out that the accomplishment of raising the minimum wage and broadening its coverage "will have little meaning to the millions now working un-

Meany Asks Nationwide Campaign

A series of AFL-CIO-sponsored rallies to mobilize support for Pres. Johnson's social security proposals will be held in at least 15 major cities from coast to coast, Federation Pres. George Meany has announced.

Nearly all the rallies will be on Sunday, Mar. 12.

Meany said they will include, in addition to union members, senior citizens' clubs, church and civil rights groups, social welfare organizations and others interested in social security.

Special Film

A special film report on social security is being prepared for presentation at each rally, Meany said, and there will be brief speeches by political, civic and trade union leaders.

When the President's plan for an average 20 percent rise in social security benefits was announced last month, Meany hailed it as "a vital and necessary improvement" that "should bring new hope" to social security beneficiaries.

"We believe that the elderly and other Americans dependent on social security should share fully in the nation's economic progress," he said. The President's proposals "would lift large numbers of the elderly from the sub-poverty levels at which they are now forced to eke out the declining years of their lives," he added, indicating that

President Renews Call For 'Truth-in-Lending'

A strong "truth-in-lending" law and new federal powers to protect consumers in areas ranging from land sales to meat inspection were urged by Pres. Johnson in a special message to Congress.

The President submitted a legislative program to help "all Americans" and especially the middle-income majority "who can afford to enjoy the abundance of the marketplace, but who can ill afford the high cost of deceit, misinformation and confusion."

He recited the accomplishments of the 89th Congress on consumer issues and called on the new Congress "to build on the record of progress."

Johnson asked:

- A truth-in-lending law, long urged by the AFL-CIO, "to provide consumers with accurate and clear information on the cost of credit."

Too often, he said, credit charges are "stated in confusing or misleading terms. They are complicated by 'add-ons' and discounts and unfamiliar gimmicks. The consumer should not have to be an actuary or a mathematician to understand

Rent-Subsidy Project Pioneered by Labor

Pasco, Wash.—Eighty community leaders participated in a ground-breaking ceremony here for a $1.3 million low-rent housing development sponsored by the Benton-Franklin Counties AFL-CIO, and heard labor praised for making possible the nation's first rent supplement housing developed entirely as new construction.

The praise came in messages from Pres. Johnson, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development sent a telegram congratulating the Central Labor Council and the people of Pasco for what he called "an event of national significance."

"Your ceremony," Weaver added, "will lead the way for hundreds of others like it . . . during the months ahead. It is the vanguard of what we hope will be a host of construction starts that will give form and fruition to decent housing for low-income families of our country, which is the bright promise of the rent supplement program."

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the legislation which made the construction project possible.

Central body Pres. Lawrence R. King said a contract has been awarded to the Huico Co. and work will start about March 1 on 23 separate buildings to house 104 families on a 12-acre site in eastern stronger social security would be a major legislative goal of the AFL-CIO this year.

Social Security Rallies Slated For Key Cities

A detailed statement of the federation's social security position will be considered by the Executive Council at its meeting next week.

The Mar. 12 rallies and their locations will be as follows: New York, National Maritime Union Hall; Boston, Hotel Bradford; Cleveland, Manger Hotel; Cincinnati, Emory Auditorium; Chicago, Plumbers Hall; New Orleans, Seafarers Hall; Milwaukee, Knights of Pythias Hall; Denver, Labor Center; Indianapolis, Riley Room, Claypool Hotel; Los Angeles, Olympic Auditorium, and Seattle, where the site is still to be selected.

A St. Louis rally will be Mar. 10 in Carpenters Hall. The Pittsburgh date will be April 2. Dates and sites have not yet been fixed for Oklahoma City and Daytona Beach. Rallies will be held in other cities later.

The President's social security message called for a basic increase of 15 percent in payments to retirees, disabled workers and the widows and children of deceased workers. Much higher proportionate increases would go to those now drawing the minimum sums of $44 a month for an individual or $66 for a couple. These would be raised to $70 and $105, respectively. These and other improvements bring the total package to an average 20 percent increase.

National Pension Plan Approved by Painters

Miami Beach—A voluntary national pension fund has been approved by the general board of the painters at a meeting here.

Details of the plan are being worked out by a board subcommittee headed by Vice Pres. Frank J. O'Connor, but it is expected to be patterned after the national pension plan of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which is aimed particularly at making retiree benefit plans feasible for small units through a pooling of funds.

Pres. S. Frank Raftery hailed the plan for a national pension fund as a major forward step and said it would "give mobility" to the union's 200,000 members "so that individuals can move from job to job and region to region without sacrificing protection and coverage."

Raftery added that the voluntary national pension would open the door for subsequent health and welfare programs. He explained that no convention approval was necessary and that the plan would go into operation in a matter of weeks.

A feature of the plan is that it is open to participation by employers, management officials and even non-members as well as members of the brotherhood.

Raftery noted that hundreds of Painters' locals presently have no pension plans and the new program would enable smaller locals to obtain pension coverage which, independently, they never would be able to achieve.

He listed these advantages of the national fund:

- Simplified bargaining centering on local employer contributions and eliminating wrangling over technical aspects.
- Lower costs through centralized administration of many items of expense.
- Continuity of pension benefits permitting workers to retain pension rights when they shift from one contributing employer to another.

Under the plan, each employe's normal pension benefit will depend on the amount of employer contributions made on his behalf.

The plan will be administered by a joint board of trustees composed equally of union and employer representatives.

Station Gives Air Time; Fairness Dispute Settled

The AFL-CIO's acceptance of free radio time to answer a series of critical editorials has brought an end to its dispute with an Ohio broadcaster. Also terminated was the federation's complaint to the Federal Communications Commission in which the station's fitness to continue as a license holder was questioned.

Radio station WMRN of Marion, Ohio, on Feb. 5 broadcast a pretaped program prepared by the AFL-CIO in answer to criticism of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other labor representatives last August during the airline mechanics' strike.

The federation had objected to the charge by the station's owner and president that Meany had threatened Congress with political retaliation if anti-strike legislation were enacted.

When documentation was furnished proving that Meany had not made such a threat, a more critical editorial was broadcast. Further correspondence produced a third editorial critical of AFL-CIO representatives for taking issue with the station's on-the-air statements.

When attempts to correct the editorial statements failed, the federation made a request to the station for answering air time under the provisions of the FCC's Fairness Doctrine. Receiving no reply, the AFL-CIO filed a complaint with the FCC and asked for a hearing into the station's competence to hold a broadcast license in view of its violation of the fairness doctrine. The station had failed to afford "reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on an issue of public importance," the complaint stated.

In its answer to the FCC, the station pleaded that "an unavoidable set of circumstances" had led to the AFL-CIO complaint. Chief of these, it said, was the illness and death of the station owner and president shortly after the AFL-CIO request for air time had been made. The letter noted that the station owner personally delivered all editorials and also handled all related correspondence himself, which had led to problems in view of his winter-time trips to Florida.

"As has always been the policy of the station," the letter stated, "we stand ready now to offer equal time to respond to the editorial in question. We will be only too glad to work out suitable arrangements."

The AFL-CIO accepted the station's explanation and in view of the dispute arising at the time of the owner's fatal illness accepted the airtime and withdrew its complaint to the FCC. Ownership of the station has since changed hands.

Air Line Union Wins 66c Hike In United Pact

Chicago—A new contract boosting wages 66 cents an hour over three years has been approved by flight simulator operators for United Air Lines.

The simulator operators assist in training programs and are members of the Air Line Employes Association, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. Under the new contract base pay was set at $619.50 a month, rising to a top of $869 after seven years.

The agreement also provides for a voluntary dues checkoff, an eighth paid holiday, double time and a half for holidays worked, severance pay after two years for employes separated through no fault of their own, three weeks of vacation after eight years and four weeks after 15 years, and full employer payment of group accident and sickness insurance premiums.

Cuts Held Threat to Jobs:

Building Trades Ask Road Funds Release

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cutbacks in the nation's highway building program will "seriously jeopardize the construction industry" and cause "a substantial increase in unemployment," the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. warned.

The department's executive council meeting here called on the Administration to restore the funds cut earlier this year and allow the road construction program to proceed on schedule.

Pres. Johnson has ordered highway building funds reduced by $700 million in terms of the Administration's total economic and budgetary needs. About 12,000 miles of the proposed 41,000 mile interstate highway program have yet to be started. About 5,600 miles are presently under construction.

At its three-day session the BCTD council also received a progress report from the Battelle Memorial Institute which is conducting for the department an in-depth study of prefabrication in the construction industry. The 10-month research project is progressing on schedule, representatives of the institute told the council, with information being collected and analyzed and in-depth interviews continuing with builders, architects, manufacturers and others in the field.

The researchers said they had reached no firm conclusion but noted that there has been a "natural evolutionary process" in prefabrication and more work is moving from the job site to the factory. This trend will not slow down between now and 1975, the study's time objective, but there are no firm indications as to whether it will accelerate beyond the present pace, they said.

The study involves factors such as land costs and transportation as well as new materials and manufacturing processes. The detailed research was set up and is financed by the BCTD with a final report expected by the end of the year.

The council voted full support of the current strike by the Elevator Constructors against 70 firms in the industry involving 16,000 workers. (Story, Page 3.)

In other actions the council headed by BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty:

- Heard a report from H. T. Herrick, director of labor relations for the Atomic Energy Commission, on reported plans for construction of two new test sites and the manpower needs involved.
- Adopted a resolution endorsing the 25th anniversary celebration of the Seabees and urged all affiliates to support the anniversary committee in reaching its fund goal.
- Received a detailed report from Dir. Alexander Bookstaver of the AFL-CIO Investment Dept. on the federation's mortgage investment trust—a pooled fund for investment in federally-insured housing mortgages available to all affiliates and qualified labor-management pension or welfare plans. Bookstaver noted that information on the AFL-CIO trust plan should be more widely disseminated to locals of building trades unions so that funds are wisely used to improve returns to the unions as well as to provide needed mortgage money for the building industry.
- Heard BCTD Legislative Rep. Walter Mason review the outlook for legislation in the 90th Congress including a prediction of a "fair chance" of passing situs picketing legislation at the current session.
- Listened to a discussion by Martin Segal, active in union pension and welfare fund activities, on new legislative proposals in the current Congress covering pension regulation.

Staff Briefing Highlights Meeting of IUOE Board

Miami Beach—The general board of the Operating Engineers brought 80 IUOE staff members to its meeting here as part of a continuing effort to keep the union's 300 locals fully informed on policies, programs and available services.

Instead of the customary closed sessions, the board and Pres. Hunter P. Wharton conducted a number of open "appraisals" meetings for the 70 field representatives and 10 headquarters staff members.

The staff personnel also heard from employers, government officials and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany regarding the trends and outlook in the construction industry.

Both employers and government representatives stressed the need of better planning, including a possible "stagger system" for contract letting, to reduce seasonality in the industry and assure work continuity.

Meany pointed out that it is the duty of organized groups to help those who cannot help themselves. He observed that by working for broad programs that advance the welfare of all, such as medicare and wage-hour legislation, organized labor has done far more than merely improve its own situation.

Wharton stressed the necessity of close contact between the field staff and local unions, so that the locals are kept aware of the wide range of assistance available to them from the international offices.

Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman described the operation of the international's monthly report system.

Hugh Murphy, administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, complimented the Operating Engineers for moving "far out ahead" in their training and retraining programs.

WARM WELCOME was extended by Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks to 500 guests at the union's annual open house for Washington dignitaries, including congressmen, senators and Cabinet members. Here Dennis greets Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Rep. Brock Adams (D-Wash.), and Hazel Bergstrom of the U.S. Employment Service.

A Slingshot Against Goliath:

Inadequate NLRB Remedies Pointed Up by Stevens Case

By Eugene A. Kelly

The latest findings of a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner of "massive and deliberate" labor law violations by J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., have focused new attention on the inadequacy of NLRB remedies against flagrant unfair labor practices.

Three examiners, and the board itself, have pinpointed the big textile chain's defiance of law. In separate reports they have directed the Stevens firm to rehire 103 union supporters fired illegally since the Textile Workers Union of America began organizing in Carolina plants of the Stevens empire in 1963.

Yet not one discharged worker has been returned to his job and the firm's studied law violations continue, according to the fourth in a series of charges filed with the NLRB by the TWUA.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee, proposed last May that instead of what he called "wrist-slapping" penalties now provided by the Taft-Hartley law, the NLRB be given the power to impose double or triple damages on deliberate violators and that other agencies be authorized to withhold government contracts from companies in that category.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock recently called for a congressional investigation of lawbreaking by firms such as Stevens, and a policy of rejecting bids on government contracts from such offenders.

Family Firm

Stevens is a family-owned firm headed by Robert T. Stevens—a former Army Secretary under Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower—and a winner of government contracts despite its record.

The company's anti-union policies were found so flagrant that the latest trial examiner to hear charges—Boyd Leedom, former NLRB chairman in the Eisenhower Administration—said "it begins to appear doubtful" that any legal remedy can right the wrongs done Stevens employes unless "other arms of government, with a different approach," take other action to enforce employes' rights to self-organization.

Leedom did not say what other approach he favors, but he did advise the board to order the reinstatement of 13 wrongfully fired employes, with pay for time lost; to order Stevens to cease its illegal conduct, including threats and demotions; and to take the extraordinary steps of having a responsible company official read the board's cease-and-desist order to all employes during working time on each shift, and to give the union "reasonable access" to all Stevens bulletin boards for at least one year.

Reviewing the testimony of numerous management witnesses, Leedom concluded that many lied "without compunction" in the conviction that it was the accepted thing to do because of company policy.

Other NLRB reports indicate, Leedom wrote, that Stevens is not the only textile giant in the South that "seems to be rejecting the national labor law." Whatever the reason, he asserted, "thousands of employes and wide geographic areas are being denied" the benefits of the labor act.

Firings 'Shocking'

Finding that two veteran Stevens employes were discharged on a pretext when they became ill, Leedom called the firings "so out of tune" with a humane, civilized approach that "they should shock even those least sensitive to honor, justice and decent treatment."

Leedom concluded that most law violations by the Stevens firm "must stem from the decision of one man or a very few men at the top of the management structure;" and a "signal from the top" would correct such decisions.

Last Mar. 22, the NLRB affirmed findings by Examiner Horace A. Ruckel of "flagrant unlawfulness" in the company labor relations. It ordered 71 fired workers restored to their jobs with back pay, and applied the extraordinary remedies, prescribed by Leedom in the later case, to overcome the Stevens law violations.

Union-Crushers

Telling how Stevens management drove out union supporters by harassment, Ruckel reported that the company, "through its plant superintendents, acting in collaboration, initiated and pursued a pattern of conduct . . . to crush the union movement." He added:

"With scant regard for the means employed other than their effectiveness, it interfered with, restrained and coerced its employes in the exercise of their rights . . . flagrantly, cynically, unlawfully."

In a report Jan. 18, 1966, the same examiner recommended the rehiring of 19 other employes fired for union activity at other plants. The company, he found, was guilty of a "continued, systematic determination" to "destroy the union root and branch by discharging its most active members on any pretext which might come to hand, or could be invented."

No other conclusion could be drawn from the testimony of numerous witnesses, Ruckel related, than that Stevens "largely succeeded in its purpose" of driving the union out of plants in Rock Hill and Greenville, S.C., and Roanoke Rapids, N.C.

The board's findings of March 1966 have been appealed by Stevens management. Of these findings, Thompson said on the floor of the House last May 24 that the company "has so far lost all the (legal) battles but has won the war. It has achieved its objective—to keep the union out." He continued:

"Its violations of the law, assuming the court upholds the labor board, will be punished by a wrist-slapping. The contest between the J. P. Stevens Co. and the United States government is unequal."

Congress "sends the labor board with a slingshot to enforce our laws against an armored Goliath," Thompson said, adding "if we want the laws we pass enforced, we must equip the agencies we create with power to deter the law violators."

He proposed legislation to:

- Give the NLRB authority to assess double or triple damages against law violators who have been "deliberate or repeated or flagrant" in their flouting of the labor laws.
- Give agencies of government the power to withhold contracts from companies that the labor board finds to be in "open, flagrant, knowing and purposeful violation of our laws."

Action is necessary, Thompson told the House, "if we are to demonstrate that the U.S. government is larger than the total of its parts."

A CITATION for long-term activity in working for the rehabilitation of the mentally ill was presented to Pres. Victor Bussie (right) of the Louisiana AFL-CIO by the American Trial Lawyers Association at a meeting in New Orleans. The presentation was made by Raymond H. Kierr, New Orleans lawyer and a conference speaker.

Bussie Cited for Work In Mental Rehabilitation

New Orleans, La.—The American Trial Lawyers Association honored Pres. Victor Bussie of the Louisiana AFL-CIO at a meeting here for his many years of work in rehabilitating victims of mental illness.

Bussie was given a citation for exceptional merit for his extensive efforts to restore the victims of industrial pace and pressure to their families and their jobs.

The citation was presented at a special ATLA midwinter conference called to examine the question of how far the law must delve into mental and emotional illnesses to protect the legal rights of all citizens.

It hailed also Bussie's "unique contribution" in other civic and charitable areas, citing specifically the rehabilitation of paroled prisoners, and victims of cerebral palsy, and aid to hearing defects, education, medicine and civil defense.

Bussie in an acceptance speech invited the trial lawyers' group to join the Mental Health Association, in which he is a leader, in the fight against mental illness.

He particularly sought help for the mentally ill who have improved with hospitalization to the point where they can be discharged but who need "aftercare and rehabilitation services."

"More than likely, they are the former patients with whom you come in contact," he told the trial attorneys.

"They are the persons who may become involved in accidents or other difficulties on the job or in the community that would require legal assistance. They are the ones you will be directing to the community agencies for additional services. If we are to help them psychiatrically or legally, the needed services of rehabilitation must be available.

Major Problem

Bussie pointed to the vastness of the problem, noting that more persons are hospitalized because of mental illness than all diseases combined.

"According to national statistics," he said, "one out of every two patients released from mental hospitals will probably return. However, with adequate aftercare follow-up and rehabilitative services, this number can be reduced to only one out of 10.

"Thus, with this new approach, a large part of the treatment program must be in the community, in forms once considered unorthodox."

Bussie emphasized that rehabilitative treatment does not minimize the importance of psychiatric care, but "only supports the gains" from such treatment.

Earnings Guarantee Set As Rubber Union Goal

The policy body also called for a 1968 wage reopener, two more paid holidays, better vacation pay and upgrading of URW skilled tradesmen to the level of craftsmen in the auto industry.

Bommarito said FEEP would be an incentive to the rubber companies to do a better job of production planning to keep employes working steadily.

This, in turn, would bring URW members the type of employment and payroll security presently enjoyed only by salaried workers.

He said FEEP would be based on the Supplemental Unemployment Benefits program which now costs the companies 5 cents per manhour and provides laid-off employes up to 65 percent of their pay.

FEEP would cost the companies 2 cents more per manhour, Bommarito said, and would pay laid-off workers the difference between state unemployment compensation and 92.5 percent of their regular pay.

If the worker doesn't qualify for unemployment compensation or has exhausted his claims he would get 95 percent of his wages under FEEP.

The program also calls for short workweek benefits of up to 95 percent of the hourly rate for workers who are sent home after a day or two in any week. Companies would be required to reimburse the SUB fund directly for any short week benefits paid out. This would be an inducement for them to keep workers on the job, Bommarito said.

The object of FEEP, he declared, is to provide URW members with "a year around job with year around pay," not something for nothing.

He said employes would still have the incentives of overtime pay, higher vacation pay based on average earnings, extra holiday pay and the penalties of lost sick and accident insurance coverage and having to pay their own life insurance and, in some cases, hospitalization after a time.

URW contracts covering more than 75,000 employes of Goodyear, Firestone, U.S. Rubber and B. F. Goodrich expire Apr. 20. The contract with General Tire runs out May 15. Negotiations are to begin in mid-March.

Elevator Strike Talks Reopen In Washington

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Elevator Constructors maintained picket lines in a nationwide strike against the National Elevator Mfg. Industry, Inc., and signed interim agreements with independent contractors as new talks began in Washington.

Negotiators for the 16,000 strikers and 70 firms in the employers' association came back to the bargaining table at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The union called its first strike in 45 years on Feb. 3 and has picketed company locations in major cities except New York, where it has a separate agreement.

At headquarters here, union Sec.-Treas. Thomas E. Fitzgerald said IUEC locals have signed tentative agreements with about 130 independent firms and expect to sign with 270 other independents. The union wants modernization and clarification of language in the wage formula it has had with the industry association. Since 1921 the wage rate has been determined by averaging the five highest rates of the other building trades.

Union members have provided emergency service to the public, Fitzgerald said, despite the association's refusal to cooperate in setting up an emergency service plan.

Crull to Retire From CWA Post

Executive Vice Pres. John L. Crull of the Communications Workers has announced that he will retire March 31. He was 65 last Aug. 4.

The CWA executive board, in accordance with the union constitution, elected as his successor Vice Pres. George E. Gill of Atlanta, Ga., whose district covers the nine southeastern states. Gill's assistant, Willard W. Brown, was named to succeed him.

A native of Geneseo, Ill., Crull became interested in unionism while working for the Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. in 1936 and the following year was active in getting the Southwestern Telephone Workers Union to issue a charter to Wichita, Kan., Local 1261. He held a series of posts with the former National Federation of Telephone Workers, started a full-time union career in 1945, and two years later became CWA's first vice president.

Manitoba Labor Asks $1.75 Minimum Wage

Winnipeg, Man.—A proposal that the $1 an hour provincial minimum wage be increased to $1.75 highlighted the annual presentation of the Manitoba Federation of Labor, CLC, to the cabinet of Premier Duff Roblin.

New Approach Needed

CAN A GIANT EMPLOYER committed to a campaign of union-busting flout the labor-relations laws of the United States while the government stands by helplessly?

Can the National Labor Relations Act, which guarantees the rights of workers to join unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively, in reality protect and enforce those rights?

These questions are raised by the case involving J. P. Stevens & Co., second largest textile chain in the U.S., a giant that has thrown all its resources into a bitter-end battle to prevent unionization of its employes.

Recently a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner found that Stevens is guilty of the grossest violations of the act and recommended the strongest possible action available to the NLRB.

This is the third trial examiner who has so found. What gave this latest finding precedent-shattering importance is the admission by the examiner that the NLRB may be helpless in protecting workers from the company's union-busting tactics. (Story, Page 3.)

Boyd Leedom, who handed down the latest finding, is a responsible conservative intimately aware of the functions and duties of the NLRB. He served as NLRB chairman for a full term under an appointment from former Pres. Eisenhower. Here is his conclusion about the Stevens case:

"It begins to appear doubtful if any remedy legitimately devised within the framework of the Labor Management Relations Act will right the wrongs of an employer who persists in violations in the way the respondent [company] has persisted. I take notice that since this proceeding began a fourth complaint has been filed against respondent. An unending series of unfair labor practices by an employer may result in permanently thwarting concerted action by employes. Conceivably other arms of government, with a different approach, may have to take action if this respondent's employes' rights are ever effectively enforced. . . ."

LEEDOM'S VIEWS were foreshadowed in a speech in the U.S. House of Representatives by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., in May 1966 discussing the Stevens case in terms of the effectiveness of the 30-year-old Wagner Act. The case demonstrates, said Thompson, that "the act is not effective in the face of recalcitrant and deliberate obstruction to the congressional mandate."

Reviewing the case in detail and the remedies available, Thompson concluded that "the J. P. Stevens Co. has so far lost all the battles but has won the war. It has achieved its objective —to keep the union out. Its violations of the law, assuming the reviewing court upholds the labor board, will be punished by a wrist-slapping. The contest between the J. P. Stevens Co. and the U.S. government is unequal."

The congressman recommended authority for the NLRB to assess double or treble damages against firms deliberately, repeatedly or flagrantly violating the law and urged withholding of government contracts from these violators.

Leedom says other arms of the government may have to take action to assure effective enforcement of workers' rights.

Whatever course is pursued, action is imperative if the nation's labor laws are not to be made a complete mockery. As Thompson commented, it is urgent to demonstrate "that the United States government is larger than the total of its parts."

Expert and Layman Agree:

Social Security System Proves Its Success over 31-Year Span

The following article on social security by Economist Paul Samuelson appeared in the Feb. 13, 1967, issue of Newsweek.

WHICH PROGRAM of the modern welfare state has been, by all odds, most successful? Undoubtedly, the social-security program. And it is a remarkable fact that both expert and layman will agree on this judgment.

It was not always thus. Just 31 years ago the social-security system came into operation. This New Deal measure was hotly contested. The insurance industry fought the program tooth and nail. Suicidally, the Republican Party denounced the concepts of old-age insurance and unemployment compensation as acts of the devil—the opening wedge to socialism. Even many of the pioneering exponents of social insurance came to blows over details of the program and bitterly resisted entry by the federal government into this area of activity.

History has by now rendered its verdict. Those who said that a centralized system would break down from the sheer weight of the bookkeeping were proved wrong in the first year of the program. The punch-card machine in Baltimore did the job at costs far below those of the original estimates, and even farther below the costs involved in the largest of our private insurance companies.

Our experience with social security is instructive for other progressive programs, past and yet to come. Consider, for example, the role played by "states' rights." This is a large and diversified country; and what could be more natural than to think that, just as each province is entitled to its own folk dances and customs, so the different states ought to be encouraged to experiment with their own varieties of social legislation.

A pretty theory. But what is the pragmatic truth? Every informed person knows that the federal part of social security—the old-age insurance system—has worked out efficiently and equitably, free of graft and arbitrary bureaucratic intrigue. But, when it comes to the state-run unemployment-compensation program, we find 50 different systems that differ primarily in trifling details. Instead of creative, regional differences, the only significant disparities involve the attempt of the least humane regions to steal industry away from the rest, penalizing those areas most concerned to maintain decent standards.

An acute moralist said, "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel." If Dr. Johnson were alive, he would add, "And states' rights is the first refuge of a reactionary."

The notion that grass-roots government is good government is a myth. The courthouse gangs of the country and the political machines of our cities, at the two-thirds mark in the Twentieth Century, are both irresponsible and unresponsive. Experts in the discipline of public administration have learned that the hand from Washington, far from being the hand that deadens, is the hand that purifies—that introduces civil service and minimal auditing of the petty cash.

SOCIAL INSURANCE makes sense because we are all in the same boat. All of us are going to die; most of us face a period of retirement before death. It is a good way to run a railroad to take account of this basic symmetry.

The beauty about social insurance is that it is actuarially unsound. Everyone who reaches retirement age is given benefit privileges that far exceed anything he has paid in. And exceed his payments by more than 10 times as much (or five times, counting in employer payments)!

How is this possible? It stems from the fact that the national product is growing at compound interest and can be expected to do so as far ahead as the eye cannot see. Always there are more youths than old folks in a growing population.

More important, with real incomes growing at some 3 percent per year, the taxable base upon which benefits rest in any period is much greater than the taxes paid historically by the generation now retired. And social security, unlike actuarially funded insurance, is untouched by inflation. After Germany's terrible 1923 inflation, private insurance was wiped out but social insurance started all over as if nothing had happened.

Social security is squarely based on what has been called the eighth wonder of the world—compound interest. A growing nation is the greatest Ponzi game ever contrived. And that is a fact, not a paradox.

Morgan Says:

Conflict of White, Negro Values At Heart of U.S. Racial Dilemma

By Edward P. Morgan

NEW YORK—It is still winter and the streets are almost silent, cushioned by sooty banks of snow.

Pedestrians battle for taxicabs and bus space and curse all vehicles as they spray slush indiscriminately across the curbs.

But physical conflict is muffled by the weather and a demonstration of violence is unthinkable. Not so for New York and other cities in the long hot summer ahead. Now is a good time to ponder whether racial conflict can be deactivated before it explodes again.

Morgan

It is astonishing to realize that so few people have ever studied the anatomy of a riot. But riots, like volcanic eruptions, do not just happen. Their pressures build up, like gases trapped in Vesuvius, until they reach the bursting point. There are experts who are observing the riot phenomenon and their observations can be valuable if communities will listen.

Last December a psychologist and a psychiatrist analyzed the causes and nature of mob violence before a Senate subcommittee, headed by Connecticut's Abraham Ribicoff, studying urban problems. If city leaders wherever human explosions threaten study their testimony, they may face less stormy weather when snows melt.

Psychologist Derek V. Roemer of the National Institutes of Mental Health in Washington noted the recipe for mob violence can cook for years but society, especially white middle-class society, is surprised when its boils over because it "only looks at the slum from the outside and thus can never get to know it."

The outsiders, for instance, are largely ignorant of what a trap the urban ghetto is, of how its population can't escape it and if some do in the work day they have to go back at night for there is no other place to go. But, Roemer reported, "the amount of time during which slum residents have nothing to do is extraordinary."

But for a person to be distracted from this extreme monotony and, usually, extreme misery, it takes an extreme spectacle. Violence, including mass violence, then becomes a kind of magnetic field of communications. But in the middle of such a convulsion the individual is anonymous, one particle of the seething mass, and he abdicates or refuses to assume responsibility.

Six months ago Brandeis University established a Center for the Study of Violence. Its director, Dr. John P. Spiegel, a professor of social psychiatry, theorized before the Ribicoff committee that "we don't need to be violent simply because we are human."

This theory happens to be freshly under attack on the basis of "new" research. The argument won't be settled soon.

Meanwhile there is some encouragement in Spiegel's premise; for "if violence is merely an elicited response, like a knee-jerk, rather than a basic instinct or need, then, presumably, if we can prevent or control the occurrence of irreconcilable conflict, we can reduce the occurrence of violence."

How?

Spiegel suggests an "early warning system" which would show how near a community is to the boiling point by monitoring four levels of behavior: first, the difference in cultural values and beliefs between whites and blacks; second, how such institutions as the police, city government and schools are working and what the situation is in housing, jobs and recreation; third, communications—who is talking to whom; and fourth, the intensity of bitterness or conciliation in the emotional atmosphere.

THE PROFESSOR thinks the cultural and communications "gaps" need most attention. In many cities, he notes, contact between the power structure and the slums is mainly through the police and welfare workers, highly unsatisfactory as conduits because they can't settle causes of conflict, but often exacerbate them.

Spiegel suggests the most important conflict may be between the great emphasis the white middle class places on the future (i.e. "plan ahead and get ahead") and the contrasting inclination, a legacy of slavery, of working-class Negroes to live only in the present.

Taking the good with the bad—what incentive do they have to plan for change—brings some relaxation, even enjoyment and spontaneity, thus seeming almost to mock the relentless middle-class drive forward "goals."

The collision is almost audible. Here is the classic American middle-class stress on individualism, the right and responsibility to make individual and group decisions. And here is the Negro, at the bottom of the ladder, a cipher, impotent to decide anything except, perhaps, when he can make himself heard through mass violence.

Yet the poor can be envious of the rewards of future planning and the middle class can be envious of a more uninhibited style of life, ironically beyond reach. This clash causes each to deny the potential sympathy he feels toward the way of life of the other.

"This conflict of values," concludes Spiegel, "constitutes the American dilemma."

I think he has something there.

Stress on Minorities:

New Project Designed to Fill Apprentice Information Gap

POOR INFORMATION about apprenticeship opportunities in the building trades keeps many minority group youngsters from applying for them, an AFL-CIO spokesman observed in a network radio interview.

Donald Slaiman, director of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights, said a "unique program" has been developed by the Workers Defense League, the A. Philip Randolph Education Trust and the U.S. Dept. of Labor to "meet the problem of finding applicants for skilled trades entry jobs, both in apprenticeships and otherwise, especially in minority group communities."

The pilot project, to help prepare interested youngsters for apprenticeship entry tests in construction, manufacturing, utilities and trade and service, has the full cooperation of the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept., he noted.

"There is a tremendous lag of knowledge and understanding between what is available—what the policy is—what laws are available to back this up—and the actual advice and information that the youngsters have," Slaiman said.

School counselors often fail to advise students where and how to apply for available jobs, he said, or tell them, " 'don't bother, I know that you are wasting your time.' " His statements came on the AFL-CIO public service program, Labor News Conference.

SLAIMAN SAID that requirements for entry into apprenticeships—usually a high school education—are realistic.

"Skill requirements have been rising," he said, and the "probability is that if an applicant were a dropout before he finished high school, he wouldn't end up making a journeyman—he wouldn't keep up with the demands of the trades."

Reporters questioning Slaiman on the program, a weekly feature on the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and Alan Adams, Washington correspondent for Business Week magazine.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

FORMER VICE PRES. NIXON says that if he had concentrated on it he would probably have enough delegates to the Republican National Convention "locked up" to win the presidential nomination next year.

Nevertheless, he thinks he did correctly during the recent congressional campaign in traveling the country in behalf of GOP candidates, because the party is "immensely strengthened."

"The interest of any candidate should be getting elected, not nominated," he told Jules Witcover in a long interview published in the Saturday Evening Post, and the need was for a strengthened power base.

The former Vice President, who has been running for the White House about as long as anyone else who comes easily to mind except Harold E. Stassen, has a perfectly natural interest in "getting elected" rather than merely nominated, since he had the desperate experience in 1960 of losing by a mere eyelash and presumably does not wish to repeat it.

It is perfectly clear, also, that he reflects a common Republican mood—among the professionals, that is—in predicting a "wide open" convention under the present circumstances.

The mood, ever since the 1966 election, has been bubbly. The leaders see a number of candidates, potential or all but announced, and barring sudden strides by one of them, the presumption must be that there are likely to be several ballots.

The governors of major states seem to be in an ideal position to hold their options open by the device of favorite-son candidacies.

NO ONE HAS EVER doubted the coolheaded clarity with which Mr. Nixon habitually looks at Republican presidential politics.

He has been the party's most vigorous campaigner ever since 1954. When he was running against the late Sen. John F. Kennedy in 1960, he agreed on the so-called Fifth Avenue Compact, on liberalizing the convention platform, with New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller.

Indeed, on the authority of Theodore H. White in The Making of the President, 1960, he actually offered the vice presidential nomination to Rockefeller.

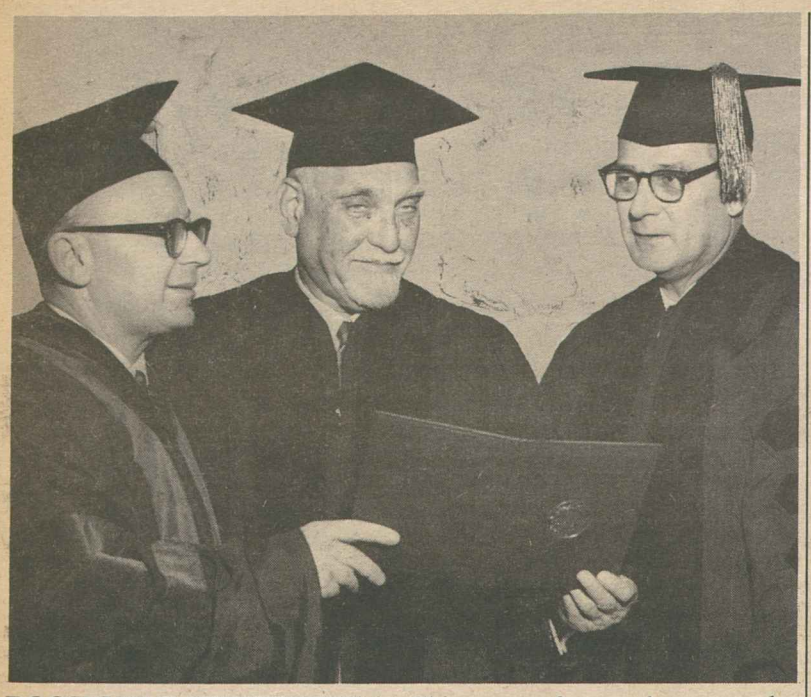
There is very good reason to believe that had Rockefeller in 1964 won the California Republican primary from Barry Goldwater, the result would have been a deadlocked convention and Nixon himself would have emerged as the almost obvious compromise candidate. There is very good reason to believe that this was precisely what he wanted and quietly prepared himself for—only Rockefeller couldn't win the California primary, and Goldwater had it "locked."

Mr. Nixon's problem last year was that in order to go out after delegates for 1968, and seal them up, he would have had to go after precisely the same groups and forces that swung the 1964 convention for Goldwater—substantially the ultra-conservatives of the South, the Mountain States and the Midwest.

No other sufficiently numerous grouping could possibly be counted. The big industrial states such as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan are burgeoning with available and ambitious governors—Gov. Rhodes of Ohio as well as Gov. Romney of Michigan, and no matter how hard he says he won't "seek" the nomination again, the distinctly possible Gov. Rockefeller. Add California, where Gov. Reagan is carving out what he hopes will be a regional favorite-son role, and the Goldwater delegates in the South were basic.

Mr. Nixon no doubt still wants them—but doesn't want to go into an election as their exclusive property, because look what happened to Goldwater.

A TREMENDOUS LAG in information about apprenticeship opportunities in the building trades keeps many minority group youngsters from applying for them, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman (center) told Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced program is heard weekly on the Mutual Radio Network.



ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY in Chicago confers an honorary degree of doctor of humane letters on Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky. At left is University Pres. Rolf A. Weil; at right, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, the speaker at the commencement ceremonies, who also received an honorary doctorate.

Wirtz Urges 'Bridges' Between School, Work

Chicago—"Some work experience should be part of every person's education," Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said as he urged utilization of the three-month summer vacation from school as a means of acquainting young people with the world of work.

Speaking at Roosevelt University's 51st commencement exercises, Wirtz said that schools in the country include "no organized exposure to what 'work' means, and no assumption of public responsibility for getting the individual across the gap between school and work. He is in school one day, being treated like a hot-house plant; and out of school the next, on his own and with no familiarity with what lies ahead."

The summer vacation for school children, Wirtz recalled, grew out of farmers' needing their children to work in the fields. He suggested that the vacation should be restored to its original purpose, learning to work, with the three-month period staggered during the year to spread work opportunities for youths. He also suggested a national service program for young people.

The secretary offered the proposals as ways to ease unemployment among young workers. He said that the only present bridge between education and work is college.

Wirtz's speech was given during ceremonies at which he received an honorary doctor of humane letters degree from Roosevelt University. Honorary doctorates also were conferred on Pres. Jacob Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, Honorary Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers. The three union officials have served on the university's advisory board since its founding.

A dinner held before the commencement exercises marked the 20th anniversary of the Labor Education Division of the university. Speakers included Chairman Frank McCulloch of the National Labor Relations Board, who was first director of the university's Labor Education Division, Frank McCallister, current director, and Rolf A. Weil, president of the university.

Broad Protections Urged:

the rate of interest that is being charged."

● Federal safeguards against "sharp and unscrupulous practices" in interstate sale of land, particularly retirement homesites.

Many elderly people, Johnson noted, "have wasted much of their life savings on a useless piece of desert or a swampland."

The proposed legislation would be modeled after the Securities & Exchange Act, and require sellers of unimproved lots "to disclose to potential buyers fully, simply, and clearly all of the material facts needed for an informed choice."

● A Welfare & Pension Plan Protection Act which would strengthen safeguards on administration of welfare and pension funds, limit the portion of the fund that may be invested in stock of the employer company, broaden the enforcement and investigatory powers of the secretary of labor, and require annual independent audits.

● New safeguards for investors in mutual funds, based on recommendations made in a critical SEC report.

High Charges

Johnson noted that buyers have often been subjected to "unnecessarily high" sales charges and "front end load" plans under which as much as 50 percent of first-year payments are deducted as sales commissions.

● Medical safety device legislation, to give the Food & Drug Administration stronger powers to assure the safety of medical devices, ranging from X-ray machines to screws for bone repair.

● Federal licensing and standards for clinical laboratories in interstate commerce and matching grants to help states and cities regulate laboratories not in interstate commerce.

The President cited studies showing a high proportion of inaccurate diagnostic tests, some resulting in serious injury and death.

● Updating of the federal meat inspection law to encourage states to assure the wholesomeness of the 15 percent of fresh meat and 25 percent of meat products which do not enter interstate commerce and are therefore exempt from federal inspection.

The President proposed federal grants covering up to half the administrative cost of approved state inspection programs and a major share of the cost of training inspectors for state programs.

● Establishment of a National Commission on Product Safety to propose a "comprehensive network of safeguards" against risks resulting from improper design or defective manufacture.

● Expanding the Flammable Fabrics Act to cover products which now can legally be made from material that quickly catches fire. Examples are baby blankets, drapes, carpets and upholstery fabrics.

● A Fire Safety Act including federal research and assistance on fire control and prevention.

● Legislation, with details to be worked out, to try to avert another regional electric power blackout through strengthened coordination among electric power utilities.

● A Natural Gas Pipeline Safety Act to develop federal standards covering "design, installation, operation and maintenance" of natural gas pipeline facilities.

Johnson termed the 800,000 miles of pipelines "essential" but warned: "As pipelines age and as more and more of the system lies under areas of high population density, the hazards of pipeline failures—and explosions—increase." He asked that regulatory authority be given to the new Dept. of Transportation.

"The cost to taxpayers of carrying out these proposals is very small," Johnson noted. "The savings to them as consumers will be great—in dollars, in safety and in peace of mind."

Object: Information

He stressed that the government's task is not to "tell the consumer what to buy" but to give him the information he needs to make a choice.

"The consumer must be protected against unsafe products," Johnson said, "against misleading information, and against the deceitful practices of a few businessmen that can undermine confidence in the vast majority of diligent and reputable firms."

Urging Congress "to carry forward unflinchingly in the public interest," Johnson stressed that "there is important unfinished and new business on the agenda."

Central Body Pioneers In Rent-Subsidy Project

Pasco adjoining a city park.

The site was covered with sagebrush and sand before local labor set up the Tri-Cities Low Cost Housing, Inc., and applied to the Federal Housing Administration for a mortgage loan.

Completion is six to eight months away, but the first of the 400 persons who will live in the "Vista Terrace" homes may be accommodated as early as June or July, King said.

The new buildings will be one and two-story brick, stucco and frame dwellings. Eight dwellings will have one bedroom each, with 40 two-bedroom suites, 40 with three bedrooms and 16 of four-bedroom size.

Playgrounds

There will be three laundry rooms, three playgrounds, and an underground sprinkler system for lawns, shrubbery and trees. Kitchens will be all-electric.

Construction is secured by two mortgage loans totaling $1,315,800, made with the Far West Securities Co. of Spokane, Wash., and Pasco. One mortgage covering half of the dwellings will be bought by the Federal National Mortgage Association, and will then bear a below-market rate of 3 percent interest. The other mortgage will be paid for at the market interest rate.

The FHA has contracted to pay annual rent supplements for needy tenants up to a maximum of $119,592. Payments will be made directly to the housing corporation, which will select tenants and own and operate the development.

Tenants who apply for rent supplementation must have low incomes at or below the limits set for admission to public housing elsewhere in Pasco, the FHA said. In addition, they must qualify as elderly, handicapped, displaced by governmental action, living in substandard housing elsewhere, or as victims of a natural disaster which made their former homes uninhabitable.

A rent supplement tenant pays one fourth of family income toward rent, and any difference is made up for by the supplemental payment. As family income increases, the supplement decreases and the tenant pays a greater share of the rent until he is able to meet the full payment, according to the FHA.

Other tenants pay rents based on the cost of building the property and paying operating expenses. Most tenants will be families with small children, the housing corporation anticipates.

Among participants in the ground-breaking were Pres. King, Sec.-Treas. Marvin L. Williams of the Washington State AFL-CIO, State Sen. Michael McCormack and State Housing Dept. Representative Arthur Timmel, San Francisco. Others who described building plans at a following breakfast included Architect Robert Ohashi, Richland, Wash., and FHA Regional Dir. Wallace Bostwick, Spokane.

Haphazard Use of Land Held Threat To Sound Growth of Urban Areas

A highly-industrialized America with a rapidly-growing population that has more and more leisure can no longer permit the luxury of land use at the whim of the owner regardless of its effect on others, according to an AFL-CIO spokesman.

Writing on "The Crisis in Land Use" in the current issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist, Economist George Taylor notes that workers have a "tremendous stake" in the use of the nation's land and adds:

"Workers, in common with all other citizens, have both needs and responsibilities. The needs are for land which will be developed, managed and conserved to yield them the fundamentals of a good life in all of its aspects and to be handed to the next generation in just a little better shape.

"The responsibilities are those of citizens who will consistently work to help reach those goals."

Taylor, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, traces the inexorable growth in the use of a resource that once seemed bottomless to the point where America is "placing new burdens on the bounty of the land" and is "sharpening competition and controversy over its control and use."

He examines in broad terms the "destruction" of the land by poor farming, mining and lumbering techniques, and the withdrawal for urban and suburban sprawl of land that might better be devoted to other uses.

He takes a particularly hard look at "America's new frontier," the city "with its rapidly growing population and deteriorating pockets of slums and poverty," and concludes that "the conflict in land uses is a massive roadblock to the orderly development and improvement of the life of people" in metropolitan areas.

Much Misuse

Much land is not used, much is misused and "speculative forces freeze land-use patterns into profits instead of the public interest," he writes.

"Planning for urban land use must change its emphasis," Taylor stresses. "There is a great need for an adequate supply of decent housing for poor and middle-income families. There is also the need for schools and hospitals, clean air and water, transit systems and highways, libraries and museums, parking areas and recreation facilities.

"Meanwhile, urban sprawl, loss of good land to freeways, vehicular congestion and polluted air and water problems grow more serious. Horse and buggy political institutions as reflected in the maze of local jurisdictions cannot cope effectively with land-use problems."

He recalls the policy of the last AFL-CIO convention urging the federal government "to undertake a massive effort to rebuild our cities," and concludes:

"How effectively large urban areas plan for land use will in large measure determine whether the big cities will continue to sprawl formlessly over the landscape while the cancer of urban blight gnaws away their central cores. Now is the time for the cities to resume their historic roles as seedbeds of creative ideas and fruitful associations of people."

States Ratify Disability Plan

The U.S. Constitution has been officially amended to deal with problems of presidential disability and to set up procedures for filling a vacancy in the vice presidency.

The required 38 states ratified the 25th Amendment, which was adopted by Congress in 1965.

If a vacancy occurs in the office of Vice President—as was the case when Lyndon Johnson took office as President—the President nominates a Vice President, subject to confirmation by majority vote of both the House and Senate.

Various procedures are provided for the Vice President to serve as acting President if the President is temporarily or permanently disabled, along with safeguards against usurpation of powers.

the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to issue "cease-and-desist" orders, subject to review in federal appellate courts. This is the procedure used by the National Labor Relations Board and other regulatory agencies. Present law requires the equal employment commission or the complainant to go to court to seek an anti-discrimination order.

● Extension of the life of the Commission on Civil Rights an additional five years beyond its Jan. 31, 1968 expiration date. The President also asked a 90 percent increase in appropriations for the Justice Dept.'s Community Relations Service, which he said has "worked quietly and effectively, behind the scenes, to conciliate disputes before they flared up in the courtrooms or on the streets." The proposed budget raise from $1.4 million to $2.7 million would permit adding 93 people to the staff and six new field offices.

3-Step Plan

The President's new fair housing proposal is a modification and stretchout of the legislation he sought last year but would cover commercial sales and rentals of all homes by 1969.

Enforcement would be assigned to the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, which would first seek to achieve voluntary compliance. If this failed, it could issue a judicially enforceable order after a hearing.

This year, the law would apply only to housing built with federal financial assistance and already covered by a presidential executive order. In 1968, it would apply to real estate developments and to apartments for five or more families. In 1969, it would apply to all housing.

Johnson said the legislation "would be aimed at commercial transactions, not at the privacy of the home. It would outlaw discriminatory practices in financing housing and in providing real estate brokers' services. It would prohibit 'block-busting' by which unscrupulous dealers seek to frighten homeowners into selling quickly, out of fear that the value of their homes will decline."

Last year's legislation was blocked in the Senate by a southern filibuster actively assisted by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Commenting on the failure of the bill, "although a majority of both houses in the Congress favored that legislation," Johnson charged that most of the arguments raised against it "involved myths and misinformation." He noted also that "the summer riots in our cities did as much damage to the chances of passing that legislation as the unfounded fears of many Americans and the opposition of special interest groups." He added:

"Today the subject of fair housing is engulfed in a cloud of misinformation and unarticulated fear. Some believe the value of their homes must decline if their neighborhoods are integrated. They fear the conversion of their communities into unsightly slums if a family of a different color moves into a house across the street. Neither of these events need occur. In an atmosphere of reason and justice, they would not occur. In the scores of cities and states that have such laws these events have not occurred."

Poverty War Pledge Issued By Humphrey

Charleston, W.Va.—The Johnson Administration "is not going to retreat one inch" in the war on poverty, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told a dinner closing a two-day legislative conference held by the West Virginia AFL-CIO.

"This Administration is not going to back down," he emphasized. "As long as Lyndon Johnson is in the White House and I am your Vice President, we're going to fight for the poverty programs."

In outlining present and future phases of programs to help the needy, Humphrey noted that expenditures on aid to the poor, from all federal sources, would rise to $25 billion should Congress agree to the $3 billion additional the Administration has asked for the coming fiscal year.

Some 400 delegates from 140 local unions were briefed on the State AFL-CIO's 15-point legislative program, which gives major emphasis to a sharp increase in unemployment compensation —which industry spokesmen have admitted should be boosted —and improved workmen's compensation benefits.

The delegates had breakfast meetings, arranged by local central bodies, with members of the Legislature from their own areas. Groups also met with Gov. Hulet C. Smith (D), who spoke at the concluding dinner, and members of the Board of Public Works.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley presided at the joint sessions and the dinner. Sec.-Treas. Glen Armstrong, director of state COPE activities, arranged the program.

UCLA Parley Backs Public Employe Rights

Los Angeles—Collective bargaining by public employes won a strong endorsement from participants in a two-day conference at the University of California in Los Angeles.

Some 200 government administrators and union leaders took part in the program, which was sponsored by UCLA's Institute of Industrial Relations. They examined the growth of union organization in public agencies and explored the impact on wages, working conditions, fringe benefits and personnel practices.

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, warned the group that more rather than fewer strikes would result from attempts to thwart collective bargaining in the public sector through anti-strike laws.

He said existing anti-strike laws—heaped on "irresponsible and indecent" conditions for public workers—"have not prevented strikes when frustrated employes have had no other recourse in their search for justice and equity."

While government workers don't want to strike, Wurf said, they have found that "solidarity and a picket line produce what lobbying a legislature does not."

Saul Wallen, prominent Boston arbitrator, said strikes that have taken place in the public sector in recent years appeared to be caused as much by refusals of administrators to accept collective bargaining as by "irreconcilable conflicts over economic issues."

Commissioner Arvid Anderson of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board and Eli Rock, Philadelphia and New York arbitrator, both supported state labor relations acts authorizing collective bargaining for public employes.

Anderson said he does not consider bargaining "as a step toward unionized government, but rather as a means of improving the level and quality of public service."

Wurf told the conference that fact-finding could be "a sound and useful way to avoid strikes" but emphasized his opposition to compulsory arbitration.

Printers, Pressmen Reach Disputes Pact

New York—Two printing trades unions agreed on a formula for settling jurisdictional disputes and termed it an important step towards eventual merger.

Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union and Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen jointly announced the jurisdiction pact, which was worked out here at a two-day meeting of top officers of the two unions.

The agreement spells out a set of guidelines for resolving work disputes, with arbitration as a final step. Both unions pledge to refrain from strikes, court action or resort to governmental agencies in jurisdictional conflicts.

The fast-growing field of offset printing has been a major source of jurisdictional disputes. The two union presidents expressed the belief that the agreement "offers peace to the printing and publishing industry and removes a long-standing obstacle to full use of new processes and automated equipment."

A key section of the agreement declares that members of either union currently performing work under contract will continue to be assigned that work regardless of technical jurisdiction.

Any disputes over jurisdiction or interpretation of the agreement will be submitted to arbitration, with the "status quo prevailing prior to the dispute . . . maintained pending settlement."

Both unions will insist that their employers under contract respect the jurisdiction decisions made under the agreement.

The agreement is effective immediately, subject to approval at the 1967 convention of the Typographical Union and the 1968 convention of the Printing Pressmen. If both conventions approve, "the unions agree to meet within a reasonable time thereafter for the purpose of considering further agreements."

DeAndrade said the agreement will result in "greater harmony and better understanding" between the two unions. Brown said the pact removed the greatest roadblock to organic unity.

Weltner, Phillips to Fill Democratic Party Posts

The liberal former congressman from Atlanta, Charles Weltner, has been named as deputy director of the Democratic National Committee to head a newly created Young Americans Division.

Also named as a deputy director, in charge of research and publications, was William G. Phillips, long-time staff director of the liberally-oriented House Democratic Study Group.

The appointments were announced by National Committee Chairman John M. Bailey.

Weltner served two terms in the House after Atlanta was reapportioned under the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" doctrine. He was considered certain to win a third term before he voluntarily withdrew from the race in protest against the nomination for governor of segregationist Lester Maddox.

Phillips, a former legislative research assistant in Washington for the Auto Workers, became administrative assistant to Rep. George M. Rhodes (D-Pa.) in 1955.

As staff director of the Study Group beginning in 1960, he was a key figure in the informal organization through which Democrats from the North and West have sought to increase their influence in House circles and rally support for the objectives of the Johnson and Kennedy Administrations. Its current membership is approximately 140 of the 246-member Democratic House delegation.

Fewer Jobs Lost in '66, New Ones Found Soon

The 1966 improvement in employment reflected a two-way trend —fewer workers lost their jobs and those who did found others more quickly.

The conclusion isn't as obvious as it looks at first glance. Only about 40 percent of total unemployment is among persons who lost their job. About 15 percent quit their previous jobs, 25 percent represents persons re-entering the labor market after a period of absence, and about 20 percent is made up of persons—usually teen-agers —looking for their first jobs.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics made six surveys of persons seeking employment covering the years 1964, 1965 and 1966. The findings are described in a special labor force report published in the February issue of the agency's publication, the Monthly Labor Review.

A key breakdown compares unemployment in June of 1964 with June of 1966.

Of the total 882,000 decline in unemployment over this period, 774,000 represented the reduction in the category of persons who lost their last jobs. Of the 779,000 reduction in the number of persons out of work for five weeks or more, 610,000 were in the "lost job" category.

Losing a job, the Labor Dept. report makes clear, is a broad term that covers layoffs, plant closings, decreased workloads and mechanization as well as individual firings. Job losses tend to represent a larger portion of the unemployed during an economic downturn, a smaller portion during expansion.

The study shows that the percentage of Negroes unemployed because of job loss remained about 2.5 times the rate for white workers throughout the three survey years, even though the number of Negroes unemployed because of lost jobs dropped by 175,000.

There was less of a reduction in the other categories of unemployment, and actually a slight increase in joblessness among persons seeking to re-enter the labor force, the study revealed.

Flood to Head Appropriation Subcommittee

Rep. Daniel J. Flood (D-Pa.) will head the House subcommittee which handles appropriations for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The Appropriations subcommittee, which deals with many multi-billion dollar Great Society programs, had been headed by the late Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.).

Flood is the only Democratic holdover on the subcommittee. The other Democrats are Representatives William H. Natcher (Ky.), Neal Smith (Iowa), W. R. Hull, Jr. (Mo.) and Bob Case (Tex.).

GOP members, all holdovers, are Representatives Melvin R. Laird (Wis.), Robert H. Michel (Ill.) and Garner E. Shriver (Kans.).

Although Flood, a 10-termer from Wilkes-Barre, has had a clearly liberal voting record, the overall composition of the subcommittee is more conservative than in the 89th Congress.

Urges 2-Year Program:

LBJ Bids Congress Extend Foreign Aid

Pres. Johnson appealed to Congress to continue America's foreign aid effort and not abandon "the long, hard struggle to bring the majority of the world's population out of the shadows of poverty and ignorance."

He proposed a two-year program putting new emphasis on self-help projects, regional planning, and programs to improve agriculture, education and health in the developing nations.

The President placed a $3.1 billion first-year price tag on the program, with an equal amount the second year. Of this, $2.5 billion would go into economic aid, $600 million into military assistance.

The $3.1 billion is $259 million less than Johnson asked last year, but $190 million more than Congress actually appropriated.

Johnson said the amount he is seeking is "the minimum contribution to mutual security and international development which we can safely make." He said the United States, the wealthiest nation in human history, "can well afford to devote less than seven-tenths of 1 percent of its national income to reduce the chances of future Viet Nams."

He pointed out, too, that "almost 90 percent of our economic assistance and over 95 percent of our military assistance is now spent in the United States."

Others Should Help

The President prodded other nations to share the responsibility—and expense—of helping the poorer countries. "Development is a world problem," he said. "No single country has all of the resources required. Equity demands that no single country be asked to carry the bulk of the load."

Also stressed was America's preference for regional development, crossing national boundaries as it does in the Alliance for Progress. Johnson said aid to African nations will be gradually shifted to cooperative, multi-nation projects.

He asked that Congress write into the new legislation the goal that 85 percent of U.S. development loans be made either to regional programs crossing national boundaries or to programs to which more than one nation is contributing.

The President proposed that a nonpartisan public board be established to advise the Administration and Congress on how well countries receiving U.S. aid are meeting "self-help" criteria—mobilizing their own resources as efficiently as possible.

"I will not ask any American citizen to contribute his tax dollars to support any country which does not meet the test," Johnson said.

He urged substantial increases in U.S. aid for agricultural development, declaring that "the world must find ways to bring food production and population growth into balance." He promised also assistance to nations "which decide to undertake voluntarily population programs."

The military aid request was the smallest ever submitted, the President said, partly because assistance to Laos and Thailand is handled in the regular Defense Dept. budget. The bulk of the military aid would go to nations friendly to the U.S. on the Communist perimeter.

Not all of America's aid programs are contained in the foreign aid message and budget. A week earlier, the President notified Congress that he was sending an emergency shipment of two million tons of food to India and asked for authority to send three million tons more, "provided it is appropriately matched by other countries."

The President's budget message to Congress also called for a $1.7 billion extension of the Food for Peace program. His foreign aid message indicated that Congress will be asked later to appropriate special funds for U.S. contributions to the Asian and African development banks, regional self-help programs, and possibly to the Inter-American Development Bank.

Some have "grown weary" of the aid effort, the President acknowledged. But he stressed that "the wealthy nations cannot survive as islands of abundance in a world of hunger, sickness and despair."

Broun Award Given To Miami Newsman

The Newspaper Guild's 1966 Heywood Broun Memorial Award, one of the nation's top journalism prizes, was presented to Gene Miller of the Miami Herald for stories that won the release from prison of two persons unjustly convicted of murder. The cases were unrelated.

In making the award, the judges unanimously praised Miller for "unusual investigative ability, a tenacity that refused to let go over several years, and a quality that Heywood Broun prized above all others—compassion for the underdog."

The judges, all former Guild members, were columnist Robert D. Novak, Warren Rogers, Washington editor of Look magazine, and Paul W. Duke, congressional reporter for NBC news.

"Neither of the victims," the judges said, "were what the world generally considers to be very important people. They were, in fact, inarticulate to the point of being unable to help themselves."

During his three-year investigation of the case of a woman convicted of murder in Louisiana in 1960 on false testimony, Miller encountered the case of an airman unfairly convicted on the same charge in Florida a year earlier.

Miller's hard digging for facts and his articles in the Herald won freedom for both last year.

In a field of 75 entries the judges awarded honorable mention citations to Robert H. Collins of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch "for his excellent digging into irregularities in the jury room" in a "cancer-cure" case, and to Charles Raudebaugh of the San Francisco Chronicle, "whose investigations at personal risk led to arrests and convictions" in the murder of a California union official.

The Broun Award, which carries a citation and a $1,000 cash prize, is the 26th in the series launched by the Guild following the death in 1939 of its founder and first president. Heywood Broun's crusading spirit as shown in his famous columns for the old New York World and the World-Telegram is the criterion for the judging.

Public Backing Seen Needed In Bargaining

New York—The collective bargaining system could be scuttled if the public is made aware only of its few failures and not of its many successes, a leading labor attorney warned.

Attorney Louis Sherman stressed the importance of an informed public opinion in an address at the American Management Association's personnel conference. Sherman is general counsel for the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

It was because many people thought most union members were unwilling captives of union shop clauses that the original Taft-Hartley Act required workers to vote on whether they wanted a union shop, Sherman noted. The overwhelming votes for the union shop before the provision as repealed demonstrated the fallacy of the belief, he declared.

There would be less talk of replacing collective bargaining with compulsory arbitration, he said, if more people were aware that:

- The percentage of working time lost because of strikes in 1965 came to only two-tenths of 1 percent. Strike days lost in the 1960's has been only half the lost time ratio of the 1950's.
- There are some 70,000 local unions in the United States and 150,000 collective bargaining agreements, only 2 percent of which are affected by strikes in a typical year.
- On-the-job accidents last year cost nearly 10 times as many man-days off from work as strikes.

Sherman expressed his belief that laws passed by Congress to curb the authority of unions have increased strikes rather than contributed to responsible collective bargaining.

der substandard conditions" unless "muscle" is put into enforcement of the law.

Meany recently asked all AFL-CIO central bodies to become centers where unorganized workers can get help if their employers don't live up to the wage-hour law.

"It is up to us to help in the enforcement of the law," Meany said. "Organized workers can, for the most part, appeal for help to their own unions. The unorganized have no place to go. I hope each central body becomes such a place."

He pointed out in his letter that "more often than not the cheaters on the wage-hour law are in competition with organized shops.

Labor Board Case Backlog Up for Year

Cases awaiting rulings by National Labor Relations Board members at 1966 year-end represented a sharp increase over the number of pending cases a year earlier, the NLRB reported.

Summarizing board business for the final three months of 1966, the agency said 647 cases were pending decision by board members at the end of December—up 111 over the year-end figure of 1965 but down from the 671 cases pending on Oct. 1, 1966.

Of the 647 pending cases, 461 involved unfair labor practice charges and 186 involved election petitions.

The NLRB conducted more than 2,000 secret ballot elections last quarter in which 90 percent of the 148,653 eligible employes cast ballots. Unions were chosen as bargaining agents in 57 percent of the elections. AFL-CIO unions won bargaining rights in 696 of the 1,341 contests they took part in, the NLRB said.

Other highlights of the report:

- The NLRB received 2,538 election petitions and 3,649 charges of unfair labor practices.
- Charges against employers totaled 2,391, and against unions, 1,258.
- The board issued 502 formal complaints after investigating charges previously filed. Trial examiners conducted 252 trial hearings and the five-member board, reviewing examiners' rulings, issued formal decisions in 174 unfair practice cases.
- A "substantial majority" of the charges filed were settled, dismissed or withdrawn without litigation, the NLRB said.

2 School Units Vote Union in Philadelphia

Philadelphia—Two groups of Philadelphia school employes—3,500 workers in all—voted for representation by the Firemen & Oilers in an election covering the city's 278 schools.

The main unit of 3,300 custodial, maintenance and warehouse employes voted by an almost 2-1 margin for the union's Local 1201. The union also won a 200-worker transportation unit defeating an 80-year-old unaffiliated association.

A unique touch to the election, conducted by the American Arbitration Association, was the use of 21 school buses to bring the polls to employes in each of the schools.

The Philadelphia school district is the fourth largest in the nation and this is the first time its non-teaching employes will be represented by a union.

Directing the campaign for the international union was John Curan, with Tillman McDonald heading the staff of organizers.

REPORTERS AND CAMERAMEN from press, radio and television media assembled daily for news conferences at which Pres. George Meany announced actions taken at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Affirms Readiness To Debate Issues

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously declared its "complete readiness" to debate and act upon "any complaint, charge, proposal or program novel or ancient" from any affiliate or its officers that comes before it through "appropriate channels" spelled out in the federation's constitution.

"There is no other procedure by which the trade union movement can effectively reach, and carry out, its decisions," the council said in adopting the statement as the first order of business at its mid-winter meeting here.

The resolution emphasized the council's position that it is ready to consider and "act upon any matter at any time, either at this or a future council meeting, at a meeting of the General Board, at a special convention, if necessary, or at the next regular convention." It added:

"We are not, however, prepared to act upon the basis of a kaleidoscope of ever-changing allegations and demands, expressed through press releases, public speeches or circular letters."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany read the text of the council resolution to a crowded press conference and stressed in reply to a series of questions that he will not discuss any charges made by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther any place except "in the forums of the AFL-CIO." (Text of Statement, Page 2.)

Meany told the press conference that Reuther's resignation from the AFL-CIO Executive Council had been received and that before the current council meeting is over the vacancy will be filled. A subcommittee of the council has been named, in line with standing council practice, to recommend a candidate for the seat.

Next Objectives

The council followed its opening day statement on federation procedures with statements focusing on the campaigns to win higher social security benefits and secure effective enforcement of the expanded minimum wage law for all Americans—union and non-union members alike.

It received also a detailed briefing on Administration programs and policies by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze and White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., and voiced its praise for the great record on social legislation achieved by Pres. Johnson and the 89th Congress. (Story this page, text on Page 6.)

The federation will carry directly to the President the question of awarding government contracts to companies which discriminate against workers because of union activities and will ask the President to issue an executive order barring such contract awards where the companies are in violation of federal labor law. (Story this page.)

In a series of statements on domestic policies and legislation the council:

- Voted strong support for a 20 percent increase in social security benefits coupled with extension and improvement of public welfare programs. (Story, Page 3; text, Page 6.)
- Called for increased funds for enforcement of the expanded minimum wage as a "necessary first step" in making a reality of the new amendments to the law. (Story, Page 2.)
- Pledged its "enthusiastic support" for the President's proposals to protect the right of privacy by banning wiretapping and eavesdropping. (Story, Page 3.)
- Urged the adoption of programs to control medical costs in

AFL-CIO to Seek Executive Order:

Federal Contract Bar Urged On Firms Defying Labor Law

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO will ask the President to consider issuing an executive order to bar government contracts to companies who discriminate against workers because of union activities.

The Executive Council adopted a statement directing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to appoint a council committee to meet with Pres. Johnson and and ask him to "take effective steps to end this national disgrace."

Meany told a press conference that awarding of contracts to firms found in violation of the National Labor Relations Act—and specifically the giant J. P. Stevens textile chain—must be stopped. The same policy established by the government on barring contracts to firms guilty of racial discrimination should be extended to those in defiance of the NLRB and the labor act, he said.

The federation president recalled that last May he had written Pres. Johnson on the Stevens case and received a memorandum from the attorney general that there is nothing in the law to compel the Dept. of Defense—the government agency awarding most contracts to the Stevens chain—to pay attention to findings and directives of the NLRB.

This can be changed, Meany said, by a presidential executive order similar to the order on racial discrimination and contracts, and the council committee that will meet with the President will press this point. He said he will name the committee later.

The council statement pointed out that during the past nine months the Dept. of Defense has continued its policy "of awarding contracts to companies who defy the federal labor law. And J. P. Stevens & Co. and other large textile concerns, too, have continued their policy of deliberately and crassly violating the labor act."

Citing the recent findings by trial examiner Boyd Leedom—a former chairman of the NLRB appointed by former Pres. Eisenhower—of gross violations by Stevens of the federal law and his conclusion that the violations stemmed from a calulated management program to keep workers from organizing, the council declared: "The continued award of government contracts to companies like this is intolerable."

Meany said the council committee that will see the President on the contracts problem will discuss with him also the question of industrial bond financing, the practice of using tax-free state and local government bonds to lure plants into other states and localities at the public's expense.

25-Millionth Vote Cast In Labor Board Ballot

By Eugene A. Kelly

Carteret, N.J.—A whole series of pleasant happenings in the life of the Leonard P. Scheno family swelled to a sudden crescendo when the National Labor Relations Board "tapped" the 39-year-old can plant mechanic as the 25 millionth worker to vote in an NLRB election.

Based on election reports received in Washington from 31 regional offices, the NLRB computed that the 25 millionth ballot had been dropped in the ballot box at the Reynolds Metals aluminum can plant in nearby Woodbridge where Scheno and his fellow workers voted Jan. 30. They chose the Steelworkers as their bargaining agent, and the NLRB chose Scheno to symbolize the 25 millionth voter.

So on Mar. 2 Scheno, his wife Grace and their three children—Geraldine, 13, and twins Nicholas and Grace, 12—will be guests at special ceremonies in Washington—a morning program at the Interior Dept., a noon luncheon on Capitol Hill and a reception in the State Dept. public rooms.

"Fantastic" was the best word Scheno could think of to describe

Administration Hailed On Progressive Record

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO hailed the nation's social progress under the Johnson Administration and termed it "a record unsurpassed in any period of democratic government."

The federation expressed its own pride in helping initiate the fight for many of the programs of social legislation advanced by the Administration and adopted by the 89th Congress.

The Executive Council declared that "America is now beginning to reach the harvest" of the legislation adopted in 1965-66 and listed a dozen "broad areas of constructive action for the welfare of all Americans."

But, the council cautioned, "much more remains to be done" in the social welfare field. It expressed its confidence that "the President shares that view," noting his requests to the current Congress for broader programs and additional legislation.

As for the AFL-CIO, the Council asserted that it "will be working day in and day out to achieve the kind of society we seek—one in which insecurity, poverty and injustice no longer exist in our land."

The council statement ran the record of the new minimum wage bill—"the most effective anti-poverty legislation yet"—the millions treated and protected under medicare and receiving higher social

Government Steps Asked to Curb Rocketing Cost of Health Care

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress and the administration were urged by the AFL-CIO to adopt a program to control medical costs amidst reports of skyrocketing prices for health care.

The federation's Executive Council declared that "access to high quality health services at costs they can afford is the right of the American people." It pointed to an expected rise of 20 to 30 percent in hospital costs next year and the 10 percent rise in doctors' fees in the past two years.

Noting the President's special study of medical costs now under way, the council said it was "eagerly awaiting the results" to help spotlight the situation. Meanwhile, the council urged high priority to the following:

- Giving the Food & Drug Administration the authority and funds to "assure all drugs sold for human use are safe, pure and therapeutically effective."
- Enacting legislation to promote lower drug prices by restoring competition in the drug industry. This should include amending the patent laws to compel the patent holder to license other producers to manufacture and sell new drugs after three years.
- Setting up by the FDA of a national list of effective drugs that would provide unbiased information to physicians.
- Altering methods of reimbursing physicians and hospitals under the medicare and medicaid programs—specifically to eliminate the option of direct billing under medicare. This would prevent "excessive physician charges" and relieve the elderly of the "heavy financial burden of having to pay doctor bills long before they receive medicare reimbursement."
- Standardizing fees for physicians under medicare and medicaid and studying alternate methods other than the fee-for-service system.
- Providing grants to stimulate the growth of consumer-controlled comprehensive health plans "not only as a proven means of providing better medical care at lower cost, but as a yardstick against which alternative methods of providing medical service can be measured."

Statement of Council On Policy Formulation

Statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 20, 1967, at Bal Harbour, Florida:

We again wish to emphasize that the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations is a free, voluntary institution, governed by the terms of a constitution adopted by the delegates of all affiliated unions at the 1955 merger convention of the AFL-CIO.

The executive officers and the members of the Executive Council are elected, in accordance with that constitution, by the delegates representing all affiliated organizations, at each biennial convention, and are fully accountable to them. The basic policies and programs of the AFL-CIO are formulated and approved by the convention and, between conventions, by the Executive Council. The executive officers of the AFL-CIO must accept and be guided by those decisions.

In this respect, the structure and procedure of the AFL-CIO is similar to that of other free trade union centers throughout the world, and of the 129 national and international unions who, together, comprise this federation.

Under this constitution, concurred in by all affiliates, any organization that contends that the programs and policies of the federation are deficient in any respect, or are not being properly or adequately carried out, has every opportunity, as well as free and open internal channels, for the pursuit of its complaints and the advancement of its position.

Obviously, this is particularly true of those organizations whose chief officers serve on the Executive Council. The council operates on an open agenda. Any matter that any member of the council desires to have considered by the council is considered, fully and freely, to the point of decision.

Likewise, the convention affords every delegate and every organization, whether they have one vote or one million, an open forum for the discussion and advancement of any issue, charge or complaint.

There is only one limitation upon the extent to which any individual or any organization within the trade union movement can influence the direction of the AFL-CIO, its programs and policies or the character and identity of its leadership. As in any democratic order, they must be able to persuade the majority that their complaints are valid, that their proposals are sound and that their alternatives are preferable. Neither size, financial resources, nor extravagance of language can overcome or substitute for that simple basic requirement.

The officers and members of the Executive Council declare the complete readiness of the AFL-CIO to receive, consider, debate and act upon any complaint, charge, proposal or program—novel or ancient—that any affiliate or its officers may desire to advance and advocate—if and when properly offered through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO Constitution. There is no other procedure by which the trade union movement can effectively reach, and carry out, its decisions.

We are ready to consider and act upon any such matter at any time, either at this or a future council meeting, at a meeting of the General Board, at a special convention, if necessary, or at the next regular convention in the fall of this year. We are not, however, prepared to act upon the basis of a kaleidoscope of ever-changing allegations and demands, expressed through press releases, public speeches or circular letters.

Council Seeks Compliance:

Enforcement Funds Urged for Wage Law

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Increased funds for enforcement of the expanded minimum wage law are a "necessary first step" in translating promise into reality, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council called on Congress to vote the additional enforcement funds requested by the President and urged the secretary of labor to pursue effective enforcement "to the maximum feasible extent."

The statement pledged resistance to the attempt by several states to remove tens of thousands of low-wage state employes from the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Several states have filed or joined in actions aimed at having federal coverage of state workers declared void.

Reviewing the increases in the wage floor that went into effect Feb. 1, 1967, and the expansion of coverage of the act to millions of workers previously unprotected, the council said that this "greatest single victory" in the war on poverty must be supported by effective enforcement.

The need for enforcement was pointed up by a look at the record for 1966 when 430,000 workers were underpaid a total of $90 million, with only one-third of the loss recovered. This consists only of violations that were discovered, the council said, noting that "it is estimated that only one-half of the actual violations" have been bared.

The extension of the law this year also expands "the volume of potential chiseling" and the enforcement job, the statement pointed out. The number of covered workers will increase by almost 30 percent and the number of covered establishments by 60 percent, the council noted.

The answer is a substantial increase in the number of wage-hour investigators, it stressed, noting that the President's budget recognized this need and requested additional funds.

The council commended AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's recent directive to all AFL-CIO state and local central bodies to establish standing committees on wage-hour enforcement to assist low-wage workers "whether or not they are union members" in processing complaints, and make the service available to the entire community.

While the enactment of FLSA amendments last year was a great victory, the council concluded, "the AFL-CIO is determined to achieve its long-range goal of a Fair Labor Standards Act that completely meets today's needs. That means a $2 minimum wage, universal coverage of all workers in interstate commerce, a 35-hour week and double-time for overtime."

Jobless Aid Standards Sought 'Without Delay'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The nation's unemployment insurance system must be returned to its original purpose of "providing adequate income security to workers displaced from their regular jobs," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

This can best be done, the council said, by a "comprehensive reorganization and fundamental improvement of the unemployment compensation system under a single federal program."

But pending such action, the council called on the 90th Congress for "enactment without delay" of federal standards for unemployment compensation. The statement noted that the 89th Congress has already devoted long and detailed study to the principal issues and the necessary legislation can move forward quickly.

In the 89th Congress, the House passed a bill containing some improvements in the jobless pay system but did not include federal standards. The Senate passed a measure containing federal standards but the differences could not be worked out in conference before adjournment.

Reviewing this failure, the council stressed that the present obsolete and inadequate system is still in force, making up only one-fifth of the wage loss of the involuntarily unemployed.

The ratio of maximum benefits to average wages is lower in every state today than it was in 1939, the council pointed out. In 1939, in all but two states maximum benefits were 50 percent or more of average wages; today in 34 states they are below 50 percent.

Model Law

The Council instructed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, as part of the drive to modernize the law, to "draw up a model federal unemployment insurance standards bill" meeting the basic needs of the nation and its workers. In addition it urged all affiliated unions "to reinforce their efforts to obtain urgently needed improvements in state unemployment insurance laws" to improve benefits and their duration and remove "harsh, restrictive and arbitrary eligibility and disqualification provisions."

LABOR DEPT. programs and policies are discussed with the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz. Behind AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler is Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds.

Field Mediators Join National Staff

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has added three men to its national staff as "trouble shooters" to assist in the settlement of major disputes. They are Daniel Edwards, now a mediator stationed in Salt Lake City; Kenneth E. Moffett, Cleveland mediator; and Ralph C. Patterson of the San Francisco staff.

FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin said they will work under the supervision of Disputes Dir. Walter A. Maggiolo—with a small group of Washington-based mediators who assist field staff mediators in disputes that have major significance.

In reply to press conference queries on the council's procedures statement Meany said that the AFL-CIO has received no documents or bill of particulars from Reuther or the UAW and neither has the Executive Council.

He stressed that there is "no feud," as charged in some press accounts, between himself and Reuther and that they have had a very "nice relationship" in the past five years.

He noted that the council has an open agenda when it meets and any member can bring up any subject at any time and that they do.

The council statement pointed out that there is only "one limitation to the extent to which any individual or any organization within the trade union movement "can influence the direction of the AFL-CIO, its programs and policies or the character and identity of its leadership . . . They must be able to persuade the majority that their complaints are valid, that their proposals are sound and that their alternatives are preferable. Neither size, financial reources, nor extravagance of language can overcome or substitute for that simple basic requirement."

The telegram received by Meany from the UAW earlier this month advised the AFL-CIO president that the UAW international board had ordered Reuther and all other officers to resign immediately from the council and other posts they held in the AFL-CIO.

Meany made the following points also at his press conferences:

● The AFL-CIO has "absolutely not" received any funds from the Central Intelligence Agency and that he personally is opposed to unions receiving such funds. The CIA, he said, can do its job without subsidizing unions.

● Labor's relations with the Administration had been very good and great progress had been made on labor's programs, greater than under any other administration.

● The AFL-CIO is unalterably opposed to any form of compulsory arbitration and this position has been made clear to Pres. Johnson on numerous occasions.

● Strong support will be given the effort to enact situs picketing legislation and he expects the same support from the Administration as in the past.

● The Federation is studying the Administration proposal to set up a new department including Labor, Commerce and possibly other agencies but as long as the concept of departments to represent special interest groups prevails—for example, agriculture—organized labor believes that the Labor Dept. should be maintained as a department looking after the problems of workers.

Wirtz, at a press conference following his meeting with the council, said he had discussed enforcement of the new amendments to the minimum wage law, the administration of the Landrum-Griffin Act and the various manpower programs of the department. He reported also discussion on the creation of a new Dept. of Economic Affairs and the legislative prospects for various administration programs.

The secretary said his discussion with the council was "completely constructive" on Landrum-Griffin matters. He said he has made arrangements for a complete review of the problems arising under the act with members of the council. The difficulties arise, he noted, when the department has to be at times both a "mediator and a cop."

Crackdown Asked On Law Violators

Meany characterized the growing practice of pirating firms as a "perversion of the law" established to allow states and cities to finance public improvements through tax-free bonds.

The council adopted a statement noting that the AFL-CIO has long urged Congress to end the "malpractice of industrial bond financing" and said the government has an obligation to end this type of industrial piracy because it not only means a loss of needed revenue to the U.S. Treasury but adds to the unfair tax burden already borne by middle and low-income families.

National Health Plan Pressed by Council

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO reaffirmed labor's "long-sought goal of providing and financing comprehensive health services" for all Americans by renewing its call for a program of national health insurance.

The Executive Council noted that the medicare and medicaid programs were "outstanding achievements" of the 89th Congress, but that despite these advances the need is still great for a national health plan.

The council urged Congress to enact legislation that would incorporate into a national health insurance program universal coverage, comprehensive benefits, adequate financing and assurance of high quality health services.

security benefits, the tremendous scope of aid to education programs at all levels, the great jump in programs to combat poverty and assist the poor, the aid for youngsters and the expansion of manpower training programs.

The President's legislative program for the 90th Congress was presented to the Council along with a detailed analysis of the federal budget by White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr. and Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany commented at a press conference that the federation has had very good relations with "this Administration." Labor's programs and the social welfare of the nation, he said, have made greater progress and there has been greater cooperation with labor than in any other administration, including that of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In response to a reporter's query, Meany said that the council statement was not put out as an endorsement of Johnson as a presidential candidate in 1968, but that "personally it's a pretty good reason for an endorsement."

Earlier in the council sessions, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Under Sec. James Reynolds had discussed Labor Dept. programs and policies in a meeting described by both Wirtz and Meany as friendly and constructive.

Strong Support Pledged For Social Security Hike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong support for a 20 percent increase in social security benefits coupled with extension and improvement of public welfare programs was voiced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council praised Pres. Johnson's proposals for higher social security benefits and other improvements in the program along with extension of medicare to the disabled, and noted that it considered it a "significant down-payment on the needed 50 percent rise in benefits" and other advances.

The 50 percent goal, the council pointed out, "would require some financing from general revenues which we believe is necessary and desirable. But we believe the President's proposal represents a substantial first step toward that goal which can be enacted now without imposing a burden on the general revenue."

The President's program, the statement declared, would have the immediate effect of pulling 1.5 million poor now receiving social security benefits "out of the mire of poverty."

The council assailed a Republican proposal for an 8 percent increase as "grossly inadequate," declaring that while it has the "surface attraction" of avoiding increased contributions, "benefit levels would still be so low that very few beneficiaries now below the poverty level would be raised above it."

False Welfare Charge

On public welfare programs, the council scored the "vicious campaign of false charges aimed at slashing public welfare programs throughout the country," and insisted that the programs be extended and improved to meet minimum needs.

The statement endorsed the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare for a new pattern of federal-state cooperation "to provide as a matter of right adequate financial aid and social services to all in need."

Until such time as adequate national standards can be established, the council voiced strong support for the President's recommendations that state public assistance payments be required to meet their own definitions of need and be kept up to date. It urged elimination of all outmoded and unjust approaches so that welfare payments would be "based on the only appropriate test, need."

"We especially urge federal action to abolish the 'man-in-the-house' rule and other senseless and cruel penalties imposed on needy families in some areas which are a blot on American traditions of compassion and social justice."

The council found fault with a presidential recommendation on revision of the tax structure for the elderly, specifically the proposal that involves taxation of social security and railroad retirement benefits. It noted that social security payments have always been tax exempt while the incomes on which contributions have been based have been subject to tax. "This should continue to be the guiding principle," the council declared.

Modernized, 'Business-Like' Budget Urged

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The federal government should have a "modern, business-like budget" so that it can plan and execute programs on a long-range basis to meet the needs of an urbanized nation for expanded and improved facilities, the AFL-CIO said.

The Executive Council noted that Pres. Johnson had taken a step in the direction of budget reform by stressing in his fiscal 1968 budget the national income accounts approach which measures the government's financial impact on the national economy. But this approach does not fully meet the need for a budget organized to measure the worth of government assets or calculate their depreciation, as well as the government's earnings and the sources from which they are derived, the council said.

A modern budget, it continued, would establish one account for general operating expenses and national security and another capital-investment account involving creation, improvement or acquisition of assets or recoverable claims—such as self-liquidating lending programs, loans to foreign nations, investments in public lands, buildings and similar assets.

"The capital budget," the council declared, "is almost universally used by modern business corporations, by most western democracies, by at least one-third of the states and by most large cities."

The council said it hoped the President's Budget Review Committee would recommend the modernization of the federal budget.

Executive Council Backs Johnson on Wiretapping

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO hailed as "most far-reaching" the President's proposals to protect the right of privacy and pledged its "enthusiastic support." The Federation's Executive Council noted labor's traditional concern for full recognition and protection of the right to privacy and the "totally unsatisfactory" status of existing laws and interpretations.

"We welcome and endorse," the council said, Pres. Johnson's proposals designed "unequivocally to ban all wiretapping and mechanical eavesdropping, whether by law enforcement officials or private persons." The sole exception would be that the President could authorize wiretapping and eavesdropping by federal security agencies in circumstances where he finds the security of the nation to be at stake. Even then no evidence so obtained could be used in any court proceeding.

"These proposals," the council emphasized, "are the most far-reaching that have been made by any president or attorney general to update and protect rights of privacy."

Beirne Asks Broader Community Leadership

Oklahoma City, Okla.—Broad interest in meeting total human needs can be achieved only if United Funds and community councils bring all community forces into their policy-making, "including consumer and minority groups," according to Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and of the United Community Funds & Councils of America.

Speaking at a luncheon meeting during a Citizens' Conference on Community Planning, Beirne declared that planning bodies "must be so constructed that they receive as well as transmit."

'Closed Circuit'

"Too many of our community organizations and welfare agencies with a stake in planning have placed entirely too much emphasis on intercommunication," he said. "They are almost on a closed circuit, failing to reach second and third levels of community leadership. . . .

"By limiting their relationships almost exclusively to long-established organizations and forces, some planning bodies today are almost completely out of touch with key neighborhood, labor, political, professional, religious, business and minority leaders. . . .

"The community planning systems must be forums for the full expression of opinion. They can also be instruments for healing wounds and, through the dispassionate search, create new standards of acceptance, dignity and respect in the presence of sincerely held differences."

The one thing planning systems cannot afford to do, said Beirne, who is a vice president of the AFL-CIO, "is to ignore conflict" which is inherent in a pluralistic society with divergent viewpoints, and fail to confront the "real and urgent issues" of the community.

Minimum Wage Parity Tops Ohio Labo r Goals

Columbus—The Ohio AFL-CIO adopted a legislative program at its biennial conference here calling for a state minimum wage matching the federal law and collective bargaining rights for public employes.

Other goals proposed at an all-day meeting attended by more than 1,000 union representatives included:

- A ban on the use of lie detectors as a condition of employment.
- Improved unemployment insurance, with the maximum benefit pegged to two-thirds of the state's average wage for up to 36 weeks of joblessness.
- Passage of a "little Wagner Act" to assure bargaining rights for workers not covered by federal law.
- Workmen's compensation improvements, including replacement of at least 75 percent of lost wages for the full period of disability.
- A requirement for oral hearings in court before issuance of restraining orders in labor disputes.
- A package of consumer legislation and a ban on garnishment of pay.
- Expanded state aid for schools, pay raises for teachers, and two years of post high school education tuition free for all students desiring to continue their schooling.

In calling for collective bargaining rights and grievance machinery for public employes, the conference also asked repeal of Ohio's Ferguson Act, which prohibits strikes by public workers.

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, described the strike ban in a speech to the delegates as "a pistol in the hands of irresponsible politicians when they don't want to deal honorably with public employes."

Girl Worth as Much As Man on Same Job

An employer who replaces a man with a woman in the same job can't cut the wage rate, the Labor Dept. has ruled.

A section of the Fair Labor Standards Act prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in wages paid to employes doing the same work. The departmental interpretation made it clear that the principle holds even if all employes of one sex are removed from a particular job and replaced by employes of the opposite sex.

It makes no difference, of course, if men are replaced by women or women by men. The wages can't be cut.

Senate Votes To Increase Debt Ceiling

The Senate voted 54-23 to raise the national debt ceiling so that the government can pay its bills on time. It acted without the political fireworks that marked the House debate on the bill.

The measure must go to conference because the House bill approved only a temporary increase in the debt limit to $336 billion, while the Senate bill makes the increase permanent.

Temporary increases are required nearly every year and are routinely approved after Administration opponents have used the occasion to attack government spending programs.

Forty-two Democrats and 12 Republicans supported the Senate bill, with 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats opposed.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) stressed in support of the bill that the present national debt represents a smaller percentage of the national income now than in 1940. The debt ratio has fallen steadily since the end of World War II, Long said.

Political Issue

House Republicans had made a partisan political issue over the debt increase bill and sought to put together a winning coalition with conservative southern Democrats.

Administration ranks held firm however, and the House conservative coalition was beaten on three key votes by margins ranging from 16 to 106 votes.

The chief Senate controversy was over whether the debt ceiling should be temporarily or permanently raised.

On Landrum-Griffin Act:

Maritime Unions Set Labor Law Survey

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An in-depth survey of court decisions under the Landrum-Griffin Act and a study of all available information on interpretations of the law has been authorized by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

The department's executive council meeting here authorized the creation of a permanent standing committee to sponsor the survey, correlate information, work with universities and law schools and take all necessary steps to complete a full analysis of the situation.

MTD Pres. Paul Hall declared that the time has come when the labor movement must take a close look at this "bad law compounded by bad decisions" and create a situation where information and assistance is available to unions. He cited the general lack of coordination among unions in coping with L-G decisions and noted the rising importance of these decisions to the general activities of the labor movement.

Intent Questioned

He told the council that interpretations of L-G in the court do not square with the legislative intent of Congress and that there is a great need to determine exactly what is happening and why in this legal area.

The department's action on Landrum-Griffin came after a detailed review by Hall of a case involving the Seafarers in Duluth, Minn., which Hall charged demonstrated that the Labor Dept. was using its investigatory powers under L-G to "walk into unions on fishing expeditions" and to fabricate cases against unions in behalf of other agencies which lack the authority" to make such investigations.

The case has been placed before a number of congressmen and senators and Hall said there were indications that a congressional inquiry would be conducted on the Labor Dept's role.

The MTD sessions also called for new safety precautions on the Great Lakes, pointing to the frequency of shipwrecks and other ship disasters especially on Lake Michigan. Special attention was called to the need for closer liaison between the U.S. and Canada on safety-at-sea regulatory machinery on the lakes as well as along the coast.

Reviewing the expansion of activities by the department in 1967, the council voiced its approval. Hall announced that in line with the program, Thomas W. Gleason, president of the Longshoremen, has been named vice president of the department and will assume full responsibility for legislative and special event functions undertaken by the MTD. The department now has 35 AFL-CIO affiliates.

In other actions the MTD council:

- Pledged its full support to the Building & Construction Trades Dept. to secure congressional passage of situs picketing legislation to grant to construction workers "the same rights and privileges now enjoyed by other trade unionists."
- Reaffirmed support of legislation introduced by Rep. Edward F. Garmatz (D-Md.) to require authorization to advance activities of the Maritime Administration and to continue its fight to "maintain an independent Martime Administration."
- Called for protection of U.S. shipyards by opposing any foreign construction of American flag ships.
- Stressed the rapid progress and expansion of the Soviet merchant marine and termed it "an economic threat to the free world" that must be met by a revitalization of the U.S. maritime fleet.
- Urged action by the Administration on the report of the Maritime Advisory Committee because its recommendations are in "support of the public interest."
- Called on the President to review aid programs to Argentina in light of the suppression of the rights of organized labor in that country.
- Urged ratification by the U.S. of the human rights conventions adopted by the United States as part of the observance of 1968 as the Intl. Year for Human Rights.

Al Barbour Dies; Led Detroit Labor

Detroit — Pres. Alexander (Al) Barbour of the Wayne County AFL-CIO died after a fourth heart attack, suffered while visiting a daughter in Tustin, Calif.

Barbour, born in Montreal 52 years ago, had been a Detroit resident for 44 years. He was chief union steward and committeeman in Auto Workers Local 7, representing Chrysler plant workers, when delegates to the former CIO Council elected him secretary-treasurer in 1948. He became president of the county AFL-CIO on merger in 1958.

Barbour and his wife, Dorothy, were visiting a daughter, Mrs. Dolores Krol, at his death. Two other daughters also survive.

NLRB's 25-Millionth Voter Honored

Labor, Industry, Government Hail Industrial Democracy Milestone

the events of the recent past.

Starting last fall, Scheno got a new job, joined his first union and was elected treasurer of newly chartered Steelworkers Local 7089, When the ballots had been counted, the union certified and the computer activated, Dir. John J. Cuneo of the NLRB regional office at Newark, N.J., drove to Woodbridge to tell Scheno he had been selected as representative of the 25 million workers who have voted since the first NLRB election in 1935.

The board announced that major labor and management organizations, in what it called "unique cooperation," will be joint hosts for the Mar. 2 programs singling out the Schenos.

The commemorative events will start with a public observance in the Dept. of Interior auditorium at which NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and General Counsel Arnold Ordman will be masters of ceremony.

Senators Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va) and Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), members of the Senate Labor subcommittee, will be sponsors of a 1 p.m. luncheon for the Schenos in the New Senate Office Bldg., with Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.) of the House Labor Committee as co-sponsors.

The reception in the State Dept. building will be co-sponsored, the NLRB announced, by the AFL-CIO and the National Manufacturers Association. Invited guests include leaders of labor, management, universities and the government.

Other Programs

In addition to the Washington observance, other programs are scheduled in NLRB regions. An exhibit of secret-ballot election history will be displayed at the board's Washington headquarters and later at regional offices. A special postmark cancellation will be applied to mail sent through the New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and Washington post offices for a period of six months.

Scheno was born in Nyack, N.Y., and met his wife there at a reunion for families whose forebears came from the town of Cisternino, Italy.

A Navy flight engineer in World War II, Scheno logged 2,000 flying hours during the war and afterwards in the Pacific, Japan and China. Honorably discharged in 1948, he worked under the GI Bill as an apprentice stereotyper on a newspaper and two years later was recalled for Korean War service.

After service at a naval air station, Scheno married in 1952 and began a career as manager of service stations on the New Jersey Turnpike and the Garden State Parkway. He later operated a Cities Service retail dealership in Avenel, N.J., and worked as maintenance supervisor for that firm. He joined Reynolds last September with the first group of technicians hired for the new Woodbridge plant.

NLRB Member Sam Zagoria, addressing an Indiana Labor-Management Relations luncheon at Indianapolis, called the casting of the 25 millionth vote "a milestone in industrial democracy."

"It was not always thus," Zagoria said, noting that in pre-NLRB days the history of American industrial relations sometimes resembled a war casualty list. Passage of the Wagner Act did not convert the "industrial battlefield to an afternoon tea party overnight," he said, recalling that 10 union men were killed and 30 wounded in the Memorial Day massacre at the South Chicago plant of Republic Steel two years later.

"Industrial democracy has cleared the way for unprecedented industrial growth and has brought improved pay, safer working conditions and job security," Zagoria said. "Industrial peace has made possible bold and imaginative contract provisions for pensions, life insurance, apprenticeship programs, and adjustment to an accelerated technology."

The secret ballot election process has been a "useful first step along the route to discussion and understanding," he declared.

Court Upholds NLRB On Resort Hotel Order

New York—A U.S. Court of Appeals has ordered Grossinger's resort hotel in the Catskill Mountains to open its gates to union organizers and stop four practices that the National Labor Relations Board ruled unfair.

Upholding the NLRB in five particulars of an order issued late in 1965, the 2nd Circuit Court here ordered the family-owned hotel near Liberty, N.Y., to stop:

- Making unlawful promises of benefits to employes to head off organization by the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.
- Leading employes to believe their union meetings were being spied on.
- Coercively questioning employes about their union sympathies or activities.
- Encouraging and soliciting employes to withdraw from the union.

The court modified the NLRB order to eliminate any references to threats of reprisal, and to withdraw a ruling that the union must be given an opportunity to address the employes in answer to management speeches.

The union has been trying to organize Grossinger's since 1962. Management refused to let organizers inside the fences and gates behind which its 565-786 employes work and live, the union charged. Other means of countering Grossinger's drive aganst unionization were held by the board to be not suitable. NLRB hearings resulted in three findings of unfair labor practices and two orders to hold a new election.

Of the NLRB's latest order the three-judge court said there was ample evidence to support the unfair practice findings. It also agreed that "no effective alternatives" to solicitation of union memberships inside the gates are available to the union. It found management statements not so much threatening as "prophecies of a somewhat shadowy doom" and dismissed the equal-time order of the NLRB in favor of admitting organizers to the grounds.

Strike Time Drops For 1960-66 Period

American workers lost only 16 one-hundredths of 1 percent of total working time because of strikes in the 1960-66 period compared with 32 one-hundredths of 1 percent during the 1950s, according to estimates by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

About 4,200 stoppages involving 1.8 million workers started in 1966 with a loss of 19 one-hundredths of 1 percent of total working time. The 1965 worktime loss was 18 one-hundredths of 1 percent, with 1.5 million workers participating in 3,963 stoppages, the report showed.

Union Given Support On Appeal to Negroes

The National Labor Relations Board has rejected a company challenge to a union-won election on the claim that the union's appeals to the workers were improperly racial in character.

In a case involving the Baltimore Luggage Co., the workers were told that historically Negroes have received lower wages than white workers and that they could improve their economic situation by joining the union.

Civil rights leaders participated in the pre-election campaign, and the union literature distributed by the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers urged that collective bargaining was a method Negro workers could use to meet their special economic problems.

A speaker during the campaign assured the workers that they would face no "dogs" or "fire hoses." He continued, "All you have to do is go down to your place of work" and vote. "There will be none of the pressures that these people had to face."

The company refused to bargain with the union after NLRB certification, arguing that references to racial issues were improper. The case went back to the NLRB on stipulation of the facts, the company stating tht it wished to pave the way for judicial review of this question.

A three-member NLRB panel unanimously held that the theme of "Negro solidarity through unionism," as a method of breaking barriers to economic equality, was a "lawful method of concerted action."

The board does not "compile lists of topics which may be either proscribed or permissible," the decision noted.

"We only undertake to evaluate, in each setting, the propaganda used," to determine that the legitimate bounds have not been passed and that "a fair and free election has been held."

The board cited a recent Labor Dept. report declaring that "the keys to advancing Negro achievement . . . are work at a living wage for all who want it, equal advancement opportunity and equal work."

The NLRB commented: "The choice of racial basis for concerted action has been made, not by the victims who seek redress, but by those who use race as a basis to impose the disadvantage."

No Bias Seen

The decision also pointed out that the organizing activity included no suggestion that "white workers should not be permitted the same rights as the Negroes" and urged votes for the union as votes "for better working conditions, not . . . against the white race."

The board panel rejected the employer's claim that a precedent had been established in previous cases in which the NLRB had set aside elections lost by a union in the face of "inflammatory" appeals based on race used by management.

"We did not lay down the rule that parties would be forbidden to discuss race," the decision observed.

The elections were set aside because management made "an appeal to animosity rather than to consideration of economic and social conditions and possible actions to deal with them," an appeal "setting race against race," the board said.

Board Orders New Vote at A & P, Blasts Anti-Union Tactics in Florida

The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Inc., used a company "thrift plan" as a weapon with which to undermine a union organizing campaign in A&P's Jacksonville, Fla., area stores, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

The big chain store firm also illegally timed employe wage increases to coincide with election petitions filed by the Retail Clerks during a 1965 organizing campaign, the board held.

A three-member panel, upholding a trial examiner's findings in part and reversing them in part, set aside a tie-vote election on the ground that the company unlawfully interfered with it. The panel ruled that no new election is necessary because the union had a clear majority of eligible employes in the company's Wauchula, Fla., store, as of Sept. 7, 1965 when it asked for recognition, and ordered A&P to bargain collectively with the union. Management also was directed to embody any resulting agreement in a signed contract.

In its decision the board related that on Aug. 13, 1965, shortly after the union began organizing in Jacksonville, the A&P vice president in charge of area stores announced that the company thrift plan was being improved and urged them to participate. The employes, however, were also reminded that workers represented by a union were "automatically ineligible" for the plan —an arrangement under which employe savings would be invested in U.S. bonds or A&P stock.

Later the Wauchula store manager told a store employe that she would lose her thrift plan credit if the store "went union." The board concluded that, in view of the timing of the company announcement, the manager's remark at a time when the union had just requested A&P to recognize it and bargain, and other unfair labor practices, "we are of the opinion that the thrift plan was one of the weapons used" by the company in its anti-union campaign.

'Flagrant' Misconduct

Shortly after the start of union activities, the company launched a course of action comprising a "consistent and flagrant pattern of unlawful conduct" having a significant impact" on all employes, the NLRB found. When the union filed its representation petitions and requested bargaining, A&P's unlawful conduct "intensified both in frequency and content."

It noted that each Wauchula store employe got a 25 percent wage increase on Sept. 11, 1965, four days after the union request for recognition, and that the increase was retroactive to Sept. 6. During the same month, the store manager made statements to employes clearly conveying that the "selection of the union would result in unfavorable working conditions and possible discharge," the report stressed.

The board ordered A&P to stop refusing to recognize RCIA Local 1636, and to bargain with it, to stop maintaining a thrift plan that excludes union members, to stop enforcing any rule prohibiting union members from soliciting employes on behalf of Local 1636 in non-public, nonworking areas during the non-working time of both, and to stop granting benefits to employes to induce them to withdraw their support from the union.

Progress Under LBJ

AMERICA IS NOW beginning to reap the harvest of the great social legislation advanced by the Johnson Administration and adopted by the 89th Congress. It is a record unsurpassed in any period of democratic government. We are proud of the role played by the AFL-CIO, which initiated the fight for many of these programs and which actively supported them in the Congress.

On the first of February, the new minimum wage bill—the most effective anti-poverty legislation yet—became law. With that new bill, 9 million more Americans gained the protection and benefits of that law. One billion dollars a year of new purchasing power was pumped into the economy.

The record of social progress during the Johnson Administration extends into many other broad areas of constructive action, for the welfare of all Americans:

1. Three million older Americans have received hospital care and 5.5 million have received physicians' services under medicare just through Jan. 31.

2. More than 19 million older Americans are protected under the hospital insurance part of medicare, and 17.5 million have also signed up for supplementary medical insurance.

3. An additional million persons are receiving social security benefits today, as a result of the 1965 and 1966 amendments, who would otherwise not be receiving any benefits.

4. All 23 million social security beneficiaries are receiving monthly cash benefits at least 7 percent higher as a result of the 1965 amendments.

5. The Elementary & Secondary Education Act is helping more than 8 million disadvantaged children through special programs in over 17,000 communities.

6. Library books, text books, and other educational materials have been provided for 49 million school children and 2 million teachers under the Elementary & Secondary Education Act.

7. More than 135,000 needy college students are being helped to continue their education through the new program of educational opportunity grants initiated last fall, and 198,000 students who could not otherwise afford to go to college are being aided through part-time jobs under the college work-study program.

8. Measles vaccine for 4.5 million children has been made available to state and local health agencies under the 1965 amendments to the Vaccination Assistance Act.

9. During the last four years there has been a $9.3 billion, 72 percent expansion in federal programs which directly combat poverty and assist the poor. More than 1,000 local communities have been mobilized for the war on poverty.

10. More than 1 million needy children have been helped by Head Start, Neighborhood Youth Corps and other programs.

11. More than 1 million persons are currently receiving training and new avenues of opportunity under Manpower Development & Training programs.

Satisfying as this record is, much more remains to be done before America can afford to pause on its march forward in the social welfare field.

We are confident the President shares that view. He has already asked the Congress for broader programs and additional legislation in this area. For ourselves, we want to make this clear: The AFL-CIO will be working day in and day out to achieve the kind of society we seek—one in which insecurity, poverty and injustice no longer exist in our land. Nothing less is worthy of America.

Coast to Coast

Executive Council Statement On Social Security, Welfare

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 20, 1967, Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE AFL-CIO strongly supports the President's recommendation for an over-all 20 percent increase in social security benefits. The President's proposal would have the immediate effect of increasing benefits for all present and future recipients and pulling 1.5 million poor now receiving social security benefits out of the mire of poverty. It also includes a number of other significant improvements in the social security program.

On the other hand, the Republican proposal for a mere 8 percent increase in social security benefits is grossly inadequate. While it has the surface attraction of avoiding increased contributions, benefit levels would still be so low that very few beneficiaries now below the poverty level would be raised above it.

We consider the President's proposal as a significant down payment on the needed 50 percent rise in benefits and other improvements in social security, including disability insurance and medicare, called for by the last AFL-CIO convention. Such further improvements should be achieved as soon as possible. The 50 percent goal would require some financing from general revenues which we believe is necessary and desirable. But we believe the President's proposal represents a substantial first step toward that goal, which can be enacted now without imposing a burden on the general revenue.

In addition to the improvements recommended by the President, we believe that the legislation should also provide that both benefit levels and the earnings base on which both contributions and benefits are determined should be kept up-to-date by periodic adjustment, keeping them in line with the incomes of those still working. In this way the elderly and other Americans dependent on social security will be able to share in the nation's economic progress.

We endorse the President's recommendation to extend medicare to the disabled. While we favor the eventual extension of medicare to all social security beneficiaries, the disabled clearly deserve special priority as a group burdened by unusually high medical costs at a time when they can least afford them.

The AFL-CIO unreservedly rejects the vicious campaign of false charges aimed at slashing public welfare programs throughout the country. To the contrary, we insist that public welfare must be extended and improved to adequately meet the minimum needs of those among the poor who are either ineligible for social security or whose social security payments are too low to meet even rock-bottom minimum requirements.

To this end we endorse the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare for an expanded national effort and a new pattern of federal-state cooperation to provide as a matter of right adequate financial aid and social services to all in need. Until such time as an adequate national standard of need can be established for public assistance, we strongly support the President's recommendation that in their public assistance payments states be required to meet their own definition of need which should be kept up-to-date annually as conditions change. We urge elimination of the outmoded and unjust categorical approach so that welfare payments would be based on the only appropriate test, need.

We especially urge federal action to abolish the "man in the house" rule and other senseless and cruel penalties imposed on needy families in some areas which are a blot on American traditions of compassion and social justice.

The general objectives of the President's proposals for revision of the tax structure for the elderly are based on the fact that the present structure is both unduly complex and lacking in equity.

However, we find one major fault in the particular mechanism the Administration has proposed for achieving these objectives. We particularly oppose the aspects of the Administration's recommendations which involve taxation of social security and Railroad Retirement benefits.

Social security payments under federal programs have always been tax-exempt while the incomes on which contributions to the social insurance funds have been based have been subject to tax. This should continue to be the guiding principle.

Morgan Says:

Public Television of Some Kind May Really Be Headed Our Way

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THE UNITED STATES, McGeorge Bundy reminds us after he left the White House to become president of the Ford Foundation, is the only "advanced" country in the world without a national noncommercial television network.

There is a cutting irony in the accuracy of this statement. Television, you may remember, was going to be a boon, the greatest contribution to culture and learning since the invention of the printing press. Its potential is still there but it is languishing and the dreary truth of the matter is that today it is less of a boon than a bust.

Morgan

Still, somebody will ask, who needs another network when we already have three big, healthy commercial ones operating from border to border and coast to coast, plus more than 600 individual TV stations in or near virtually every sizable community in the land.

Theoretically nobody would need another under such saturated and competitive circumstances. Most other countries have only one network—almost invariably controlled by the government—although some, if you can stretch your mind to imagine such a state of civilization, don't have any TV at all.

Most in this category are among what we call the have-not or underdeveloped nations. Some of them may find to their sorrow that to have may be less of an enriching experience than to have not.

The trouble with American television is very simple. It is over-commercialized. The industry, basically, is run by highly skilled salesmen to sell products. Selling products is as American as apple pie—especially if you can take what mother used to make and merchandise it by the millions to the masses.

Squeeze a little fluffy entertainment in between the sales pitches for the pie and you have the standard recipe, only slightly over-simplified, for commercial TV programming as it exists in the U.S. today. But this pie-in-the-sky, delicious as it may be, can become dangerous as a steady diet, depriving the population of the vitamins and other balanced nourishment it needs to grow into maturity.

It's as if the advertising and broadcasting executives were off on a huge kick of feeding everybody salted peanuts and now nobody can stop. Commercial TV has some good things; some superb things. Theodore H. White recently did a 90-minute report in depth on China that certainly must have been one of the most valuable documentaries in the history of broadcasting. Even the commercials were inobtrusive.

But the Madison Avenue people simply can't let well enough alone. They won't even put the ads at the beginning and the end as they used to do at the local theatre in the silent movie days. The other evening I caught a first-class film on TV but on just one of the recurring commercial breaks I counted pitches for five separate products plus a promotional ad for the station.

But now, back to McGeorge Bundy. Even before he joined it, the Ford Foundation had done more to try to lift television from the slums of mediocrity than any other organization in the country by granting large sums to educational projects. But the effort has been like hanging a Rembrandt in a supermarket—unusual but hardly noticeable among all the picturesque bargains.

BUNDY HAS PROPOSED an ambitious fourth network, hitched together by beams bouncing from a domestic satellite and paid for, in effect, by a kind of fee system which the commercial networks would pay for the use of the same satellite. The February issue of Fortune magazine describes the uproar this caused.

Both the semi-public corporation Comsat which is reaching for the domestic satellite business, and American Telephone & Telegraph, which handles most of broadcasting's transmission lines, attacked the concept as "economically unsound and socially undesirable."

Broadcasters complained they should not be the only ones taxed if noncommercial TV is going to be subsidized. Stations did not mention something which Bundy did: The incalculably valuable national asset which they already get free in the use of the public channels and frequencies assigned to them once they are licensed to broadcast.

Broached only after long research and consultations with experts including Fred Friendly, former president of CBS News, the Bundy idea obviously faces rough going. But public television of some kind seems really on the way.

Pres. Johnson in his State of the Union message gave an important commercial for educational TV as a "vital national resource." Another foundation, the Carnegie Corp., unveiled a report which cost half a million dollars and took 14 months work. It recommended NOT a network, but a collection of autonomous community public TV stations to be financed by an excise tax on new television sets. The tax has already provoked a row but the momentum for a major non-commercial TV service may be too strong to stop.

Culture can be its own commercial. Wouldn't it be funny if for millions deprived of uninterrupted quality programs it turns out that that's where the action is?

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

GOV. ROMNEY of Michigan—a prime candidate for the Republican presidential nomination next year—ran into trouble about Viet Nam with 30-odd political reporters touring with him to six western states. The reporters wanted to know what, if anything, he would do about Viet Nam that is different from what Pres. Johnson is doing. Romney took the viewpoint that GOP candidates had options for a "fresh approach"—committing himself to nothing.

It became clear, as the reporters tried to pin him down, that Mr. Romney has no settled ideas of his own on what this country should do—about Premier Ky's government in Saigon, about bombing in the North, about the Viet Cong's political arm, the National Liberation Front.

Mr. Johnson had made "mistakes," and he was "locked into" them—this was about the extent of the governor of Michigan's comments. He added a charge that the President was motivated by "political expediency," but refused to give a specific example.

It is wholly understandable that a state governor with no experience in foreign affairs, with no compulsion in the past to deal with the hard yea-and-nay options that confront a President, finds himself fumbling when asked for specifics about Southeast Asia.

The fumbling, however, is a deficiency in the arena of presidential politics.

In the White House, the buck-passing stops at the desk in the President's oval office, as Harry S. Truman used to observe. In campaigning for the presidency, buck-passing by the use of such generalized phrases as "political expediency" to describe the incumbent's policy and conduct may strike many citizens as a mere expedient.

THE GOP, it was observed after the Nov. 8 elections, emerged with strengthened forces and a variety of young fresh faces in the Senate—Charles Percy of Illinois, Edward Brooke of Massachusetts, Mark Hatfield of Oregon, Howard Baker of Tennesse.

Nothing has happened since then to project any of these new senators into a leading role as a potential candidate for the presidency.

The leading figures are Gov. Romney, largely on the basis of the fact that he was smashingly re-elected, and former Vice Pres. Nixon.

There is a count against both of them. Mr. Nixon, as observed in this space last week, has his basic potential convention delegate strength among the southerners who formed the hard core of Sen. Barry Goldwater's support in 1964. Goldwater is for him, too—or at least is against Romney, who refused to support the Arizona senator two and a half years ago.

Gov. Rockefeller of New York, who may prove a potent force, is for Romney, according to unquestionable reports. So is former Gov. Scranton of Pennsylvania. But Romney suffers his own built-in handicaps that reveal themselves as he campaigns—an insularity, it might be described most charitably.

THE CHARGE that Mr. Johnson's Vietnamese policy, with its griefs and bloodshed, is pursued as a matter of unworthy "political expediency" is reminiscent of the George Romney who just a few years ago ran for public office as some sort of self-described independent rather than an avowed Republican.

Men who come belatedly to a party identification have been elected to the White House. Gen. Eisenhower was one, Herbert Hoover was another. But they had behind them clear records of public service on a national and global scale, and their names were household words on the basis of this service.

The Romney western-state tour, in any case, seems not to have proved a total joy to the governor of Michigan. His path to the GOP nomination does not seem to be smooth and straight, nor his path to the White House in case he should be nominated.

Labor News Conference:

Wages Termed 'Small Factor' In World Trade Competition

AMERICAN WAGE STANDARDS are "only one small" factor in U. S. industry's competition for world markets, an AFL-CIO research specialist pointed out in a recent radio interview.

International trade involves "sales of products for prices," not "sales of wages and hours and conditions of work," said Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research on the AFL-CIO-produced program, Labor News Conference.

Wages are just one of many cost items to an employer, she noted, pointing out that executive salaries and non-production expenses are often lumped with workers' wages as labor costs.

Furthermore, she observed, the prices employers set on their products are "not always determined" by costs.

Profits are also a factor in prices, she said, and "the profits of American corporations from their investments, both in the United States and in other countries . . . have been going up rather rapidly" and are "extremely high."

"NEITHER WAGE RATES nor unit labor costs have risen as rapidly in the United States, yet every problem is posed, it would seem, in terms of the wage rate, not even the labor costs comparison," she said.

Mrs. Jager pointed out that the AFL-CIO is concerned with trade policies because "we are concerned about keeping the American standard of living as high as it is, and if possible, improving it . . . and also anxious for the standard of living of other countries to improve."

Reporters questioning her on Labor News Conference, a weekly feature of the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Hobart Rowen, business and financial editor of the Washington Post, and Maarten C. Bolle, Washington correspondent for radio, television and newspapers in The Netherlands.

How to Buy:

Home Owners Warned to Guard Against 'Improvement' Gypsters

STRONG WARNINGS about deceptively-sold home improvement jobs have been issued recently by both Better Business Bureaus and the Federal Trade Commission.

Especially prominent have been exaggerated claims and misleading quotations for aluminum siding. Sometimes low quotes have proved to be for unpainted aluminum. While the contractor does paint the siding before or after installation, this finish is not as durable as the anodized or the enameled kind.

Other misleading statements have been observed in respect to the amount of siding needed. In some instances, homeowners have been fooled by what seems to be low quotations based on lineal feet. The Akron O. Better Business Bureau points out that in the past, it has been customary to quote prices on the basis of a "square." This is 10 feet by 10 feet, or 100 square feet. (It takes 15 lineal feet of material, or 50 percent more, to equal one "square.")

Another fooler may be the guage or thickness of the aluminum. As the St. Louis BBB explains the practice of high-pressure sellers, the company may agree with its salesmen that it will advertise .015 guage siding at $299 for 1,000 square feet, but the salesmen are instructed not to sell it.

"Complicating" improvement jobs with additional features is a frequent device for inflating prices used even by some of the more established contractors, reports John Cherveny, general manager of Ferndale, Mich., Cooperative Home Modernization, Inc.

"Here is a typical three-bid job," Cherveny says. "The specifications were for siding, 16 squares, no trim but with backerboard. The actual cost to the contractor for labor and materials for this job is $864. Company A bid $1,490; Company B, $2,850; Company C, $1,195. Company B sold the job with 'trim work' and 'styrofoam backer,' plus storm windows and stone base around the house. Many times the customer does not need the stone base costing $300. If the customer would insist on a breakdown of the total price, item by item, the high pressure salesman would not have a chance."

The Ferndale co-op is a contracting organization started and operated by homeowners in the Detroit area to protect themselves against overcharges. Cherveny reports that the average home usually needs 14 squares of aluminum siding. He advises that .024 or .025 siding without backerboard is the best buy.

THERE IS great variation in quality, with low-quality siding, storm windows, enclosures and other materials often selling for the same price as good quality. All things being equal, good-quality siding costs the contractor $54 a square including labor and materials, Cherveny reports. The co-op sells it for $70 a square. Three leading companies in the Detroit area charge $90 to $125 a square.

Cherveny warns that a tremendous amount of new siding material is entering the market, such as vinyl siding, which has not been fully tested for temperature changes, weatherizing, and other long-range stresses.

One of the most frequent areas of exploitation is smaller jobs such as gutters and roofing. Cherveny cites a charge by one contractor of $321 for 88 feet of aluminum gutters. That works out to about $3.60 a foot. The contractor's cost including labor and materials is 85 cents. Even with the usual markup of 100 percent, the price should have been no more than $1.70.

Homeowners even must make sure to insist on 5-inch gutters. Otherwise they may get the inadequate 4-inch, Cherveny advises.

As serious as are inflated contract prices, heavy financing charges can double them again. An increasingly-used device of high-pressure contractors is to minimize costs not merely by quoting so much a month as stores like to, but even "pennies a day," Cherveny reports. "Take 50 pennies a day, times 30, times 12, times 20 years, and a contract price of $1500 becomes $3600."

Significantly, the more the cost is built up, the longer it takes to pay, and the more the interest charges pyramid the ultimate price.

'Tea Break' Is Now Part Of British Common Law

London—Something new was added to the great mass of British common law recently when a Berkshire court ruled in its majesty that the tea break is implicit in every worker's contract—even if it isn't spelled out.

The course of the legal action was a circuitous one. It started when a thirsty worker operating a mechanical digger was told by his foreman that he could take his tea break if he wasn't gone too long. The nearest cup of the traditional beverage was four miles away, so that worker naturally decided to travel by his digger, according to an account in the Trades Union Congress' information broadsheet, Labor.

So the worker headed for the town and, once there, parked within a crosswalk. The bobbies nabbed him and charged him with a wide variety of infractions. They attached the greatest degree of culpability to the allegation that he drove without insurance, since he was using the vehicle for pleasure and not work.

The defense claimed he was too working, stressing the point about the right to the tea being part of every labor agreement written or unwritten.

The court, after giving the matter due consideration, agreed with the defense, Labor reported.

'Drastic' Cuts Urged:

Metcalf Book Assails Electric Rate Abuses

RESIDENTIAL and commercial users of electricity will be overcharged to the tune of $11 billion by 1980 if some action isn't taken on electric rates, Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) believes.

He is asking that "drastic reductions be made in the rates charged by giant Investor-Owned-Utilities—IOUs—and to a lesser extent by the consumer-owned power systems."

In his new book, "Overcharge," which he co-authored with his executive secretary, Vic Reinemer, Metcalf charges that private electric utilities "exploit and mislead the public."

He uses facts and figures to back up his point. For example, the average residential rate for customers served by municipal power systems is 1.57¢ per kilowatt-hour. For customers of IOUs on the other hand, the average rate is 2.33¢ per kwh.

Not only are residents or areas served by private utilities paying far more for their electric power, Metcalf says, but they frequently find their local taxes are higher, too.

"Many public power systems," he writes, "finance city improvements thus permitting decreases in local taxes. Swimming pools, ball parks, schools and hospitals, street lighting—the full range of community services—are financed in whole or in part by utility revenues, rather than by taxes, in many cities or towns that operate their own power systems."

The argument of private utilities that they pay taxes which make up much of the difference is deflated by the authors. They say that city-owned and private utilities pay the same percentage of their operating revenues in local and states taxes. IOUs pay federal taxes, too, but Metcalf and Reinemer list the federal tax breaks the private utilities receive, showing that their customers really pay most of these taxes.

THE AUTHORS point out that: "IOUs have the right to eminent domain; that is, the right to take private property upon making reasonable compensation. Free enterprise business does not.

"IOUs supply an indispensable service on a monopoly basis, with government protection; free enterprise does not.

"Customers can choose which free enterprise business they will patronize but cannot select the company from which they purchase power.

"A free enterprise businessman makes money only if he can keep his costs low enough to make a profit at selling prices fixed by competition. IOUs operate on a cost-plus, sole-source basis. Government virtually guarantees IOUs all expenses, including taxes and salaries, plus profits."

Aside from the financial picture though, the authors charge that part of the private utility industry finances right-wing movements including the John Birch Society.

A minute description is provided, too, of the richly-financed publicity campaigns, the roadblocks that undermine the state and federal regulatory agencies, and precisely how the IOUs counter their greatest enemy—competition. (PAI).

From Soup to Nonsense:

That Going, Going, Gone Stuff Sometimes Can Really Send You

By Jane Goodsell

AN AUCTION combines many of the best (and almost as many of the worst) elements of a horse race, a prize fight, a gold rush, a rummage sale and a poker game. Almost anything can happen, and something nearly always does.

It is this unpredictable, wild and wooly quality which makes auctions irresistible to those of us who can't stay away from them. In an age in which riots are rehearsed, demonstrations are time-clocked and TV programs are taped and edited to eliminate the possibility of bloopers, an auction is live entertainment at its liveliest.

It is also one of the best sites for people-watching because people at an auction reveal themselves as they are, only more so. You can learn a lot of surprising things about human beings, including yourself, by watching how they behave when they're bidding.

Some bid like poker players without changing expression. Others chew their knuckles and bite their lips. There are secretive types who bid by nodding or winking or scratching their noses, and expansive extroverts who wave their hands and shout.

I once observed a diffident, immaculately dinner-jacketed gentleman with a small mustache (he looked like the very model of a modern major-general) shout "Yippee!" and dance a jig when an English brass handbell was knocked down to him for $26.

BUYING SOMETHING at an auction is not at all like a shopping expedition when you can dash from store to store, comparing prices, checking warranties and taking merchandise home on approval. Auction-buying is more like dipping into a grab bag, and that (at least for those who are hooked on them) is what makes auctions so tantalizing. The marble-topped washstand, knocked down to you for $75, may be worth twice as much —or half as much—as you paid for it.

Auctions operate on the principle of caveat emptor, but many of us buyers forget to beware in the pulse-racing excitement of bidding. There are endless ways of losing one's head. Some people will raise any bid to get something that has taken their fancy, while others will buy anything if it's cheap enough.

Any auction buff can tell almost as many tales as Scheherezade, and probably some of them are true. Go to an auction and see for yourself. But beware. When you hear the auctioneer chanting "Going, going, gone!" you may find yourself gone, too.

CLC Hits Ignorance, Prejudice:

Canada Government Urged To Spell Out Policy on Labor

Ottawa, Ont.—A clear declaration of policy on labor-management relations was urged on the federal government by the Canadian Labour Congress in the annual presentation of its views on legislation and administration to Prime Minister Lester Pearson and members of the cabinet.

The CLC spokesman was Pres. Claude Jodoin, who was accompanied by other CLC officers and a representative group of members.

Jodoin bluntly charged members of Parliament and the press with both an ignorance of and a prejudice against unions, and accused Minister of Labor John R. Nicholson of urging "restrictive legislation which would deny the right to strike."

"We believe very strongly that it is no solution for your government to restrict or deny to workers the right to withdraw their labor and to compel them to work against their will," the 16,000-word statement said.

"This is a formula familiar to every authoritarian government the world over but one which is inconceivable here."

Labor's Role

The CLC declared the country needs "a more genuine acceptance of trade unions and the role they play in a free society" rather than new legislation. It tartly observed that "there is apparently no proper time when trade unions should seek wage increases," and added:

"Both you as the government and the people of this country must face up to the inevitable fact that trade unions will continue to press for wage increases and that they will engage in strike action if necessary in order to achieve their objectives."

Jodoin expressed the CLC's conviction that the federal government has a "role to play" in developing mature labor relations, and added that "doing this properly may enable you to carry out your other responsibilities more sucessfully."

"We think that there is an onus on you to enunciate a clear and consistently held policy toward this end," he said. "Industrial peace is not an unattainable goal but it cannot be imposed by force."

The CLC renewed its opposition to compulsory arbitration and the use of injunctions in labor disputes, and urged clarification of labor's right to picket. If labor relations legislation is to be enacted, the brief said, "it should not end up as a convenient tool for the employer to use against the trade union of his employes but as a mechanism for resolving disputes fairly and objectively."

The CLC stood firm against any dilution in its representation on the Canada Labor Relations Board, as has been proposed, to allow representation for the Confederation of National Trade Unions. It also rejected the CNTU's effort to change bargaining patterns from national to regional scales, which it called "a system alien to this country." The bulk of CNTU membership is in the province of Quebec, where it is outnumbered by CLC members.

Jodoin warned that Canada's economy is in a "very precarious state" and "in the absence of corrective economic measures," there is "every likelihood" of an increase in unemployment and possibly a trend toward the "sluggish" economic growth and high joblessness of the period from 1957 to 1962.

Expansion Urged

In calling for "appropriate expansionary policies," the CLC urged the easing of monetary restrictions, expansion of social security programs, a "critical evaluation" of the level of construction expenditures and repeal of the 11 percent tax on building materials.

The statement deplored the lag in housing construction. It urged "vast expansion" of the public housing program with greater participation of the provinces and asked the federal government to make additional funds available—noting that a boost in the National Housing Act interest rate to 7.25 percent had failed to meet the need.

It also proposed the establishment of an agency to investigate price increases as part of a program of consumer protections, an old age security pension of $100 a month at age 65 without a means test, an increase in the federal minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.50 an hour and an overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Canada - U.S. automobile trade agreement has produced price increases in both countries and "severe" unemployment in the auto and auto parts industry of Canada, the CLC said in challenging the federal government to help workers adversely affected by the pact.

In the section dealing with international affairs, the CLC made a strong plea for increased foreign aid as part of a "bold, imaginative program."

It asked the government to be "more forceful and imaginative" in seeking ways to end the conflict in Viet Nam; strengthening of the United Nations; support of sanctions against Rhodesia, and "complete general and controlled disarmament of all nuclear chemical, bacteriological and conventional weapons by treaty."

PRESIDENT'S MEDAL of St. John's College High School, Washington, was bestowed on former Under Sec. John F. Henning (center) for his "many contributions to the labor movement." The presentation was made by Brother Bernadine Graham, F.S.C. (left), president of the school. At right is Joseph T. Geuting, r., president of the Men of St. John's. The presentation was made earlier than scheduled because of Henning's departure soon to serve as U.S. ambassador to New Zealand.

Pay Hikes, Full Rights Urged for Farm Labor

The key to ending rural poverty is higher wages for farm workers and guarantees of basic rights to end their "bondage," AFL-CIO Assistant Research Dir. Frank Fernbach declared in testimony before the National Advisory Commission on Rural Poverty.

"It is the AFL-CIO view that the single most important step in raising millions in rural America above the level of poverty is to raise the standards of our 3 million fellow citizens who work in commercial agriculture for wages," he said.

Farm workers nationwide averaged $1.18 an hour as of last October, he pointed out, but "substandard farm wages . . . and under-employment are not the only factors responsible for the depressed state of farm laborers."

"Non-wage benefits and working conditions generally are deplorable, too," he added. "And these conditions exist despite the fact that in agriculture, productivity has been rising almost twice as fast as in industry."

In his six-point program Fernbach proposed that farm workers:

- Be covered by the National Labor-Management Relations Act.
- Be fully covered under the minimum wage, maximum hours and child labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.
- Be covered under the provisions of all unemployment compensation laws.
- Be covered by all state legislation, including workmen's compensation laws, enacted "to raise the status of those who work for wages."
- Be protected from the "inevitably adverse effect" of labor-import programs by terminating them.
- Receive the attention of government at all levels and private groups in greater efforts to improve housing standards, educational opportunities and health protection, "particularly in behalf of migrant workers and their families."

To back up this program, Fernbach urged additional steps such as higher commodity crop allotments for marginal farmers; minimum federal wage, workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation standards to end the exploitation of factory workers in rural areas, and the encouragement of off-farm job opportunities—but not by pirating industry from other parts of the country.

He suggested special study of the problems that beset minority groups —particularly Negroes, the Spanish-speaking and Indians—and also the difficulties of "the so-called boxed-in people," the low-income older rural residents.

MOST IMPORTANT single step in raising millions of rural Americans above the poverty level is to improve the wage standards of the nation's 3 million farm workers, AFL-CIO Assistant Research Dir. Frank Fernbach told the National Advisory Commission on Rural Poverty at a hearing in Washington.

Teachers to Challenge Jailing of Organizers

New Brunswick, N.J.—The American Federation of Teachers secured the release from Middlesex County Jail of two union organizers fined for leading a teachers' strike and announced it will ask higher courts to revoke the sentences pronounced on AFT Local 822 and 11 members.

Superior Court Judge Leon Gerofsky ruled 11 union leaders guilty of criminal contempt for not complying with a Jan. 16 injunction ordering Woodbridge Township teachers back to work. AFT Rep. Joseph Cascella was fined $1,000 and ordered to serve three months in the county workhouse; union Pres. Charles Richards, who is also on the staff of the New Jersey State AFT, was fined $1,000 and ordered to serve one month; Local 822 was ordered to pay a $1,000 fine. Sentences were suspended for nine other teachers but $500 fines were imposed on each.

AFT Pres. Charles Cogen wired funds to pay the fines and Superior Court Judge Mark A. Sullivan, Jr., stayed the jail sentences until Feb. 23 to give Cascella and Richards time to raise a $10,000 appeal bond. They were released after a few hours when the AFT came to their aid.

Cogen said the jailing was the first for striking teachers in the union's 51-year history. Almost all other injunctions have been dissolved after a strike settlement because, he said, "nothing is gained by vindictive use of court power after agreements have been reached."

Pres. Albert Shanker of AFT local 2, New York City, called the sentencing a "bitter example of the lack of genuine bargaining rights for teachers" in New Jersey. Cogen and Shanker promised full assistance to the Woodbridge teachers.

Strike Won

The teachers' strike ended in January with the help of mediator Theodore Kheel. The strikers held out until they achieved what the AFT called a "good settlement." They won wage hikes of $500 to $1,200 a year and other contract improvements.

Judge Gerofsky sentenced the strike leaders after the settlement, saying that defiance of restraining orders "constitutes a challenge to authority"and a "seditious attempt against the life of the courts."

Elsewhere in New Jersey 500 teachers continued a campaign to get the Jersey City Board of Education to bargain with AFT Local 752 on wages and classroom conditions. The union stopped picketing in compliance with a court order, but high schools were closed and elementary schools also were affected by a "stop work" drive. Union Pres. Phil Washington said the union is ready to negotiate whenever the city agrees to do so.

On-Job Injury Rate Remains Unchanged

Chicago—Last year's on-the-job death rate remained unchanged at 20 per 100,000 workers despite an increase over 1965 in both deaths and injuries, the National Safety Council reported.

Deaths from accidents on the job rose 400 to 14,500 in 1966 and disabling injuries jumped 100,000 to 2.2 million—increases of 3 percent and 4 percent, respectively—but employment rose more than 4 percent, explained Henry J. Hoeffer, assistant general manager of the council.

Unions to Aid Job Placement For Disabled

New York—The New York City AFL-CIO's labor rehabilitation liaison project has received a $220,000 grant from the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration for a three-year union-based program of selective job placement of disabled workers.

The city central body is matching the grant, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., said.

The project is based on the conviction that selective job placement is the key to the vocational rehabilitation process and that the overall rehabilitation effort may be nullified by failure to put the disabled worker, within a reasonable time, into a job he can fill.

The council said the labor rehabilitation liaison project has found "serious inadequacies" in existing placement resources. It noted that the labor movement is ready to assume a more active part in this work and declared that "the time seems ripe for a bold new selective placement program functioning primarily under labor union auspices."

The job opportunities project and the existing labor rehabilitation liaison project will be interwoven.

NATIONAL SEMINAR in Chicago marked a new stage in the Lithographers & Photoengravers program of making uniform craft training and retraining available to all members. The week-long session drew 167 delegates from 54 locals who not only heard lectures but attended workshop demonstrations and visited area graphic arts operations.

LPIU Seminars Open Craft Training Program

Chicago—The first of a series of annual national seminars aimed at turning craftsmen into instructors at the local level was held here by the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

The week-long sessions of lectures, workshop demonstrations and visits to graphic arts facilities in the Chicago area marked a new stage, LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown said, in the union's program to make uniform craft training and retraining available to all members.

Attending were 167 representatives of 54 locals who, it is expected, will be administering local schools and conducting courses at which their fellow-union members will sharpen old skills and develop new ones demanded by the changing industry.

2 Instructors

Instructors included Dr. Hobart H. Sommers, regional representative of the Labor Dept.'s Division of Vocational & Technical Education, and Prof. Hector H. Sutherland, director of the Rochester Institute of Technology's School of Printing.

The facilities toured included the Chicago Lithographic Institute, the color separation studio of Printing Developments, Inc., and the Cadillac Printing & Lithographing Co.

The basic cost of the over-all training and retraining program is met by payments of 25 cents per member per month voted by the members effective in January 1966, combined with payments for craft training negotiated by various locals with their employers.

The emphasis is on decentralization, Brown said, rather than on a central facility which would require a craftsman to leave home and job. He added that the whole concept is one "that brings the training to the student apprentice and journeyman where he lives and works."

The union's goal is to establish union-employer schools in 20 major graphic arts centers in the United States and Canada, Brown said, and to set up training programs in smaller localities that would use employer facilities during non-production hours.

"Given the present rate of technological change," he observed, "it is reasonable to assume that a craftsman will have to be trained and retrained two or three times during his working life if he is to remain employed in the graphic arts as a master of his skills and the tools with which he works."

Vocational Act Is 50 Years Old

The 50th anniversary of the signing of the Smith-Hughes Vocational Education Act of 1917, the first legislation authoring federal aid to education, was observed Feb. 23.

The day was marked by special observances in several states, including the dedication of a number of new vocational schools constructed with the aid of federal funds appropriated under the act.

The U.S. Office of Education also announced the allocation of $265.4 million to strengthen state vocational education programs. The money was appropriated under the Smith-Hughes Act, the George-Barden Act of 1946 and the Vocational Education Act of 1963.

National Airlines Union Voting to Strike by 10-1

Chicago—Members of the Air Line Employes on National Airlines were voting by a margin of more than 10-1 in a nationwide referendum to authorize a strike at the big carrier's three dozen locations. The deadline for ballot returns is Mar. 6.

The vote was authorized by ALEA's airline executive council when 11 months of negotiations and a series of three mediation efforts by the National Mediation Board failed to resolve issues in a dispute involving 2,800 passenger service and clerical employes.

The union said that National is "one of the most successful and profitable of U.S. trunk air lines" but has "adamantly refused" to agree to wages, fringe benefits and working conditions on a par with those of other major trunk lines. Instead it has "consistently and unrealistically tried to compare itself with the local feeder air lines."

ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert said:

"Labor trouble is nothing new to National. Its disputes with all its employe groups are historic."

The fact that National is now the "most profitable of all U.S. trunk air lines" has not changed its approach to personnel problems, Herbert observed.

The National Mediation Board announced Feb. 3 that it had exhausted all efforts to resolve the dispute and that further mediation would be useless. The union will be free to strike at the close of a 30-day "cooling-off" period called for by the Railway Labor Act. The period ends March 17.

ALEA is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. A strike would affect passenger service in Washington, New York, Miami, New Orleans, San Francisco, Los Angeles and other major cities.

Pulp-Sulphite Workers Name Two to Staff

Fort Edward, N.Y.—The Pulp-Sulphite Workers have announced two new staff appointments. Pres.-Sec. Joseph P. Tonelli named Benjamin Wyle as the union's legal adviser and Richard A. Estep as public information director and editor of the Pulp & Paper Worker.

Pulp-Sulphite Wins Big Unit At Scott Paper

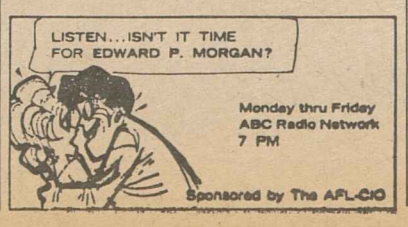
Chester, Pa.—A major holdout against unionism in Delaware County was removed when workers at the Scott Paper Co. plant voted to be represented by the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers.

The vote was 952-642 in a National Labor Relations Board election. It reversed the outcome of elections lost by unions in 1963 and 1960, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig said. In 1963, Pulp-Sulphite won the right to represent 400 Scott workers at nearby Eddystone, Pa., and their contract gains, though limited because the main plant was non-union, gave impetus to the Chester workers, Craig reported.

Recently the Curtis Publishing Co. plant in Delaware county, a major objective of printing trades unions, was organized after 50 years of effort through a concerted drive by unions in the industry.

"These two victories will change the economic and political climate in this area and add greatly to the strength of the local labor movement," said Dir. William L. Kircher of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

The Scott Paper drive was conducted by Pulp-Sulphite representatives, with the aid of an in-plant organizing committee and members of other AFL-CIO unions.



No Rise in January:

Prices Hold Steady First Time in Year

The Consumer Price Index in January remained unchanged for the first time in a year, the Labor Dept. reported, with declines in prices for food, apparel and automobiles offsetting increases in charges for services.

The rise for the three months from November through January, two-tenths of 1 percent, was the lowest for any comparable period in the last year and a half, the report showed.

The CPI stood at 114.7 in January, the same as in December. The reading means that the price of a package of goods and services that cost $10 during the 1957-9 base period remained at $11.47.

Commissioner of Labor Statistics Arthur M. Ross said the slowdown in the price climb was "encouraging." But he stood by the prediction he made in January that the CPI will rise about 2.5 percent during 1967. That still would be an improvement over 1966, when the over-the-year increase was 3.3 percent.

The December-January drop in food prices was led by beef, poultry and eggs, and was attributed to larger supplies. Prices for fresh fruits and vegetables went up, as did those for restaurant meals, but the over-all decline was three-tenths of 1 percent.

New cars dropped 1 percent, a more-than-usual decline reflecting a rise in inventories in relation to sales. Used cars declined 1.1 percent or about in line with seasonal expectations, the report showed.

Medical care continued to pace the rise in costs of services with an increase of nearly 1 percent. Hospital costs jumped 2.8 percent, health insurance rose 1.1 percent and doctors' and dentists' fees climbed by one-half of 1 percent.

Further price rises were posted for various household and personal services and also for residental rentals. Electric bills were four-tenths of 1 percent above December.

Apparel was down about 1 percent in spite of a continuing rise in the price of footwear, which went up one-tenth of 1 percent. The drop was less than usual.

During the 12-month period ending with January more than half of the 3.3 percent rise in the CPI was caused by a 5 percent jump in consumer service charges, the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed in an analysis.

Food prices were 3 percent higher than a year ago but down nearly 1 percent from the 1966 high, reached in October.

Footwear Up 6%

Apparel prices showed a 3.7 percent jump, with footwear more than 6 percent higher than in January 1966; textile housefurnishings were up more than 2.5 percent and gasoline prices more than 3 percent—with another sharp increase due unless the Administration succeeds in persuading the refiners to rescind the latest hike.

The BLS said the most stable prices over the year were those of consumer durables except furniture. While they averaged less than 1 percent higher than in January 1966 and appliance prices eased down by one-half of 1 percent, furniture costs were 4.5 percent more than a year ago.

The rise of only two-tenths of 1 percent in the CPI over the previous quarter precluded any wage increases for the more than 1 million workers in the auto, auto parts, farm and construction machinery and aerospace industries whose rates come up for review in January under their contracts. However, about 400,000 trucking industry employes normally would be entitled to 11 cents based on the change over the year.

In a separate report the BLS showed that although factory workers' hourly earnings rose between December and January, there were drops in gross average weekly earnings, because of a dip of six-tenths of 1 hour in the workweek, and in net spendable earnings or take-home pay after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—partly because of a rise in the social security levy.

Hourly earnings rose 1 cent to $2.78. Gross weekly earnings dropped from $114.40 to $113.15. Net spendable earnings went from $93.13 a week in December to $91.96 in January for the worker with no dependents and from December's $101.09 to $99.87 in January for the worker with three dependents.

"Real" spendable earnings, or purchasing power after allowing for changes in the CPI, also declined. For the employe with no dependents, the drop was from $81.19 to $80.17 in January. For the worker with three dependents, the weekly figure sagged from $88.13 in December to $87.07 in January.

Guild Affirms Independence In Fund Use

The Newspaper Guild has used its international affairs program solely "to deliver its trade union message" and "no one has sought to have it do otherwise," the Guild declared in a statement by its officers.

It has "no knowledge" that any of the $1 million furnished since 1960 by five foundations "came from the Central Intelligence Agency or any other U.S. or other governmental source," the statement said.

It will investigate allegations about the foundations, "immediately terminate its relationship with any found linked with the CIA" and "seek alternative sources of financial assistance" for its international program, the statement added.

The Guild officers include Pres. Arthur Rosenstock, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson and Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr.

Newspaper stories, developed after a Ramparts Magazine article revealed CIA financing of the National Student Association, said that House committee hearings in 1964 had identified various foundations as "conduits" for the transfer of CIA funds.

The union's international affairs activities, centered largely in Latin American countries, "consist primarily of seminars on journalism and trade unionism, production and distribution of associated publications, and . . . staff assistance to carry out these activities," the Guild statement emphasized.

All receipts of funds were regularly reported in Newspaper Guild financial statements, in reports to conventions, and in stories in the Guild Reporter, it added.

Goldfinger Warns:

'Imbalances' Peril Economic Growth

The U.S. economy in the past three years registered major gains but "imbalances" have continued to develop that may undermine future growth, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Among the "significant" achievements of the 1964-66 period, Goldfinger listed an annual 5.5 percent growth rate in national output, an annual 2.5 percent increase in employment, an annual reduction of eight-tenths of 1 percent in joblessness.

An underlying problem has developed, however, he warned, "in the continuing lack of balance between employe compensation, wages and salaries, on the one hand, and profits and dividends, on the other."

Goldfinger spelled out the statistics:

● Corporation profits "skyrocketed" in the decade of the Sixties by 60 percent before taxes and 80 percent after taxes. Even these figures "understate the extent of the bonanza enjoyed by business" because they do not take account of changes in accounting procedures that raised total cash-flow—profits plus retained depreciation—to 21 percent of corporation net worth.

● Dividend payments to stockholders rose 56 percent.

● Factory workers' take-home pay rose by only 24 percent—in terms of buying power only 13 percent because of rising prices.

● The price level has been rising "regardless of what happened to labor costs per unit of production"—and faster than any temporary increase in unit labor costs.

● The increase in wages and salaries, in terms of buying power, has lagged behind even the 3.2 percent guidepost urged by the Council of Economic Advisers.

Goldfinger told the committee, which is headed by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), that the "profits explosion" had fed a "dangerous and unsustainable superboom" in business investment, which expanded more rapidly than the output of the economy (Gross National Product). He appeared, with other economists, to comment on the President's Economic Report.

The tax reductions provided for business — depreciation speed-ups, the 7 percent investment tax credit, the reduction in corporation taxes from 52 percent to 48 percent—were "dangerously overdone," the AFL-CIO research director said.

Goldfinger also expressed "disturbance" at what he termed the Council of Economic Advisers' "apparent acceptance of a 4 percent unemployment rate" as equivalent to the goal of "full employment."

In the past, he said, the CEA has treated a 4 percent joblessness rate as merely an "interim target" but now treats that rate—which is about the current level of unemployment—as "essentially full employment."

"Full employment, in the context of American society, is considerably less than a 4 percent unemployment rate," Goldfinger commented, pointing out that in the immediate past such a rate has been marked by "very high levels of joblessness for Negroes, youngsters and unskilled workers."

He took issue, also, with what he called the CEA's "apparent insistence" that the growth rate potential of the economy is only 4 percent a year.

A number of other studies, he said, indicate that the CEA estimate is "selling America short." The staff of the Joint Economic Committee has itself projected an annual growth rate of 4 to 4.5 percent as "realistic," he pointed out, had also estimated that the 4.5 percent expansion of production would cut the unemployment rate to 3 percent.

The National Planning Association, Goldfinger noted, had also projected an annual growth in output of 4.5 percent—with a 5 percent yearly expansion in Gross National Product as "entirely feasible" but threatened by perhaps too modest an expansion in spending for public facilities and services.

"Restoration of balance between wages, prices, profits and business investment is esssential to provide a sound foundation for sustained economic growth" and "a more equitable distribution of income," Goldfinger told the committee.

Shopcraft Unions Urge Substantial Pay Hikes

Substantial wage increases for 130,000 railroad workers were urged by six shopcraft unions in a final statement filed with an emergency board appointed by the President.

The unions filed a brief summing up the evidence they presented over an eight-day hearing period. They told the board that sizable wage boosts are needed to catch up with rising living costs and to close a growing gap between their pay and that of other skilled workers in "outside" industry.

The six craft unions—Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Int'l. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers—presented their arguments through Edward J. Hickey, Jr., their counsel. Management, represented by J. E. Wolfe, its chief negotiator, argued that shopcraft skills are "not comparable to those in other industries."

The board will make recommendations by Mar. 13, and each side must maintain the status quo until Apr. 12. Board members are David Ginsberg, chairman; Dean Frank J. Dugan of the Georgetown University law school, and Pres. John W. McConnell of the University of New Hampshire.

As the hearings ended, IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman issued a statement strongly supporting the case for a 20 percent wage hike. Saying that the union is "behind its 22,000 railroad members every step of the way," Freeman asserted:

"Our railroad brothers have constantly fallen behind our other members until now, what used to be one of the best jobs for an IBEW member is one of the worst."

A review of a cross section of the 1,250 skilled craft agreements on file at IBEW headquarters shows that 97 percent of the workers have a better wage rate than railroad workers, Freeman said.

Approximately 76 percent of all the agreements surveyed showed a wage rate higher than the one a 20 percent increase would effect, Freeman observed.

"Our people are entitled to a substantial increase," he declared. "Our members went along with substandard wages during the years when railroad profits were down. Now the economic picture has completely changed."

Net profits of Class 1 railroads in the first nine months of 1966 were 21.5 percent higher than for the like period in 1965 and the figures for 1965 were good, Freeman pointed out.

Freeman noted that the Labor Dept.'s city workers' family budget, as updated by AFL-CIO economists, calls for a wage of $3.27 an hour 52 weeks a year to meet current living costs. The railroad management offer of a 5 percent raise would bring the IBEW rail workers to $3.20—seven cents under the minimum income needed, Freeman said. He added:

"We will not settle for a substandard wage like this. It is high time our railroad brothers caught up. Their brotherhood will back them all the way."

$50 Million Paid By ABC Welfare Fund

The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Union & Industry National Welfare Fund has paid out nearly $50.2 million in benefits in its first nine years, according to a report to members.

In addition, the ABC Union & Industry National Pension Fund in the same period has paid more than $15.7 million to retired members and survivors, the report said.

Both funds were established soon after the ABC was chartered by the AFL-CIO in December 1957. They were set up to make sure no member would lose any of the benefits to which he was entitled because of shifting his affiliation to the ABC after the Bakery & Confectionery Workers Intl. Union had been expelled from the AFL-CIO on findings of domination by corrupt elements.

The welfare fund payments include more than $10.4 million in disability benefits to help maintain the home when a member is unable to work because of illness.

Pension benefits, the report showed, are being paid to about 4,000 retired members and survivors. The benefits have increased sharply since the fund was established, with about 45 percent of the recipients receiving $150 or more a month and some getting as much as $200.

About 44,000 members are protected by the two funds, the report indicated; with dependents, at least 125,000 persons share the coverage of the welfare funds.

TWUA Urges Mills in South To Raise Pay

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America called on southern textile employers to give all their workers the same wage increases they recently gave their lowest-paid employes in compliance with the new $1.40 federal minimum wage law.

The union's executive council directed its appeal to those employers who, unlike most northern employers under contract with the TWUA, have made no move to increase wages in 1967. These are mainly non-union employers in the cotton-synthetics, hosiery and knitgoods, tufted rug and yarn segments of the industry.

Citing employer complaints of labor shortages, the union said it is "time the industry took steps to make wages more attractive to potential employes." It noted a record profit total of $1.3 billion in the year ended last September—a rise of 13 percent. Cash dividends to stockholders were $218 million, an increase of 17 percent, it stated.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said there is "no question about the industry's ability to grant a general wage increase." Unless it does so, wage differences between the lowest-paid workers and other workers will be narrowed or eliminated, he declared.

Gompers Papers Donated To Library of Congress

The AFL-CIO has given to the Library of Congress the papers of Samuel Gompers, founder of the former AFL and its president from 1886 to his death in 1924, except for one year.

The gift, announced by the library, includes more than 300 volumes of letter books covering the period from 1883, when the movement that led to formation of the AFL got under way, to 1924.

The correspondence reflects every phase of the rise and growth of the labor movement over the 41-year period. The library announcement said the collection "will be an indispensable primary source for the study of trade unionism in this country." It is open to qualified researchers in the library's Manuscript Division.

Gompers was born in England and came to this country during the Civil War. He joined the Cigarmakers Union in New York, attended lectures at Cooper Union and learned from the books, papers and journals that cigarmakers purchased through pooled funds and had read to them as they worked.

He helped reorganize his union, making it a model other unions followed, and spent the rest of his life pressing the claims of labor.

One of the letters in the correspondence the AFL-CIO donated to the American people is a request to Pres. Woodrow Wilson, shortly after his election, urging that unions be exempt from prosecution by the Justice Dept. under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The letter declared that when the courts applied the law to unions, they "created an offense never intended by the makers."

In another letter, Gompers rejoiced in Wilson's re-election in 1916 as a vindication of the New Freedom.

"Despite the most desperate efforts of intrenched power as represented by wealth alone with its blinded followers," he wrote, "the common people have stood the test. . . . The cause of labor, justice, freedom, American patriotism and humanity has been vindicated. The people of our republic are to be congratulated on your re-election as President."

The papers include documentation of Gompers' work on the Council of National Defense during World War I and on the Commission on Intl. Labor Legislation at the Paris peace conference.

Graphics Merger Vote Falls Short

A proposal for merger of two graphic arts unions failed to receive the required two-thirds support in a referendum conducted by the Stereotypers.

Members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers endorsed the plan by a nearly 3-1 margin. A majority of Stereotypers voted for merger, but the margin was short of the two-thirds needed under the union's constitution.

Officers of both unions had strongly supported the plan to merge into a new Graphic Arts union and expressed the hope that an acceptable formula for merger could still be worked out.

David Feller to Join Law School Faculty

David E. Feller, a former general counsel of the Steelworkers and legal representative for a number of unions, has been appointed to the faculty of the law school of the University of California at Berkeley.

Feller became associate general counsel for the USWA in 1949 and was named counsel in 1961.

Pragan Appointed To Institute Board

Assistant Dir. Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has been named by Pres. Johnson to the nine-member board of trustees for the new Washington Technical Institute.

The institute and a new Federal City College were created by the last Congress to fill a void in Washington's higher public education facilities. Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver also was appointed an institute trustee.

On Heels of New Mexico Defeat:

'Work' Law Beaten 210-0 In Massachusetts House

The Massachusetts House voted unanimously against a bill to outlaw the union shop. The 210-0 vote was a smashing rebuff to the National Right to Work Committee's attempt to carry its anti-union campaign into northern industrial states.

A few days earlier, the New Mexico House decisively rejected a "right-to-work" bill. New Mexico has been a perennial target of the open shop drive, carried on under the Taft-Hartley Act's Section 14(b), and over the past 20 years "work" bills have been defeated 12 times in the legislature and once in a statewide referendum.

In Wyoming, an attempt to repeal the state's four-year-old "right-to-work" law narrowly failed as the legislature adjourned with a House-passed repeal bill bottled in a Senate committee.

Here's what happened in the three states:

In New Mexico, the House voted 40-30 against a "right-to-work" resolution introduced by a Republican legislator and 14 co-sponsors. It would have put the proposal to prohibit the union shop to a referendum.

At a committee hearing several businessmen and clergymen, including a spokesman for Catholic Archbishop James Peter Davis, of Santa Fe, joined union leaders in opposing the union shop ban.

After a five-hour hearing, the House Labor Committee voted 7-3 to put a "do not pass" recommendation on the bill.

On the House floor, 37 Democrats and three Republicans voted to concur in the committee report and against "right-to-work." Voting for the "work" proposal were 22 Republicans and eight Democrats.

Wyoming Battle

Despite two efforts to force a "right-to-work" repeal bill out of the Senate Labor Committee, the Wyoming Legislature adjourned with the union shop ban still on the statute books.

As was the case two years ago, the House voted to repeal the state's "work" law. Seven Republicans joined with 27 Democrats to put together a 34-27 majority.

The first attempt to bring the bill to the Senate floor lost on a 16-14 vote, when only two Republicans joined the 12 Democrats in voting for the motion. Less than a week later, a third Republican—at labor's urging—introduced a new motion to bring the bill to the floor. Under Senate rules, it required three seconds. It failed when only two Republicans seconded it and Senate Democrats refused to join in the effort.

Rejected in Massachusetts

Massachusetts has never faced a serious open shop threat, but the state was listed this year as a long-range target by the National Right to Work Committee.

The sponsor of the "work" bill, a Worcester Republican, said he introduced the measure at the request of a teen-age constituent but didn't support it himself.

Neither, it appeared at a committee hearing, did anyone else other than spokesmen of the state "right to work" committee.

More than 1,000 union members from all parts of the state turned out for the one-day hearing, which was moved to the Gardner Auditorium in the State House for the largest turnout ever seen for a legislative hearing.

Democratic and Republican leaders, including a spokesman for Republican Gov. John A. Volpe were unanimous in opposition to the bill and its sponsor told the committee, "I couldn't care less" what happened to it.

The committee's unfavorable report reached the House floor routinely and the unanimous rollcall followed.

Sheet Metal Union Wins 44c Package

Columbus, O.—The Sheet Metal Workers concluded successful negotiations for a first labor agreement.

A new contract with Lennox Industries here will give 608 production and maintenance employes a full union shop, a 44-cent economic package over a three-year term, including four months' retroactive pay; strong wage incentive protections and many other benefits. The plant produces heating and air-conditioning equipment.

The union ousted a 21-year-old unaffiliated union in a National Labor Relations Board election last September.

Fire Fighters Continue Monoxide Risk Probe

The Fire Fighters have made a $4,000 grant from the union's John P. Redmond Memorial Fund to continue a research project begun in 1962 by the IAFF's Denver local.

The study, directed by Dr. Gerald Gordon of Denver, deals with the toxic effects of carbon monoxide absorbed into the blood stream by fire fighters in the course of their work.

Announcement of the grant was made by Pres. William D. Buck and Vice Pres. William H. McClennan, chairman of the Redmond Fund, established to honor a former president of the union. The fund is supported by contributions from the union's locals.

Two of Denver's busiest fire companies will be subjects of the latest phase of the study—involving evaluation of blood samples and electrocardiograms taken after every fire involving smoke exposure. Two men on each shift have received training in drawing the blood samples and giving the heart tests.

Earlier phases of the research indicated that the normal blood saturation of carbon monoxide of under 4 percent shot above 20 percent and as high as a near-lethal 46 percent after a major fire. On occasion, it took as long as three days for the excess carbon monoxide to be cleared from the blood.

Monoxide poisoning is considered a particular risk because carbon monoxide cannot be smelled or detected by any of the senses.

The Denver local originated the study with a $15,000 appropriation from the local's treasury.

The union said another nine months of study and an additional $25,000 in grants will be required to complete the project. It said a special appeal will be made to union members "to advance this research which will be of great value in preventing carbon monoxide poisoning, treating it when it occurs and developing better equipment to guard against it."

Apprenticeship Bureau Fills New England Post

Jerome J. Haggerty, Jr., has been appointed New England regional director of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training. Haggerty has served with the bureau for nearly 20 years and was its state supervisor in Massachusetts. He is a former president of the Springfield, Mass., local of the Bricklayers.

Enforcement Pledged For New Pay Floors

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz pledged "effective administration" of the wage-hour law "to insure that the 41.4 million workers who have been guaranteed fair labor standards will obtain the full benefit of these standards."

Reporting to Congress on the impact of the Fair Labor Standards Act, Wirtz said the expanded coverage and higher minimums which went into effect Feb. 1 brought the law closer to its objectives "than at any time in its history."

He estimated that more than 3.7 million previously covered workers received pay raises on Feb. 1 to bring them up to the new $1.40 an hour minimum—adding up to $800 million a year in purchasing power. Increases to $1 an hour for 953,000 of the newly covered workers amount to more than $300 million over a year, Wirtz said.

Describing the Fair Labor Standards Act as "an effective weapon against poverty," Wirtz noted that the new coverage brought protection for the first time "to a larger proportion of the nonwhite work force than of the white, and to more women workers than men."

He said it was too soon to judge the impact of the new wage-hour amendments on employment, one of the functions of the annual report to Congress. But he submitted a report of a survey of the retail trade industry, taken last June, five years after the larger establishments had come under the minimum wage law and nine months after the wage floor had reached $1.25.

More Jobs

The report showed that the number of employes in the segment of the industry covered by the law increased 23 percent — from 2.4 million to 3 million—over the five-year period.

Employment of the non-covered segment went up only 9 percent.

The increase in covered employment was greatest in the South—where the application of a minimum wage required the biggest pay raises.

The proportion of retail employes who worked more than 40 hours a week dropped for both covered and non-covered workers. But in June 1966, 36 percent of the non-covered employes worked more than 40 hours as compared with 20 percent of the covered workers.

In other surveys sent to Congress along with the secretary's report, it was disclosed that:

● About one out of eight newly covered laundry workers was paid less than $1 an hour last summer, 90 percent of them in the South. Nationwide, the increase in the hourly wage bill required to bring laundry workers to the $1 minimum for newly-covered employes is about 2 percent. For the South, the figure is 6 percent. Laundry workers on a workweek over 44 hours ranged from a low of 14 percent in the West to a high of 29 percent in the South.

● Extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to hospital employes has had only a minor immediate impact, since only 4 percent earned less than $1 an hour as of last July and only 7 percent worked more than 44 hours a week. However, 14 percent of hospital workers in the South received less than $1 an hour and the cost of raising the minimum to $1 is estimated at nearly 2 percent in the South as compared with four-tenths of 1 percent nationwide.

Hearings Slated on Social Security Bill

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) has introduced the Administration's social security bill and announced that committee hearings will start Mar. 1.

The measure would boost benefits an average of 20 percent for retirees, disabled workers and the widows and children of deceased workers.

LBJ to Join Rallies For Benefit Rise

Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Humphrey will join congressional and trade union leaders in launching the AFL-CIO's campaign to rally nationwide support for the Administration's social security bill.

Heart of the measure, which is being fought by conservative business groups, is a 20 percent average benefit hike for retired workers and widows, coupled with increased insurance protection for families of younger workers.

The President will make a filmed address to each of the 15 rallies scheduled by AFL-CIO central bodies, many in cooperation with local senior citizen organizations. Thirteen of them will be held on the afternoon of Sunday, Mar. 12.

Humphrey is scheduled to take part in the Oklahoma City rally at the city's Civic Auditorium.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will address the New York rally at the National Maritime Union Hall and will speak to the other meetings by film.

Speaker lists were incomplete as the AFL-CIO News went to press, but included Senators Gaylord Nelson, Vance Hartke and Harrison A. Williams, Jr., and Representatives Jacob H. Gilbert, Charles A. Vanik, Dan Rostenkowski, Philip Burton and Lloyd Meeds. Also scheduled are former Commerce Sec. Leroy Collins, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and Sec.-Treas. Matthew De-More of the Machinists.

Special attractions are planned in several cities, including the appearance at the Los Angeles rally of screen, stage and radio stars of yesteryear.

NINETY-MINUTE BRIEFING on foreign policy, national security and economic developments was given the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey during its meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. At its conclusion AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stressed the importance of safeguarding the economy "in a more peaceful world." (Story, Page 5.)

Meany Cites Two Gaps:

Wagner Act Praised At NLRB Milestone

By Eugene A. Kelly

Passage of the Wagner Act in 1935 was a "turning-point for the nation and particularly for the labor movement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at a ceremony marking the casting of the 25 millionth ballot in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The occasion is "well worth celebrating," Meany said. But he called attention to areas where the National Labor Relations Act needs adjustment—to make the nation's agricultural workers "first class industrial citizens," and to restrain employers and industries that deliberately break the law.

The AFL-CIO and the Electronics Industries Association were co-hosts at a Capitol Hill luncheon for industry, labor and government leaders. At an earlier ceremony at the Dept. of Interior auditorium, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey presented a certificate of recognition to Leonard Paul Scheno of Carteret, N.J., financial secretary of Steelworkers Local 7098, who voted Jan. 30 in the election at which the 25 millionth vote was cast.

Scheno, a 39-year-old maintenance technician at the Reynolds Metals Co., Woodbridge, N.J., was guest of honor also at a reception held at the State Dept. NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch introduced Scheno, his wife Grace, and their three children—Geraldine, 13, and twins Nicholas and Grace, 12. The AFL-CIO and the National Association of Manufacturers were reception co-hosts.

Scheno said he accepted the NLRB certificate "humbly and with great appreciation" for himself and his fellow workers at the Reynolds plant. He added: "It is fabulous—what the labor board has done for the workingman." He joined the union—his first—in the new Reynolds plant last September and helped it win the NLRB election.

Humphrey said he spoke for Pres. Johnson in paying tribute to Drive Pledged to Win Johnson Rights Plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The AFL-CIO will do everything in its power to translate" Pres. Johnson civil rights program into law, the federation's Executive Council declared.

It termed the President's special message on civil rights "sound, sensible and achievable" and urged Congress to "swiftly adopt" the legislative package.

The council noted that the "forward momentum" of civil rights progress "has clearly slowed" both as a result of the 1966 Senate filibuster of Southern Democrats and conservative Republicans led by GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen and the dismay and confusion of "a significant number of people" because of riots and the cries of "black power."

But the problems remain, and discrimination in schools, jobs, housing and other urban problems affect the very social fabric of the nation, the council said.

The AFL-CIO remains firmly committed to the achievement of full equality in all fields and therefore endorses the President's call for action in the 90th Congress to complete the unfinished work of the last session, the statement declared.

These include equality and jus-

Goals of Workers, Nation Pressed

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The trade union movement took a long, hard look at the challenges and problems of 1967—in the world, at home and within organized labor—and came up with a carefully-wrought program designed to insure progress on all three fronts.

In a week of intensive and highly productive sessions, the AFL-CIO Executive Council plotted the course for organized labor for this year and the years beyond, with particular attention to improving the quality and standard of life for all Americans and assuring that all workers secure a fair share of the fruits of their labor.

And despite an all-time record high membership at the end of 1966, the council stressed the need for a continuing emphasis on organizing and updating the policies of the federation in the fields of political action and education and public relations.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany characterized the mid-winter sessions at the Americana Hotel here as "very, very productive . . . a fine meeting," with the discussions intensive and at a high level.

In its final sessions the council continued to receive detailed briefings from the top leaders of the Johnson Administration, holding a 90-minute meeting with Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey on foreign policy matters, with emphasis on Viet Nam, and with Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler on the general state of the economy.

Earlier it had met with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze, White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., and Federal Mediation Dir. William E. Simkin.

Pollock Elected

The council filled the vacancy in its ranks caused by the resignation of Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther by electing Textile Workers Union of America Pres. William Pollock. (Story, Page 2.) It named Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel to head up its Economic Policy Committee.

Meany told reporters at a press conference that in terms of the overriding issue of labor unity he hoped that the UAW would not leave the AFL-CIO and that he would prefer to have Reuther back on the council.

In a series of statements on domestic policies and legislation the council took the following action:

- Reaffirmed its deep commitment to the war on poverty, sharply repudiated attacks designed to cripple or destroy the program and rejected the "mythology" that the nation cannot afford it. (Story, Page 4.)
- Pledged to do everything in its power to translate Pres. Johnson's civil rights program into law, terming his proposals "sound, sensible and achievable." (Story this page; text, Page 6.)
- Called for "immediate and extensive attention" to problems of the American consumer and urged legislation and investigation in six major areas. (Story, Page 4.)
- Urged amendment of the present draft law to remove inequities and discrimination and proposed an 8-point program of revisions. (Story, Page 5; text, Page 6.)
- Recommended postponing a decision on the need for a tax increase until current uncertainties in the economy are resolved in the next few months. (Story, Page 4.)

'Justice and Good Sense' Seen in Higher Wages

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Extraordinary profits and rising productivity make possible wage increases to improve worker buying power without raising the general level of prices, the AFL-CIO declared.

American workers are justified in seeking wage increases to offset past price hikes that have washed out part of the buying power of their earnings, as well as to improve their standard of living, the federation's Executive Council said.

Many companies are in a position not only to grant such wage increases but also to cut the prices of their products, the council added. It stressed that the AFL-CIO will support its affiliated unions "in seeking economic justice for their members."

The council's statement on wage negotiations declared that not only are workers entitled to "a more equitable share of the fruits of economic progress," but that an increase in real earnings is needed "for the adequate expansion of consumer markets, the base of the American economy."

The council noted that the AFL-CIO has opposed the Council of Economic Advisers' wage guideline "from the very beginning." It added: "And we likewise oppose the Council of Economic Advisers' new strictures against cost-of-living escalators and other collective bargaining measures to offset the impact of an increased price level on workers' earnings."

ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) met during the Executive Council's session in Bal Harbour, Fla., and heard a report from COPE Dir. Al Barkan (at Pres. George Meany's right).

Stepped-Up Drive Urged to Stem Increasing Air, Water Pollution

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The nation's anti-pollution program "must be speeded up," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement warning that contamination of air and water "constitutes a growing threat to the health and well-being of the American people."

Massive, multi-billion-dollar expenditures by federal, state and local governments and by private industry are needed over the next decade, the council stressed. It warned that the measures taken thus far have been "offset by the increasing volume of waste that is spewed into the water and air."

The council said it is "most urgent" that Congress appropriate the full $450 million authorized by the federal Water Pollution Control Act for grants-in-aid to help localities finance waste treatment plants.

It urged that the pollution control law be strengthened to give the government more effective enforcement powers and to create federal river basin commissions with responsibility over water pollution.

The statement reiterated labor's opposition to "any special federal tax benefits to industry for the costs of controlling water and air pollution from its own operations," noting that "such costs are already covered by federal tax treatment of business investment and depreciation."

At the same time, the council rejected the levying of effluent charges on industrial wastes as the "essential answer" to the problem of pollution control.

It called on AFL-CIO state and local bodies "to urge their state water control boards to establish and enforce adequate water quality standards that will assure a clean water supply."

On air pollution, the council urged amendment of the Clean Air Act to give the government power to set standards over "all sources of industrial pollutants released into the atmosphere" and to establish federal airshed commissions.

One Remedy

The statement noted that "expanded use of electric-powered vehicles would sharply reduce the largest and most rapidly growing source of air pollution." It added:

"Any federal program to develop an economically feasible electric-powered vehicle should provide public domain ownership of all federal patents and a searching assessment by a national commission, with labor representation, of the social and economic impact of a large-scale changeover to the electric automobile."

The council expressed "general agreement" with the goals set by Pres. Johnson in his recent message on air pollution and said his legislative proposals deserve "serious consideration."

'Courageous Struggle' Hailed:

Solid Backing Given Farm Union's Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO pledged its "utmost backing" to the task of building a strong farm worker union—"the crucial element in bringing first class citizenship to farm workers."

It expressed its determination also to back up the union drive with efforts to provide through legislation the rights and benefits enjoyed by other workers under federal and state laws.

The Executive Council adopted a pair of statements emphasizing these approaches and singling out the "courageous struggle" of farm workers to create their own union. They are proving, the council said, "as others proved before them—that workers want and need to organize in order to win a fair share of the fruits of an abundant land they helped to create."

The AFL-CIO, the council said, "has had a constant and active program of organization among farm workers," and the newest phase, the creation of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, is but another step down the road to building a strong union.

Reviewing the history of farm worker struggles in the past two years, the council noted that the emphasis has been on training and development of farm workers to provide the leadership for the union, for the AFL-CIO believes that the most effective union "will be that which is built by farm workers."

The statement stressed that the absence of legal procedure and protection makes the road the farm worker must travel in building his union "one of strike, boycott and harassment." They have proven, the council added, that the difficulties in California and Texas will not dissuade them from building a great union that will take its place "in the family of organized labor."

On the legislative front, while significant gains were made last year, the farm workers are still "the most exploited group in the American labor force," the council said.

It cited the gain of including 30 percent of farm workers under the protection of the wage-hour law and declared that this protection must be extended to all farm workers.

Their exclusion from the protections of the National Labor Relations Act must be ended, they must be included under all unemployment compensation laws and workmen's compensation statutes, and all foreign labor import programs must be finally terminated.

"The substandard status suffered by the three million Americans who work for wages in agriculture can no longer be tolerated," the council declared.

Pollock Elected to Seat On Executive Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America was elected a vice president of the AFL-CIO and a member of the Executive Council at the council's midwinter meeting here.

He was chosen to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers.

Pollock, born in Philadelphia in 1899, was the eighth of nine children, all of whom became active in union affairs. He left that city's Northeast High School in 1914 to work as an office boy and later became a shipfitter.

When Philadelphia area shipyards closed down during the depression of the 1920s, Pollock got a job in a textile mill as a weaver and immediately joined United Textile Workers Local 25. He became active in the local's affairs, was elected business agent in 1931 and in 1937 joined the staff of the then new Textile Workers Organizing Committee.

He helped set up the TWOC Philadelphia Joint Board and became its first manager. He held the post until 1939, when the TWOC became an international union and he was elected secretary-treasurer at the first constitutional convention, in Philadelphia.

When the late Mariano S. Bishop died in 1953 the TWUA executive board elected Pollock to succeed him as executive vice president. He was elected international president in 1956, succeeding Emil Rieve, and has been re-elected biennially since then.

Pollock was Pennsylvania labor representative for the National Recovery Administration, a member of the former Philadelphia City Labor Board, and served on the Federal Textile Commission during World War II.

He has been a member of the AFL-CIO General Board since the merger in 1955; is a member of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. executive board and the executive committee of the Intl. Textile & Garment Workers Federation, and is treasurer of the recently organized Inter-American Federation of Textile & Garment Workers.

Disputes Plan Success Laid To Mediation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council received a report on the 5-year history of the internal disputes plan which showed the continuous effectiveness of mediation.

From the plan's beginnings as Article XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution in January 1962 through Feb. 15, 1967, a total of 610 complaints or claims were filed of which more than 60 percent were settled through the mediation process.

There were 210 determinations by the impartial umpire, and violations of the plan were found in 147 cases. The council subcommittee set up under the plan to handle appeals received 70 and denied 58.

Of the 38 complaints of non-compliance received by the subcommittee, compliance was achieved in 21 cases and non-compliance found in nine. Six complaints were withdrawn and two are pending. There are presently six federation affiliates under sanctions provided by the disputes plan.

Expanded Funds Sought To Fill School-Aid Gaps

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A large scale expansion of federal aid to education was urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to meet the nation's "pressing needs" for more and better schools, schooling and teachers.

The council praised the legislative breakthroughs of recent years, enacted with labor and Administration support, which established "a significant federal commitment to share in the financial responsibility for education at all levels."

The council proposed a 10-point program calling for both expansion of existing federal aid and "the beginning of new programs which must go far beyond those already enacted."

It asked:

- "At the very minimum," full appropriations authorized under existing law for all educational programs.
- Expansion of existing school aid laws to "substantially increase the authorized federal expenditures" and provide money to help raise the level of teachers' salaries, improve teacher training, and continue the National Teacher Corps.
- New federal funds for school construction "to replace obsolete classrooms, to relieve overcrowding, and to meet future growth in enrollment."

The council suggested this could be done either through new legislation or through broadening the scope of present legislation, which provides funds for school construction in districts with large numbers of federal civilian employes or servicemen.

- A step-up in federal vocational education assistance. The council welcomed Pres. Johnson's proposal to fund new and innovative vocational programs for high school students with special needs.
- Improvement of the "G.I. bill" for present-day veterans to include apprenticeship, on-the-job and on-the-farm training benefits.

The council said the AFL-CIO is "disappointed" that Pres. Johnson's recent proposals failed to cover these fields, but it endorsed Administration proposals for increased allowances for veterans attending school and for permitting veterans to finish high school without using up college benefits.

- Special legislation to improve education in both the inner cities and rapidly-growing suburban areas.
- A new federal program "to encourage the development of tuition-free community colleges."
- Further development of "the full potential of educational television."
- More federal support to expand opportunities for adult education.
- Federal aid to university labor extension programs.

Recent Gains

Legislation of recent years, and particularly the 1965 Elementary & Secondary Education Act, "significantly" improved educational opportunity, the council noted, "after nearly a century of stalemate" over the issue of federal aid to schools.

The statement cited the AFL-CIO's "key part" in developing a formula that allowed "maximum benefits" to children in non-federal schools "without doing violence to the traditional separation between church and state."

It noted the "important part" the trade union movement has played at the local, state and national levels in upgrading vocational education and stimulating the growth of two-year community colleges.

Despite this progress, the council said, there remain "important unfulfilled needs" which can be met only by new federal educational programs.

Wage Hikes Called Vital, Justified

Reviewing the record of 1966 on wages and fringe benefits, the council noted that much of the gains was "washed out" by a 2.9 percent rise in living costs. The buying power of the average factory worker's weekly take-home pay was "actually slightly less" in 1966 than in 1965.

In contrast, business profits skyrocketed and dividend payments rose sharply, the council stressed.

It pointed out that the price level has been rising in recent years "regardless of what happened to labor costs per unit of production." In the years 1960-65 unit labor costs dropped but the wholesale price level of manufactured goods increased. In 1966 unit labor costs rose 1.7 percent as a result of increased employer contributions to social security and the attempt by workers to catch up with rising living costs, but wholesale prices of manufactured goods jumped 2.8 percent.

Citing the role of collective bargaining as the "major mechanism" for achieving needed increases in real earnings, the Council said that "both justice and economic good sense support trade union efforts to raise the buying power of workers' wages." They are "justified in seeking wage increases to offset past price increases that have washed out part of the buying power of their earnings and they are justified in seeking to improve their standard of life."

U.S. Education Office Observes Centennial

The U.S. Office of Education, established as a "department" under a bill signed by Pres. Andrew Johnson on Mar. 2, 1867, observed its centennial with a brief ceremony on the plaza in front of its headquarters in Washington.

Consular Treaty With USSR Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO voiced its support for the consular treaty between the U.S. and the Soviet Union as serving a "useful purpose" and providing additional protection to U.S. citizens and diplomatic representatives abroad.

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement noting the gains to be had from the enlargement of U.S. consular relations with the Soviet Union, adding that the "small increase of Soviet representatives within the U.S. "can be accepted accompanied by adequate security measures."

The treaty signed by the U.S. and the USSR is currently before the Senate where a two-thirds vote is necessary for ratification.

Adequate Funds Urged To Attack Urban Needs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Current legislation sets up "minimum practical goals" for a "significant start" toward solving the problems of the nation's cities, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in a statement calling on Congress to appropriate adequate funds.

The council listed:

● The model cities program, authorizing the spending of $412 million in fiscal 1968 to begin a "comprehensive, coordinated approach to the problems of the people who live in our central cities."

● The rent supplements program, requiring a $40 million 1968 appropriation for an "imaginative, new approach to rental housing for low-income families."

In addition, the Executive Council said, full amounts authorized for annual contributions under public housing "must be granted lest programs such as urban renewal be set back for lack of homes" into which displaced persons can move.

● Full use of authorized and funded programs such as the 3 percent loans for cooperative, nonprofit and limited dividend organizations.

"Central of all housing efforts," the council said, "is the ready availability of financing. The decline in interest rates from last year's all-time high is a welcome sign, indeed.

'Significant Step'

"The Administration's action to make more funds available for mortgage financing has been a significant step. Even greater efforts must be made, however, if interest rates are to be rolled back to the point where there is an adequate flow of money into housing construction."

The country's domestic issues focus increasingly on cities, the council observed, because of their rapid rate of growth. The probability is that by 1985 double the present 135 million urban dwellers will be living in cities—on 10 percent of the nation's land area.

"Sheer population pressure has strained available facilities beyond earlier planned needs," the Executive Council noted.

"The random sprawl of metropolitan areas has produced water shortages, air and water pollution, inadequate mass transit, overcrowded schools, inadequate housing with cancerous slum ghettos, hard-pressed health facilities and acute shortages of recreational areas and cultural facilities."

It is to "these immense, complex urban needs," the council pointed out, that the comprehensive Model Cities bill of 1966 was directed, with its "multi-phased" series of programs that included special assistance for metropolitan area program planning.

Central to all the programs, the statement emphasized, is the "fundamental human right to a decent home." It continued:

"To meet the needs of a growing population and to eliminate existing substandard housing requires construction of 2.5 million residential units a year. Last year the rate of non-farm housing starts fell to 826,000 in October.

"Even today's rate of 1.07 million is less than half the need."

Eulogy Lauds Buckmaster's Labor Service

Bal Harbour, Fla.—L. S. Buckmaster's dedication to the welfare of workers and to the preservation of freedom and democracy "will stand as a living monument to his memory," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council adopted a resolution noting the recent death of the former president of the Rubber Workers and vice president emeritus of the AFL-CIO. It cited him as among those "who helped achieve unity in the American labor movement." The council said "we are saddened by his loss and we shall not forget him" or the service he rendered to the cause of workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced that the council had voted $5,000 to the University of Akron Scholarship Fund in his memory. Buckmaster had served on the university's board of trustees.

Petrochemical Unit Formed in Canada

Toronto, Ont.—Six international unions with some 75,000 members in Canada's petrochemical industry have agreed to establish a council which will seek to develop a joint approach to bargaining and organizing problems.

The council was set up after a year of talks led by Exec. Vice Pres. William Dodge of the Canadian Labor Congress. Affiliates are the Textile Workers Union of America, United Textile Workers, Glass & Ceramic Workers, Chemical Workers, Oil Workers and Rubber Workers.

Council Backs Federal Pay Comparability

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal employes should attain immediate and complete pay comparability with workers in private industry as well as improved fringe benefits, the AFL-CIO declared.

In a statement adopted by the Executive Council, the deficiencies in the government's union-management relations program were spelled out and a 5-point program to correct inequities was urged.

There has been a failure of postal and other federal workers to achieve salary comparability despite the gains under the executive order applying collective bargaining principles and pay legislation voted by Congress, the council said.

To correct the situation, it called for:

- Salary adjustments for postal and classified employes to attain immediate and complete pay comparability, including needed changes in the salary systems covering these employes.
- Revision of the labor relations program to insure genuine collective bargaining.
- Revision of the Hatch Act to permit employes to exercise greater political responsibility.
- Improvements in benefits and government contributions to the life and health insurance systems and liberalization of the Civil Service Retirement Act for government employes and dependents.
- Retirement credit or payment for sick leave unused at the time of an employe's retirement or death.

LABEL CLIP signifying participation in the new Savings Bond campaign was presented to all members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Sec. of the Treasury Henry H. Fowler during the Bal Harbour, Fla., meeting. Here AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph accepts his symbol.

New Support Pledged Payroll Bond Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The "unqualified support" of organized labor was given the Treasury Dept.'s intensified drive to step up purchases of savings bonds by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its mid-winter meeting here.

"We call upon all union members to help make this campaign a success," the council added, stressing the payroll deduction plan.

The bonds as investments offer absolute security with adequate interest, it pointed out, and can be cashed at any time though "by their nature they encourage longer-term saving against major outlays anticipated in the future—buying a home, for example, or sending a child through college."

"Thus the bonds not only draw interest themselves, but can save the payment of interest on loans that would otherwise be necessary," the statement said.

"But more important than all these considerations is that of simple patriotism. The U.S. is engaged in a painful war in defense of freedom—the freedom of a nation to seek its own destiny, secure against aggression. Each day, Americans give their lives to that cause. By supporting the bond drive with dollars, we at home can demonstrate in at least a small way our willingness to do our part."

The council directed the AFL-CIO headquarters staff to help the Treasury Dept. prepare materials for use by the labor press; to arrange for continuing liaison between field staff members and area offices of the department's Savings Bond Division, and to help train volunteer savings bond representatives.

"We also request each affiliated union to carry forward an active bond promotion program," the Executive Council said, "stimulating participation by local union officers, activating shop stewards and otherwise encouraging the growth of payroll savings plans."

At a press conference AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said Sec. of the Treasury Henry H. Fowler described the new campaign for the Executive Council and gave details of the "Freedom Share U.S. Savings Note" to be sold only to those buying Series E bonds on payroll deduction or bond-a-month plans.

Need for Tax Hike Held Clouded by 'Soft Spots'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The economy's performance in the next several months will indicate whether or not a tax increase is needed and the AFL-CIO will review the issue as the trend becomes clearer, the Executive Council declared.

Whether or not the President's proposed 6 percent surtax on individual and corporate income to take effect July 1, 1967, "will have a beneficial impact on the economy . . . will be clearer in May or June than it is at present," the council said.

The council noted that the President's proposal exempted lower income families from the tax giving recognition to the principle of taxation geared to the ability to pay. But if such a tax increase is imposed later in the year, the council added, "a greater increase should be levied on the extraordinarily high profits of business, than on individual incomes."

The American economy, the council said, is currently undergoing a series of adjustments with "soft and weakening spots" being offset by strengths in other areas. The soft spots are the tight money that threw the building industry into a severe recession in 1966, the failure of workers' buying power to rise last year, the increase in idle productive capacity stemming from large-scale installations of new plants and equipment and the build-up of excessive inventories in many businesses.

On the plus side, the council found the sharp rise of federal government expenditures and the continued increase in state and local government spending.

Administration actions have halted the sharp drop in home building, the council pointed out, and the increase in the minimum wage has bolstered purchasing power. Bargaining gains in 1967 should add further strength to consumer markets, it said.

The nation could easily afford a substantial expansion of domestic programs within the present tax structure were it not for the war in Viet Nam, the council said, in explaining the President's proposal for a tax increase. It stressed that the cost of the war "should not be absorbed by freezing or cutting expenditures for such essential domestic programs as housing and the rebuilding of our cities, aid to education, the war on poverty, the achievement of clean air and water."

The council urged the government to continue programs to reduce joblessness, "to move on to the achievement of job opportunities for all Americans who are able to work and seek employment." It noted that unemployment was at 3.8 percent of the labor force in 1966.

The council commended the President for taking steps to plan coordinated economic policies "for the eventual leveling off or decline in military spending. America must be prepared with detailed plans to substantially step up government investments for public facilities and services as soon as the objective of an honorable settlement of the Viet Nam conflict becomes a reality."

Vote Won by UAW At Mobile Home Plant

Shreveport, La.—A National Labor Relations Board election at the plant of Ritzcraft-Southern, Inc., mobile home manufacturers near here, was won by the Auto Workers, 36-16. Organizers for the UAW and the AFL-CIO cooperated with a plant committee in the drive, Regional Dir. E. H. Williams said.

High Praise Voiced For Mrs. Peterson

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Esther Peterson, the consumer's voice in the Johnson Administration, "has done a terrific job," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared at a press conference here.

Questioned on his views on Mrs. Peterson, assistant secretary of labor and presidential adviser on consumer affairs, Meany noted the criticism she had been subjected to from industry, pointing out that it was a real measure of her effectiveness.

"I don't think there is anyone in government who knows more about (consumer affairs) than Esther does," he said.

President's Message Hailed:

Top Attention Urged To Aiding Shoppers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The problems of the American consumer demand "immediate and extensive attention" from the 90th Congress, the AFL-CIO declared as it called for legislation and investigation in six major areas.

Noting that the 13.5 million-member federation is "probably the largest organized group of consumers in the nation," the Executive Council hailed Pres. Johnson's "far reaching message" on consumer affairs and declared that this Congress can and should "become the consumer-conscience Congress."

Consumers need and should have adequate protection against fraudulent practices, assurance that the products are safe to use and that product and price information is adequate and accurate, the council said.

In light of these standards, it added, congressional action and concern is needed in the following areas:

1. Action to remedy the exploitation of consumers by those who provide consumer credit. This includes enactment of the long-standing "truth-in-lending" bill to require the true annual interest rate and the dollar cost to be stated to the borrower; an end to misleading price advertising on credit sales; "breathing spell" legislation to protect consumers from high-pressure door-to-door salesmen; a comprehensive study by Congress of consumer credit laws and practices.

2. A general investigation by Congress of the insurance industry in all its aspects. The council noted mounting evidence of excessive charges for credit life insurance, fraud in the sale of mail order insurance, and automobile insurance that is "over-priced, often capriciously cancelled, and of consumer losses from liquidations of 'high risk' insurers." The entire industry, the council said, should be brought under federal regulation.

3. Action on over-pricing of key consumer products. An investigation of the pricing of prescription drugs is needed to curb excessive costs to the public as well as attention to the over-charging and over-prescribing by physicians with a direct financial stake in the products they prescribe. A thorough review is needed also, the council declared, of food prices, with special emphasis on the effect of "excesses in advertising games, trading stamps and other promotional gimmicks."

4. Legislation to provide consumers with unbiased product information. to aid in the wise purchase of consumer products and to end misleading, false or fraudulent information about products, including the sale of land. The authority and the appropriations of the Federal Trade Commission should be strenthened and increased and a compulsory consumer grading system for basic food products should be set up under the Dept. of Agriculture. Increased government efforts to make consumer information available are a necessity.

5. Swift action to insure the safety of consumer products and to prevent accidental death and injury to those who buy them. A tightening of the Food-Drug Cosmetic Act is needed along with inspection of all meat and poultry, whether or not it crosses state lines, and updating of the law covering flammable fabrics. The council called for creation of a National Commission on Product Safety to study the need for standards in the design of household equipment and appliances.

6. Establishment of government machinery to give consumer problems major attention including the formation of consumer subcommittees in Congress and the creation of either a Dept. of Consumer Affairs or an Office of Consumer Affairs.

Anti-Poverty Program Wins Renewed Support

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strongly reaffirming its deep commitment to the war on poverty, the AFL-CIO sharply repudiated attacks designed to cripple or destroy the campaign and rejected the "mythology" that the nation cannot afford it.

The Executive Council also voiced its opposition to the proposal of a federal charter for a profit-making, war-on-poverty company, declaring "we view with skepticism and misgiving other proposals for profit-making business ventures in the Office of Economic Opportunity and related programs."

The statement expressed its conviction "that no segment of our society should seek to profit from the special services it renders to the war of poverty program."

Urging the Administration and Congress to continue the anti-poverty programs, the council called also on all AFL-CIO affiliates and state and city central bodies to expand their activities in community programs.

It called in addition for the staff of the AFL-CIO to review various proposals for income guarantees and report back with its findings, noting that the President has proposed to establish a commission to examine this type of proposal.

The AFL-CIO, the council said, "is fully aware of the problems that have arisen" as the OEO programs have developed, but added that "it is our firm conviction . . . that such problems . . . are not due to inherent deficiencies in the program itself."

The statement reviewed the strong AFL-CIO support for anti-poverty programs, including the broad range of social welfare legislation and civil rights which are directly involved in the war on poverty. It noted the involvement of hundreds of AFL-CIO members on community action boards and committees and the active sponsorship by AFL-CIO unions of anti-poverty programs—and called for more.

The council reaffirmed its belief that anti-poverty programs must be based on job opportunities for the millions of impoverished, with adequate social security benefits for the aged, and adquate income maintenance through a much-improved and overall system of public assistance for those who are not self-sustaining due to the absence of the family breadwinner, disability or other causes.

Warning against a retreat in the war on poverty through a failure to appropriate adequate funds, the council urged the 90th Congress to provide the monies that will permit the continuation and expansion of programs designed to eliminate urban and rural poverty.

8-Point Plan Proposed:

Steps Asked to End Draft Act Injustice

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The present draft law is inequitable and should be amended by the 90th Congress," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council proposed an 8-point program that would "go a long way toward answering present selective service criticisms without requiring either a major policy change during a war period or a substantial increase in federal expenditures." (Text, Page 6.)

The council's proposals would:

- Reverse the present procedure by giving priority to the drafting of younger men—starting at 18 years and six months.
- Give selective service examinations as soon as possible following the 18th birthday.
- Expand the present policy aimed at making disadvantaged youth eligible for military service.
- Give top priority draft status to men between the ages of 18 years and six months and 21 years.
- Provide for annual projections of military manpower needs with state and local draft boards making similar projections.
- Provide more clear-cut guidelines for local draft boards and make them more truly representative of their communities.
- Eliminate educational deferments as such.
- Allow deferments only to cover critical manpower needs and acute family hardships.

The council declared that educational deferments under present draft policy "clearly discriminate against sons of low income families." Even for those fortunate enough to secure deferments, existing policy makes it impossible for the individual to plan intelligently for the future, the statement observed.

Another major fault, the council said, was draft priority for older men causing an interruption in career planning and the breaking up of young families.

Looking at the various proposals now being suggested, the council found them all wanting. Elimination of the draft and substitution of a volunteer army would mean costly new enlistment incentives and would pose the problem of a professional military force which "has serious social implications," the council said.

Universal military training, it pointed out, runs contrary to military needs, and the national service concept raises serious practical problems as well as a tremendous cost factor. There is a real question whether 1.4 million "national service" jobs can be created annually, it said.

The council said it "is convinced that the present draft law can—and should—be revised by the 90th Congress." Under its 8-point program, it added, every 18-year-old would know whether he is eligible to serve and could plan accordingly, including the possibility of enlisting immediately and securing the benefits of the Cold War GI Bill of Rights.

"These proposals," the council said, "would satisfy military manpower needs and provide maximum input at the age level considered best by the Defense Dept. They would eliminate the economic discrimination now built into the present law. They would permit a higher degree of individual planning."

Congress Urged to Vote Foreign Aid Extension

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Prompt and overwhelming" support by Congress of the President's proposal for $3.1 billion in new funds for 1968 foreign aid was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council sharply rejected the "notion that the foreign aid program is a wasteful give-away or policy of futile philanthropy. . . . Our country has a better chance of attaining broadly-based stable prosperity in a peaceful world not weighed down by impoverishment, ignorance, illness and dictatorship."

Reviewing the history of foreign aid since the inception of the Marshall Plan, the council statement noted the shift so that today some of the nations the U.S. once aided are now in turn aiding newly developing countries.

In 1965, the council pointed out, foreign aid constituted only three-tenths of 1 percent of the U.S. Gross National Product and 2 percent of the federal budget. The AFL-CIO believes, it said, that annual foreign aid authorization should equal at least 1 percent of the GNP.

"It is in our own national interest, "the statement added," to do everything to reduce the gap between the richer and the poor nations by aiding the latter's industrial development and enhancing their prosperity."

The council specifically backed the President's proposal for foreign aid authorization covering a two-year period and his emphasis on the responsibility of developing countries in aiding their own development. It noted that the AFL-CIO has always insisted that foreign aid be directed and administered "in such a way as to help the growth of democratic institutions, like free trade unions and cooperatives." It continued:

Labor's Role Cited

"We are proud of the role the AFL-CIO and organizations like the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the African-American Labor Center have played in this work and we intend that it shall be continued and expanded."

It would be wrong, the council concluded, "to approach foreign aid in a narrow business sense. Our humanitarian traditions, democratic heritage and our deep concern for the kind of world in which our children will live do not permit the American people to revert to any policy like scuttling foreign aid, which would—in effect—be isolationist. We help others not because we seek their gratitude. We help others because our highest ideals and most vital interests require a world free from tyranny, poverty and war."

Site Picketing Bill Overdue, Council Says

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO pledged its "full and complete support" to the campaign for passage of a common site picketing bill by the 90th Congress.

The federation's Executive Council declared that after 16 years of long and exhaustive consideration of the issue it's time for action to restore to the building trades unions the same rights enjoyed by other unions in a labor dispute.

It recalled that in the 89th Congress a situs picketing bill was reported favorably by the House Labor Committee and reported out for House action by the Rules Committee, but that on the eve of the vote the bill was withdrawn from the agenda "by the then chairman of the House Labor Committee," in a "wholly undemocratic action which has never happened before in the history of the U.S. Congress."

This failure can be overcome by prompt action by the House Labor Committee and the House and expeditious handling in the Senate, the council declared.

Job Impact Cited In Highway Cutback

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The recent cutback in the federal highway building program could cause "serious economic trouble," the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

Unemployment among building and construction workers is high and a further increase would mean "real hardship for these men and their families," the council said.

It urged the Administration to take "another sounding" on the highway program and "if it finds growing unemployment" to restore the cutback in highway building so as to avoid "further deterioration of employment opportunities."

The Administration later announced that $975 million in frozen highway construction funds will be released, possibly within a few weeks, and that the entire authorized amount will be restored by July. The assurance was given by Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze at a joint session of the House and Senate Public Works committees.

Vice President Reports On 'Planning' for Peace

Bal Harbour, Fla.,—The Johnson Administration is "looking forward to and planning for the day" that peace comes to Viet Nam, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting here.

Humphrey devoted an hour and a half to briefing the council on foreign policy and national security problems, as well as military, diplomatic and economic developments.

Later he told reporters that the Administration is planning for the day of peace.

"After peace in Korea apathy set in and social problems went unmet," Humphrey told reporters later. "We are calling upon the AFL-CIO to get behind efforts to think ahead to the next decade and to consider what will be done with these fabulous resources which we have."

He said that the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research is already devoting time to considering five to ten years ahead.

A high level presidential task force is assigned the job for the Administration. The Budget Bureau and the Office of Economic Planning are concentrating efforts to determine just how much money will be needed to run the government in the post- Viet Nam period, the Vice President said.

The Administration, he reported, "is looking into fiscal policy, tax adjustment, public works, what we will be doing with people in education, job training and the war on poverty."

Humphrey noted that he has been meeting with various labor groups in recent years to keep them abreast of national and international developments.

"There is no doubt in my mind," he declared, "that the activities of American unions in building a free labor movement in South Viet Nam, Asia, South America and other areas is of great significance."

Asked about allegations that some unions were receiving money from the Central Intelligence Agency, Humphrey declined to comment because he did not have the information.

"I want to say, though," he continued, "that our labor movement is mighty generous with its own resources in the international field in building democratic trade unions."

He stressed the work done in housing, medical care and in cooperatives.

"Much of what the trade union movement is doing is with AID (Agency for International Development) funds," the Vice President added.

AID contracts are openly negotiated and are accounted in full in the budget report of the President.

Redstone Arsenal Unit Picks AFGE

Huntsville, Ala. — The Government Employes won exclusive bargaining rights for 6,875 employes of the Army Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal by a majority of better than 4-1.

It brings to 12,000 the number of Redstone employes represented by AFGE Lodge 1858.

The vote at the missile command was 3,993 for AFGE to 879 for no union.

Drive Pledged To Enact Rights Bill

tice in the courts, greater protection for those exercising their civil rights and "a solution to our housing problems that will enable every American regardless of color to have a decent home of his choice."

The federation, said the council, is committed to its own campaign against discrimination in unions, in employment, and in the community and will continue to work for these objectives until "discrimination is only an ugly footnote in history."

But the establishment of equal opportunity under law requires social and economic conditions to make such rights a reality. This includes the need for a full employment economy, education and training for better-paid jobs, funds for quality education in schools North and South, elimination of slums and discrimination in sale and rental of housing, and rebuilding the cities to make them decent and healthy places to live.

"No one can honestly pretend that the road to fulfillment of civil rights and equality of opportunity is an easy one," the council concluded, "but it is a road that America must follow to the end. It is the road that the AFL-CIO intends to follow to the end."

The Road To Follow

SWEEPING CHANGES have taken place on the American scene in the area of civil rights over the past few years but the forward momentum has clearly slowed.

Congress enacted civil rights laws in 1964 and 1965. In 1966, after a substantial House majority had passed a bill which extended civil rights coverage in several needed areas, the Senate was blocked from voting by a filibuster planned and executed by a coalition of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans. This same coalition led by Sen. Dirksen earlier defeated an attempt to repeal Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act by the same tactics.

Moreover, a significant number of people dismayed and confused by riots and cries of "Black Power" have temporarily abandoned their demands for further progress.

Yet the problems of civil rights remain and continue to affect basic components of our social fabric—schools, jobs, housing and other urban problems.

In his special message on civil rights to the Congress, Pres. Johnson has gone to the heart of the matter. He has proposed sound, sensible and achievable measures, and we trust the Congress will swiftly adopt the President's legislative package. We in the AFL-CIO will do everything in our power to help translate these proposals into law.

We shall watch carefully that existing laws be enforced with both determination and intelligence and that adequate funds and competent staff be made available to those government agencies entrusted with carrying out the objectives of the law.

Furthermore, we of the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions have committed ourselves to our own campaign against discrimination. Before the law became effective, we stepped up our campaign to eliminate discrimination in unions, in employment and in the community. Our state federations and central bodies have been directed to work with other organizations to obtain compliance in the communities where their members live. The AFL-CIO shall continue to work for these objectives until discrimination is only an ugly footnote in history.

But this is only part of the job. It has become increasingly clear that for the achievement of equal opportunity under the law the establishment and enforcement of rights is not enough. Social and economic conditions which foster the fulfillment of these rights are a prime necessity.

The AFL-CIO is dedicated to the achievement of these social and economic conditions.

Equal opportunity in employment requires full employment and the education and training needed for higher skilled and better-paid jobs, in addition to the elimination of discrimination.

Equality of opportunity in education requires that enough funds are provided to raise the quality of our schools North and South to meet present-day needs as well as that these schools be integrated.

Equality of opportunity in housing requires that we eliminate slums and build the homes that are needed for all of America's population, in addition to eliminating discrimination in the sale and rental of housing.

Indeed we must make our cities a healthy and decent place to live and repledge ourselves to the elimination of poverty.

The challenges before us are great. No one can honestly pretend that the road to the fulfillment of civil rights and equality of opportunity is an easy one, but it is a road that America must follow to the end. It is the road that the AFL-CIO intends to follow to the end.

Executive Council Statement On Selective Service Policy

Excerpts from the statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the Universal Military Training & Service Act, Feb. 27, 1967, Bal Harbour, Fla.

ORGANIZED LABOR is deeply concerned with the future of the Universal Military Training Service Act, due to expire July 1, 1967. Along with many other Americans, we are convinced that the present law is inequitable and should be amended by the 90th Congress.

Educational deferments, under the present draft policy, clearly discriminate against sons of low-income families. These deferments are of no value to those who cannot afford higher education or who must drop out of high school to help support their family. Discrimination also occurs—in reverse—against youths in the low-income groups, who seek military service as a step upward, but are excluded by present admission standards.

We have considered the various major proposals now being suggested as alternatives to the present law and would like to comment, briefly, on each of them.

Elimination of the draft and the substitution of a volunteer army would require the establishment of costly new enlistment incentives. Estimates of this cost have ranged from $4.5 billion to $20 billion annually. The formation of a professional military force also has serious social implications.

Universal military training would eliminate discrimination, but runs contrary to military needs. It has been estimated that even if UMT was limited to a six-month training period, it would add $2.5 billion to the budget.

The national service concept raises serious problems from a practical viewpoint. If the idea is to be explored, it requires detailed further study, not immediate enactment. In addition to the tremendous cost increase required by all of the present national service proposals, an artificially low pay rate will result in the emergence of a large manpower pool unfairly competing with the remainder of the labor force.

With the military taking 700,000 youths annually and an estimated 2.1 million boys reaching age 18 by 1974, there is a real question of whether 1.4 million "national service" jobs can be created annually. Further complicating the problem is the educational background and training required to perform useful functions for such organizations as the Peace Corps, Teacher Corps and VISTA.

For the above-mentioned reasons, the AFL-CIO Executive Council does not support any of these alternatives to the draft. The AFL-CIO Executive Council is convinced that the present draft law can—and should—be revised by the 90th Congress. Our proposals for such revision are designed to eliminate many of the law's inequities. We propose:

(1) Reversal of present procedure with priority given to the drafting of younger men—starting at age 18 years and six months.

(2) Selective service exams to be given as soon as possible following the 18th birthday.

(3) Expansion of the Defense Dept.'s present policy aimed at making disadvantaged youth eligible for military service. In addition to required training, this program should include the correction of minor physical defects that—unless remedied—prohibit entrance into the military.

(4) Top priority draft status to cover individuals from the age of 18 years and six months through the 21st birthday.

(5) Defense Dept. to make annual projections of military manpower needs—with state and local draft boards to make follow-up projections.

(6) National Selective Service to provide more specific and clear-cut guide lines for the local draft boards and these local boards to be composed of members more truly representative of their home community.

(7) Elimination of educational deferments as such.

(8) Deferments allowable only to cover critical national manpower needs and acute family hardships.

UNDER THESE PROPOSALS, every 18-year-old would know, following his examinations, whether he is eligible to serve. By consulting with his local draft board—based upon its manpower projection—he could estimate his chance of being called. He would have six months to plan accordingly. He might choose to enlist immediately, to avoid interrupting his future career and to secure the benefits of the Cold War GI Bill. He might choose to "gamble."

If not called during 2.5 years at the top of the manpower priority list, he would be placed at the bottom of the manpower pool—thus gaining more assurance that he will not be drafted unless there is a national emergency.

These proposals would satisfy military manpower needs and provide maximum input at the age level considered best by the Defense Dept. They would eliminate the economic discrimination now built into the present law. They would permit a higher degree of individual planning.

Morgan Says:

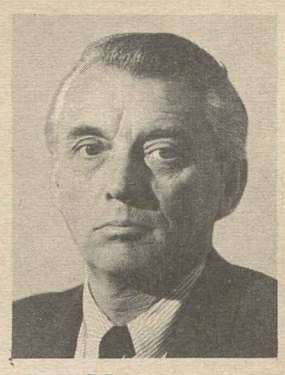
'Rare and Vital' Statesman Lost In Death of Bonn's Fritz Erler

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

PROBABLY not one American in half a million will remember the name of Fritz Erler though he visited the United States many times after World War II and two years ago published a valuable little book, "Democracy in Germany," based on a series of lectures he gave at Harvard.

He died on Washington's Birthday at the age of 53 at his home near the Black Forest. He had been seriously ill with leukemia for more than a year. If he had been in sound health he would have been one of the top ministers of the new coalition government in Bonn. He was the deputy chairman of West Germany's Social Democratic party. There was a special session of Parliament to honor him and he was given a state funeral.



Morgan

Fritz Erler was a statesman in the true sense of the over-used word, and without unnecessary flourishes. His statesmanship stemmed from the clarity of his mind, the honesty of his actions, not from his manner, which was almost diffident for a German; or from his personal magnetism—although the integrity of the man almost shone through slightly bulging blue eyes under his glistening baldness.

In its obituary the New York Times quoted a colleague as saying only two men could hold the undivided attention of the Bundestag, Bonn's lower house: Erler, "with his clear, seemingly unassailable arguments, pointed gestures and piercing wit," and Kurt Kiesinger, the new chancellor.

It is a significant commentary on the evolution of German politics that it was Kiesinger, a conservative Christian Democrat and one-time member of the Nazi Party, who ordered the nation's current tribute to this Socialist whom Hitler's minions nearly murdered.

After seven years in Nazi prisons Erler escaped in March 1945 from a prison train headed for the concentration and extermination camp at Dachau.

Erler was firmly critical of the government for not prosecuting culpable Nazis more aggressively (only recently three ex-officials were convicted in Munich of the murder of Anne Frank and thousands of other Jews in Holland). But he firmly believed there would be no return of a Hitler-like regime.

The cause to which he was most deeply committed, along with contemporaries as Jean Monnet and Robert Schumann of France, was that of a stable, united Europe, not a continent cracked into fragments of nationalism, through the crevices of which two world wars had erupted.

But Erler was an unusual man who combined realism with idealism. He knew that politics was the art of the possible. His pragmatism, enormous knowledge and careful judgment earned him respect in the highest councils of Europe and the U.S. He was trusted by top officials in the Pentagon and the State Dept.; he knew both John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson personally.

I remember sitting with him on the left bank of the Rhine in Bonn one June afternoon in 1963.

Then, as now, a major problem was how to fit the Germans into the nuclear age so they could share its benefits without scaring the world to death with their finger on the trigger of a hydrogen bomb. Erler fully understood that fear. Germany, he said, does not need nuclear weapons, and Chancellor Adenauer does not want them but, he added perceptively, he also does not want "that others say Germany must not have them."

HE FELT Washington didn't sufficiently appreciate the need for a more balanced partnership in NATO. He then recited a formula which I underlined in my notes: "not everyone must have everything but everything must serve everyone."

When he and Willy Brandt, now foreign minister, were in Washington two years ago I asked Erler what was wrong with the western alliance. Two things, he said: it still has no major strategy and there is still no provision for the non-nuclear powers to participate in nuclear weapons strategy.

He wished Pres. Johnson would speak out on these matters. Whether he and Brandt emphasized the points when they went to the White House I don't know. I do know their meeting with the President was a little extraordinary. Their midday appointment had to be postponed till the end of the day because the President suddenly flew out to inspect flood and tornado damage in the Midwest.

Mr. Johnson returned looking very tired, but Erler was impressed with the President's questions about German reaction to U.S. policy in Vietnam. A roomful of senators was kept waiting while the President took the two German Socialists on a personal tour of the White House. Erler remembered an earlier incident of personal attention. He and Brandt had come to the U.S. in 1954 on a lecture tour which included Texas. They met the then Sen. Lyndon Johnson and he carefully had their speeches inserted in the Congressional Record.

Whether the president himself remembers that now, Fritz Erler will be remembered as one of that rare and vital breed of men capable of looking beyond the narrow bounds of nationalism and working for the general good.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE NATION'S capital city is, if the truth must be acknowledged, a "ho-hum" town right now. The President has delivered major messages to Congress on a variety of major themes—education, health, air and water pollution, social security, the central cities.

Congress is sluggish, however, and the mood of Congress often determines the tone of events or, as in this case, of non-events.

The committee work is barely beginning. There is evidence that Democratic committee chairmen may have great difficulty in advancing Administration bills after the great burst of creative activity from 1961 through 1965.

Republican election gains last November are a large part of the explanation; the Democrats no longer have the liberal majorities they once had.

Republicans are cannily looking for chances to disrupt any Administration program either by cutting appropriations or by refusing action on new authorizations. But the news from the GOP arises from outside Congress; it is in the presidential possibilities of Gov. Romney, former Vice Pres. Nixon, Gov. Rockefeller.

Thirty-odd national political reporters trailed Romney on his western tour, which apparently was designed to establish the governor's western bona fides as well as impress the reporters. Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen and Rep. Gerald R. Ford, Jr., the congressional leaders, couldn't get that much coverage in six months of coast-to-coast campaigning.

THE SENATE is crowded with Republican members who fancy themselves as potential vice presidential nominees—Percy of Illinois, Javits of New York, Hatfield of Oregon, Brooke of Massachusetts. The House has Ford and Rep. Melvin Laird of Wisconsin.

But there isn't a genuine presidential possible in the carload. The presidential possibles, so far as can be observed this much in advance, are Romney, Nixon, Rockefeller, with the enigmatic Gov. Reagan of California as a long, long shot.

The action, for the Republicans, has moved out of Washington.

Mr. Ford, it is reasonable to assume, has some hopes of a Republican majority in the House next year, in which case he would become speaker. We haven't had a Republican speaker since Joe Martin in the 83rd Congress of 1953-54. But it is the presidential candidate—not Mr. Ford—who will determine how well the GOP does in the congressional races next year.

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES for Congress run behind the party's presidential candidates, generally speaking.

It was the weakness of GOP congressional candidates—and the strength of Democratic candidates—that pulled Mr. Truman through in 1948.

Mr. Kennedy barely nosed out Mr. Nixon in 1960 but the Democratic congressional vote, across the nation, was substantially larger than the Republican vote, and the majorities in the House and Senate reflected it.

Mr. Johnson could conceivably be beaten in 1968, but a better judgment is that Republicans may well have won everything they can in Congress in 1966, and that they are in short supply, really, in the realm of the presidency.

Congress maneuvers, in the vacuum, with nobody in charge of events, but with Mr. Johnson in charge of foreign policy, the first field of a President's concern.

Labor News Conference:

High Doctor Fees, Direct Billing Hardship To Medicare Patients

HAVING LOST its battle to block medicare, organized medicine is "trying to wreck" the program, an AFL-CIO spokesman charged.

Dir. Leo Perlis of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Community Services Activities said that fast-rising medical fees and physicians' insistence on billing elderly patients instead of the designated medicare agencies are creating hardships for the people the law is designed to protect. His statements came during Labor News Conference, a weekly AFL-CIO produced public affairs feature on the Mutual Radio Network.

Perlis said direct patient-billing forces people with already inadequate incomes to undergo the additional hardships of filing claims and enduring long delays in reimbursement of medical costs. And because of illness or other reasons, "there are many people in that age group who are simply incapable of filling out these forms."

Instead of cooperating with medicare, organized medicine condones, rationalizes and excuses such practices, Perlis said, noting that "too often, the doctor has benefited more from the insurance protection than the patient."

Overcoming these and other problems in the full implementation of medicare is on the agenda of the 12th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services, to be held Apr. 16-20 in New York City, Perlis said.

MORE THAN 500 local union representatives and observers from public and voluntary agencies are expected for the five-day session.

Presentation of the annual Murray-Green Award to Dr. Albert B. Sabin for his contribution to the development of the oral anti-polio vaccine will highlight a dinner meeting Apr. 20. The award, named for the late presidents of the former Congress of Industrial Organizations and American Federation of Labor, respectively, was established in 1956 to honor achievements in health and welfare.

Reporters questioning Perlis were Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers, and Frank Swoboda of United Press Intl.

How to Buy:

Low March Food Prices Due To Vanish by Next Summer

By Sidney Margolius

EAT WHILE YOU CAN. Food prices in March will be at a relatively low point for the year, particularly if you concentrate on the more reasonable buys.

But you can expect that food will jump up this summer, and that housewives will be out protesting again, especially now that the boycott groups have organized into the United National Consumers Association.

Other good values have developed while some basic expenses continue to rise. The worst crisis is developing in medical costs. These jumped 8 percent in 1966 over 1965, and will go up even more in 1967, Blue Cross officials are warning. They attribute the leaping costs not only to better wages for low-paid hospital workers, but to expensive new equipment and the higher-paid technicians required to operate it.

Leaping medical costs are hastening efforts to develop comprehensive group care plans. Such facilities, now available in some cities, have shown that they not only hold down doctor costs but reduce hospital utilization. People using these group services get more preventive care.

In fact, a Canadian government committee found after a recent study that the division of work and more effective use of costly diagnostic equipment made possible by group practice result in lower costs, better care and benefits to doctors, too.

Here are tips on March buying opportunities:

NONSTICK PANS: Cooking utensils coated with Teflon have become popular not only because they enable cooking without fats but because they are easier to clean. Foods don't stick. Government authorities say they are entirely safe.

Some have a more durable or "locked-on" coating, and permit the use of metal spatulas. The older type requires more care to avoid scratching, including the use of a wooden spatula. In the non-scratch type, the Teflon is added to the metal, not merely coated on the surface. Unfortunately there is no way you can be sure a utensil provides a truly non-scratch finish, since there are no standards. Those brands which indicate they are coated by the Boeclad process, or that the finish is locked on, are more dependable.

DURABLE PRESS SHIRTS: More price cuts on polyester-cotton blend shirts with durable or permanent-press finish have brought down the price of the advertised brands to as low as $5, and some private brands to $4 in recent sales.

But look for the information in the ads and on the labels which tell you the proportion of the different fibers in the blend. Some durable-press shirts have more cotton than polyester. For some purposes this is all right, especially for shirts not heavily used. In fact, the higher proportion of cotton may look dressier and provide more opaqueness, but the shirts with a higher proportion of polyester are considered more durable. The finishing process does tend to "tenderize" cotton fiber.

TV, APPLIANCE SALES: Retailers and manufacturers are still cutting prices on "home entertainment" products—notably, stereo phonographs and color TV. The price cuts are biggest on the costlier console sets.

Stores sometimes try to persuade customers seeking portable or table-model TV sets to buy costlier consoles by saying the latter are easier to service. This is not so.

Families in the market for washing machines or vacuum cleaners can find outstanding values in March sales. Full-size tank-type cleaners with such features as roll-about wheels, protective bumpers and automatic cord rewind are available for $40 or less. Values in automatic washers also have improved, with full-size two-speed washers available in leading brands under $250.

FLOOR TILES: Prices have been reduced on vinyl asbestos tiles. This type has fair resiliency underfoot and ability to recover from dents, and is usable both for basements and above-grade installations. The even more comfortable and resilient all-vinyl tile usually is usable only above grade.

While tile is popular for do-it-yourself projects, more families are turning to sheet vinyl. This requires professional installation but eliminates some of the problems of tiles, such as working loose on above-grade floors. Prices of sheet vinyl have not been reduced.

FOOD-BUYING CALENDAR: Eggs are the buy this month and can be used in many ways to supplement meat and hold down costs. Poultry prices also are lower—on turkeys as well as broilers and roasters. In red meats, pork prices are still relatively low. So is beef chuck. But veal and lamb are expensive.

From Soup to Nonsense:

All Right, Fellas, Let's Go Ahead And Invent Something—or Other

By Jane Goodsell

INVENTIONS I wish somebody would hurry up and invent:

A record player that produces sounds inaudible to the adult ear even when played at top volume.

Or else a Top Twenty Tune that parents can hear for the 16th consecutive playing without having to resort to tranquilizers.

No-cal french fried potatoes.

A birthday book with an alarm mechanism that rings, buzzes or vibrates to alert you to take it out of the drawer and look at it because today is somebody's birthday.

A camera that retouches photographs before they are developed.

A Geiger counter for finding lost car keys.

Peanut butter flavored toothpaste.

An eighth day of the week for doing things that didn't get done during the other seven.

A size 10 that will fit a size 14 figure.

A new game that can be played with those 51-card decks that everybody has around the house.

A FIRM called Listeners, Inc., which employs people who, for a reasonable fee, will listen with rapt expressions and without interrupting to accounts of operations, vacation trips, cute sayings of children and peculiar dreams.

A rabbit's foot luck charm that comes with a money-back guarantee.

A pen with a shut-off valve that prevents it from writing a misspelled word.

Newspapers printed on only one side of the page for husbands whose wives clip out recipes and for wives whose husbands work crossword puzzles.

Popular prices that really are.

A new miracle diet that people can actually stick to.

Or else new miracle people who can stick to the diets we've already got.

Keyed to Consumers:

Drug Industry Tries To Block PAI Column

By Press Associates, Inc.

EFFORTS by the powerful drug industry to block the publication of a consumer-interest column distributed to the labor press by Press Associates, Inc., have come to light.

Recently, PAI decided to extend its services to labor editors to include a new column entitled "Good and Welfare." The plan was to carry sound facts in such areas as food, medicines, drugs, health and social security. The source for such facts would be government agencies.

Initial columns carried came from the Food & Drug Administration.

On Jan. 18, Dr. James L. Goddard, FDA commissioner, testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Consumer Interests of the Elderly and said:

"We have embarked on an every-other-week service to the press of short newspaper articles that have special interest for the older American. These articles are being written for us by Mr. Theodore Schuchat, a Washington writer with nearly 20 years of experience in the field of retirement and the aging.

"The bi-weekly columns written, by Mr. Schuchat under contract to FDA, are titled 'Good and Welfare,' a common agenda item heading on many union local agendas. The columns are, of course, available to any and all publishers or publication syndicators. The first organization to begin distributing 'Good and Welfare' is Press Associates, Inc., of Washington, D.C. It distributes news and feature materials to over 400 employe newspapers in major industries. They have an estimated readership of several million. PAI considers the column to be especially helpful to the pre-retirees."

FDC Reports or the "Pink Sheet," a publication of the food, drug and cosmetic industry, immediately contacted PAI for additional information. On Jan. 23, it carried a four-page article, including copies of four columns being sent out by PAI.

The columns dealt with vitamins and the fact that they should not be taken indiscriminately; the care that should be taken in using cosmetics without knowing their ingredients; the dangers of false advertising of drugs and the necessity for care in the use of prescription drugs.

The "Pink Sheet" sourly observed that these followed "a straight FDA line." This is highly unpopular with the drug industry.

SUBSEQUENTLY, both PAI and FDA received numerous telephone calls from private pharmaceutical and public relations firms with drug accounts. They all had the same tone: was the article exclusive with PAI; how much was PAI receiving for carrying the articles; how was FDA identified as the source of the articles.

PAI editors explained that the articles were not exclusive, that it received nothing from FDA for carrying the column and that FDA was quoted and spelled out as the source in almost every paragraph of the column.

Representatives of the drug industry told PAI "off the record" that the industry was trying to apply all the pressure it could to stop the columns. However, since few, if any, labor papers take pharmaceutical ads there was no leverage for them to use pressure.

So the only gimmick was to "smear" FDA and Goddard.

On Feb. 15 the Washington Post carried a lengthy article under the heading "FDA Views Circulated with Source Unstated." The lead read:

"The Food & Drug Administration, which normally believes that products should be fully labeled, has financed news articles being distributed to millions of readers who are unaware that the agency is a source."

Buried in the story is a quote from PAI that in every paragraph of the article FDA is identified as the source and also they state that "FDA approved the form in which Press Associates distributed the articles."

The story was picked up by the Washington Star and the wire services.

Actually, PAI is handling the column in no way different from the way all news services and editors handle press releases from government agencies or from any other source. They quote the source.

PAI met with FDA officials and decided that nothing would be changed. Press Associates and FDA were not submitting to pressure.

"We are pleased that so many labor editors are using this column," PAI editors said. "So many publications which take advertising apparently are fearful of carrying such copy. We are pleased that the labor press does not knuckle under to the special interests.

"As long as FDA and other government agencies supply us with sound facts we intend to continue to send out the column to labor editors."

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

President Backed:

Council Reaffirms Stand on Viet Nam

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO strongly reaffirmed its support of Pres. Johnson's policies in Viet Nam and backed the President in his determination not to call off the bombing of North Vietnamese military targets until some sign of a matching act of de-escalation is given by the Communists.

The Executive Council unanimously adopted a statement noting the campaign to secure a peaceful settlement in Viet Nam and the Administration's favorable response to all peace appeals.

In contrast, it emphasized, there has been "negative and unfavorable" response from Hanoi, Moscow and Peiping. These rejections, it said, "show clearly that they are waging a war of Communist conquest of South Viet Nam and not a war for national independence."

In limiting air strikes in North Viet Nam to military targets, the statement pointed out, the U.S. "has paid dearly in the loss of planes and pilots" because of deliberate efforts to come as close as possible to the targets so that civilian losses could be reduced to a minimum.

In light of the continuing developments in Viet Nam, the council reaffirmed the position unanimously adopted by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco and the policy of the Administration of being ready to negotiate for an "equitable settlement of the conflict while simultaneously waging an unrelenting fight" for the freedom of South Viet Nam and the peoples of Southeast Asia.

Bombing Pauses

Reviewing the history of the two bombing pauses by the U.S., the council said that on both occasions the Communists exploited the suspensions for their own military advantage and for preparing new offensive actions against South Viet Nam. Therefore, the council added, the AFL-CIO "unhesitatingly supports" the President in his determination not to call off "unilaterally the bombing of North Vietnamese military targets until the Communists give some sign that they will reciprocate with a matching act of de-escalation."

Aid Ban Urged On Mid-East Aggressors

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The U.S. government was urged to refuse "all economic and technical assistance" to Middle East countries that encourage border warfare or seek to destroy their neighbors.

The demand came from the AFL-CIO Executive Council which drew "particular attention to the incitement and menace of border warfare against Israel," including infiltration of its territory and "warlike acts."

The council expressed its "deep concern" with the "systematic intensification of Soviet intrigue in the Middle East during the past year, especially in Egypt and Syria." It cited "repeated acts of aggression" by Syria against Israel which threaten the "security and stability of the entire Middle East," the Egyptian government's gas bombing of a village on the Saudi-Yemen border, and aggressive action by Syria against Jordan.

The statement concluded with a call to the U.S. government "to adopt a strong stand against such aggression and to refuse all economic and technical assistance to those countries sponsoring a policy of encouraging border warfare.

African Freedom Keyed To Trade Union Status

Bal Harbour, Fla.—One cannot fully appreciate free trade unionism unless he has lived under controlled, state unions.

This view was expressed here by Benjamin Bentun, secretary general of the Trades Union Congress of Ghana, now visiting the United States. He met with the AFL-CIO Executive Council here and plans to visit industrial areas throughout the country.

Not over five feet tall, the 36-year-old former agricultural researcher stands tall in the trade union movement of his country.

After the overthrow of Nkrumah one year ago, he was unanimously elected to his post by some 400 delegates representing 500,000 workers from 16 separate national unions. He estimates that 80 percent of the wage earners of his country are now in TUC affiliates.

Bentun firmly believes that there cannot be freedom in a country without free trade unions.

"Historically," he said, "nearly all African countries evolved as free nations through their trade union movements."

Bentun declared that "the challenge of our time is that the trade union movement will be allowed to act free, a trade union movement that cannot be absorbed, bought or destroyed by the political parties and the government."

Future Charted

The African unionist said that he believed that his country "could evolve a superior system in which the trade union movement will not be tied to the political parties or the government."

Bentun received his initial introduction to trade unionism when he organized his fellow agricultural research workers, starting in 1949. Later his group merged with a general agricultural workers union, and he worked up from national organizer to general secretary and finally was elected chairman of the executive board of the TUC.

He opposed Nkrumah's policies and the rigid restrictions placed on the labor movement. For this he was ousted from his post by Nkrumah. For a year he was unemployed until Nkrumah, fearful of his popularity among workers, forced him to accept a post as minister of forestry.

"All the time I was working for free unions and a free society," Bentun said. "Now, I feel that we are moving in that direction."

CLC Urges Law Requiring Safer Autos

Ottawa, Ont. — Legislation requiring auto manufacturers to produce cars with "optimum mechanical safety" and with a wide range of safety devices as standard equipment was urged by the Canadian Labor Congress in a brief presented to the Committee on Justice & Legal Affairs of the federal House of Commons.

"The hundreds of millions of dollars spent on advertising to condition the public to purchase new models and unimportant accessories," the brief added, "could be used in part at least to educate the car driver to practice traffic safety.

"The excuse offered by the industry is that the public doesn't want safety devices; it wants style. We submit that with the engineering and design skills available today it is possible to have both. . . .

"We wish to see installed in cars as standard equipment those safety devices that would provide better driving aids and greater safety for driver and passengers in the event of an accident."

Factory Inspection

Further to cut down traffic accidents, the CLC urged:

- Federal inspection of vehicles during manufacture.
- Action against the imposition of an "excessive work pace" on auto assembly lines.
- Stiffer examination of applicants for drivers' licenses, including tougher road tests.
- Harsher penalties for the more serious traffic violations.
- Broader driver education in high schools.
- Compulsory periodic inspection of autos.

Marshall-Plan Approach Proposed For Africa

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A four-point program for Africa, including a Marshall-Plan approach to lay a solid economic basis for an eventual United States of Africa, has been urged by the AFL-CIO.

The Executive Council recommended that the United States, in addition to implementing Pres. Johnson's economic development policies for the continent, request the United Nations to investigate the "growing Soviet proliferation of arms and military assistance in Africa" and recommend ways of avoiding an all-out arms race.

The council also called for support of democratic nationalist movements through the UN and an end to all assistance to Spain and Portugal "which are using arms to suppress the efforts of the African people seeking to complete the end of colonial tyranny in Africa."

The 37 independent states of Africa, the council pointed out, are faced with the "vital necessity of economic development," which is proceeding at too slow a pace. The need for domestic and foreign capital investment, both public and private, "is most urgent," the council said.

The acceptance by the African nations of "regional, continental planning and integration would open up new vistas for a continent rich in potential," the council commented, urging a greater response from industrially developed nations.

The persistence of colonialism, dictatorship and racial discrimination threatens the stability as well as the peace of Africa and the world, the council said, adding: "We must continue our support to the nationalist movements as well as to the UN in the continuing efforts to achieve real freedom and independence in all of Africa."

The statement warned that the U.S. "should not yield to colonialist pressure and should instead expand the support needed to free the peoples of Southern Africa, Mozambique, Angola, and all territories still under Portuguese and Spanish control and domination."

6 Labor Advisers Added by OEO

Six new members have been appointed to the Labor Advisory Council of the Office of Economic Opportunity and will join 11 others who have served for the past 18 months under the chairmanship of Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes.

The new members are AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis; Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Civil Rights Dir. William Gary of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; William Lucey, associate director of community affairs for the State, County & Municipal Employes; Pres. Miles Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO and Vice Pres. Rosa McGhee of the American Federation of Teachers.

Pamphlet Explains Wage Law Terms

Application of the minimum wage act to nearly 1 million hotel, motel, restaurant and food service employes brought under federal law for the first time on Feb. 1 is explained in a new pamphlet made available by the Wage-Hour Public Contracts Division of the Labor Dept.

Single copies of WHPC No. 1172 may be obtained free from the WHPC Divisions, U.S. Labor Dept., Washington, D. C. 20210, or from regional and field offices throughout the country.

$5,000 Pay Rise Needed In Schools, AFT Asserts

Public school teachers need "an immediate $5,000 across-the-board wage increase" to bring them up to the income level of other professional workers, the American Federation of Teachers said on the basis of a nationwide survey.

Results of the survey on "The Earning Power of Teachers" were cited by AFT Assistant Research Dir. Donald Burton as evidence of the neglected status of U.S. teachers.

The survey shows that the average U.S. teacher is paid $6,820 a year, Burton told a Washington press conference, citing a recent report by the U.S. Office of Education. This is only $23 per year above the income needed to maintain a modest standard of living for a family of four, Burton said.

$10 Billion Cost

A $5,000 annual increase would cost $10 billion and boost the nation's annual expenditures for education by about 25 percent, Burton said.

The AFT study is an analysis of the economic factors affecting teachers in the school systems of the 50 largest cities—New York to Tulsa—and of 120 selected suburbs with pupil enrollments of 6,000 or more each.

Burton quoted these highlights:

- Big cities generally pay higher teacher salaries than suburban school systems.
- Percentage of newly hired teachers for the 1966-67 school year was 19 in big-city suburbs, 13 in the cities.
- Most teachers are paid, contrary to popular belief, on the basis of a bachelor's degree and not the higher-rated master's degree.
- Nearly half the big-city school systems allow no more than five or six years' credit when they hire teachers from other school systems —a practice the union called an "archaic and demeaning limitation" that should be abolished to attract and reward seasoned teachers.

The survey disclosed also that some big-city systems hire a large percentage of their teaching staffs from the ranks of uncertificated teachers who serve as "permanent" substitutes. Among nine examples, the proportion ranged from 34 percent in New York and Washington, D.C., to 8 percent in Detroit.

Another finding was that "moonlighting" by teachers is widespread. If all teachers were included who coach or teach after school, plus those who work during the summer months, the total of those with "outside" jobs might take in three of every four male teachers, Burton estimated. He added:

"No other class of workers can match this unbelievable record. The waste of teaching talent is tragic."

The study listed average salaries in these metropolitan areas: New York City $8,900 a year, suburban school salaries $8,228; Los Angeles $9,078, suburbs $7,887; Philadelphia $8,420, suburbs $7,232; Detroit $8,296, suburbs $7,920; Chicago $8,290, suburbs $7,708.

Food Chain Bars Struck Farm Goods

San Francisco—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee achieved a major boycott breakthrough when Purity Stores, Inc., agreed to remove all products of the struck Perelli-Minetti growers from the shelves of 85 West Coast stores.

Committee Dir. Cesar Chavez called the company's decision a "signal victory for the union" after 12 days of picketing by 35 farm workers at a Purity store here. Pres. Bud Ward of Purity Stores has agreed not to sell nor buy Perelli-Minetti foodstuffs, or wines for the duration of the union's effort to get a contract for striking employes of the big grower, Chavez announced.

At the same time Chavez charged that agents of the expelled Teamsters "viciously" beat UFWOC Organizer John Shroyer on the Purity picket line. Teamster violence halted when members of the Seafarers took the strikers' places in the picket line, Chevez said.

Chavez noted that the Teamsters had signed a "back door" representation agreement with Perelli-Minetti after UFWOC members had been on strike at company locations for a year.

The agreement with Purity was the first in this area, and came as the union prepared to picket all company stores in the Bay area and the San Joaquin Valley. Previously Los Angeles food chains had agreed not to offer struck products for sale.

VIDEO TAPE as a teaching tool to instruct graphic arts craftsmen was utilized for the first time at the first annual training seminar of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, held in Chicago. House Rebuffs Leaders, Votes to Exclude Powell

The House rejected the counsel of its Democratic and Republican leaders and voted to exclude Adam C. Powell from the 90th Congress.

It substituted the exclusion penalty for the recommendation of a bipartisan blue ribbon committee that the New York Democrat be seated, publicly censured for "gross misconduct," stripped of seniority and docked $40,000 in pay.

Unresolved questions of constitutionality were raised during the debate and Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) said he thought Powell has a "good case" to challenge the House action in court. Celler headed the committee which came to the conclusion that Powell had met the constitutional requirements for office and therefore must be seated before punishment could be imposed.

Powell has represented New York's Harlem district since 1944 and rose through seniority to the chairmanship of the Education & Labor Committee, with jurisdiction over some of the most important Great Society programs.

After a House Administrative Committee found evidence of misuse of congressional funds, the House Democratic caucus at the start of this session denied Powell his committee chairmanship. The full House then voted to defer action on whether he should be seated pending the report of a special committee.

The committee report had the backing of the leadership of both parties, but it was in effect rejected by a 222-202 vote.

On this key vote, 131 Democrats and 71 Republicans voted to support the committee. Defeating the motion was an alliance of 113 Republicans and 109 Democrats.

The House then voted exclusion by a 248-176 tentative vote and confirmed the action by a final vote of 307-116.

Celler attributed the defeat of his committee's recommendations to letters from constituents demanding Powell's ouster. Congressmen, he alleged, "got frightened."

Unless court action intervenes, a special election will be called to fill the vacancy. If Powell should run and be re-elected, the question of his seating presumably would again come before the House.

Johnson, Meany to Lead Social Security Rallies

To emphasize that the rallies are the start, not the culmination, of the drive, each person attending will be given a kit with facts, background, letter-writing hints, posters and a petition supporting the social security bill.

A letter from Meany asks that "every AFL-CIO member . . . as a trade unionist and a concerned citizen, take personal part" in building support for the legislation.

"Write to your congressman and senators," Meany asks, "visit with them when they are home, spread the message through your clubs, church groups, fraternal organizations and neighborhood associations."

The letter stresses that "nearly two million older people are on welfare. Nearly half of our single older citizens have total assets of less than $1,000. We cannot pretend that the social security system is adequate when the average monthly insurance benefit is only $84."

Besides Oklahoma City, Los Angeles and New York, Mar. 12 rallies will be held in Boston, Cleveland, Cincinnati, New Orleans, Milwaukee, Denver, Indianapolis, Seattle, Daytona Beach and St. Petersburg. The St. Louis rally will be Mar. 10 and the Chicago rally is set for Apr. 9.

House Ways & Means Committee hearings on the bill opened Mar. 1 and are expected to continue for some weeks. Congressional conservatives, while generally agreed on the need for some social security improvements, have served notice they will seek drastic cutbacks in the Administration plan, which will require higher contributions from workers and employers.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its recent meeting, sharply criticized a Republican substitute proposal for an 8 percent increase as "grossly inadequate." The council pointed out that while the GOP plan has the "surface attraction" of avoiding increased contributions, "benefit levels would still be so low that very few beneficiaries now below the poverty level would be raised above it."

It termed the Administration bill a "significant down-payment" on the 50 percent rise in benefits the AFL-CIO has urged, to be partly financed by general revenues.

The detailed schedule of the labor-sponsored rallies is:

New York, Mar. 12, 2 p.m., NMU Hall, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.).

Boston, Mar. 12, 2 p.m., Hotel Bradford, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Chicago, Apr. 9, 2:30 p.m., Plumbers Hall, Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.).

St. Louis, Mar. 10, 7:30 p.m., Carpenters Hall.

New Orleans, Mar. 12, 2:30 p.m., Seafarers Hall.

Milwaukee, Mar. 12, 2:30 p.m., U. of Wisconsin, Bolton Hall, Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.).

Machinists Revise Referendum Policy

The requirement of referendum approval for constitutional changes voted by a general convention has been deleted from the Machinists constitution by a referendum vote of 49,288—41,303, Sec.-Treas. Matthew DeMore announced.

The procedure had become expensive and cumbersome and no longer served a useful purpose because of lack of membership interest in referendum voting, DeMore noted. The deletion does not affect the right of members to initiate changes in the constitution between conventions, or the manner of electing international officers.

Union Action Upheld:

High Court Backs Grievance Ruling

The Supreme Court has reversed a Missouri Supreme Court ruling that a union must pay $10,000 in damages to a member for deciding not to carry his grievance to arbitration, the fifth step of the grievance procedure.

Five justices joined in finding that the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse & Dairy Workers, unaffiliated, and its Kansas City Local 12 did not fail in their duty of fairly representing Benjamin Owens, Jr., now deceased, by deciding not to take his grievance case to arbitration. Union officers said there was insufficient medical evidence supporting Owens' claim that he was well enough to return to work at the Swift & Co. packing plant in Kansas City Mo., after treatment for high blood pressure. A company doctor decided he was not.

Three justices concurred in reversing the lower court but for a different reason. They held that Owens should have carried his case to the National Labor Relations Board instead of the state courts. Justice Hugo L. Black dissented, saying the high court had set up a new rule in fair representation cases and he does not accept it.

Last year the AFL-CIO filed a brief supporting the position of the brotherhood and urging reversal. Though Owens' union is not a federation affiliate, the AFL-CIO has a "profound interest" in the dispute because more than 90 percent of all U.S. union contracts with management have a grievance procedure similar to the one in the brotherhood's contract, the brief noted.

The Supreme Court opinion, written by Justice Byron R. White, recited that a suit filed on Feb. 13, 1962, in the Circuit Court of Jackson County, Mo., alleged that Owens had been discharged by Swift in violation of the collective bargaining agreement then in effect and that the union had "arbitrarily, capriciously and without just or reasonable reason or cause" refused to take his grievance to arbitration.

A jury heard the evidence and awarded Owens $7,000 compensatory and $3,300 punitive damages. The trial judge set aside the verdict on the ground that the NLRB had exclusive jurisdiction. The Kansas City Court of Appeals upheld the judge's ruling but the Missouri high court reversed the lower courts on the basis of previous U.S. Supreme Court findings. It directed reinstatement of the jury's verdict but cut punitive damages to $3,000. Meanwhile, Owens died but his estate pressed the legal action.

The facts, related in the Supreme Court opinion, were these:

Took Sick Leave

In mid-1959 Owens, a long-time high blood pressure patient, entered a hospital on sick leave from his job at Swift's. After a long rest his family physician certified him as fit to resume work, but a company doctor examined him and concluded his blood pressure was too high for one doing the heavy work he performed.

Owens got a second authorization from another doctor and a nurse permitted him to resume work on Jan. 6, 1960. Two days later the Swift doctor discovered he had returned and he was "permanently discharged on the ground of poor health," the court related.

Owens then sought the union's help and a grievance was filed. On Feb. 6, 1961, the union sent Owens to a new doctor at its expense to see, as the union put it, "if we could go to arbitration with his case" after management continued refusing to reinstatement. The examination "did not support" Owens' claim and the union executive board decided to drop the grievance. It advised Owens to accept Swift's offer of referral to a medical center. He refused and filed his suit.

The Supreme Court majority concluded that state courts have jurisdiction in this type of case, but that federal law governs and federal standards must be applied. They were not applied in the Owens case, it found in reversing the state supreme court.

Rules of Conduct

A breach of the legal duty of fair representation occurs only "when a union's conduct toward a member . . . is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith," the high court's opinion said. "Though we accept the proposition that a union may not arbitrarily ignore a meritorious grievance or process it in perfunctory fashion we do not agree that the individual employe has an absolute right to have his grievance taken to arbitration regardless of the provisions" of the contract.

Hoffa Ordered To U.S. Prison, Loses Appeals

James R. Hoffa, president of the unaffiliated Teamsters, was ordered to begin serving his eight-year prison sentence as of Mar. 8 on conviction of jury-tampering charges following Supreme Court refusal of a rehearing of its Dec. 12 decision denying review of the case.

Frank E. Fitzsimmons, elected a few months ago as general vice president of the union, was named as acting president by the executive board.

Fitzsimmons is a member of Local 299 in Detroit, Hoffa's home local. The Teamsters were expelled by the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt elements.

Justice Potter Stewart denied two requests from Hoffa's lawyers for a delay in sending copies of the high court's judgment to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati and the district court in Chattanooga where Hoffa was convicted. Stewart has supervisory jurisdiction over the 6th Circuit Court.

Multiple actions were still contemplated, according to the lawyers, in an effort to overturn Hoffa's conviction. They included:

- A motion before District Judge Frank W. Wilson for a new trial, charging that Hoffa's constitutional rights were violated by illegal government wiretapping. The Supreme Court rejected claims of new evidence of wiretapping.
- Two appeals to the 6th Circuit asking a stay of execution until the appellate court decides allegations of prejudice by Judge Wilson and certain jurors and of spying by the government on Hoffa's attorney.

Hoffa was sentenced by Wilson to two terms of four years each to be served consecutively, upon his conviction of jury-tampering in an earlier trial of conspiracy charges.

He was also sentenced to five years on conviction in a Chicago U.S. District Court of defrauding union pension funds. The conviction was upheld by a 2-1 vote of the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Johnson Voices Concern:

Conference to Study High Medical Costs

Pres. Johnson expressed strong concern at the soaring costs of medical services and directed the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to summon a National Conference on Medical Costs.

Physician fees rose almost 8 percent last year, hospital costs jumped 16 percent, and the President said a new government study "indicates that medical costs will almost certainly continue to rise."

Johnson said the conference "will bring together leaders of the medical community and members of the public to discuss how we can lower the costs of medical services without impairing the quality."

His announcement came in a message to Congress reiterating the government's commitment to "adequate medical care for every citizen" and calling for new and expanded federal aid programs.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had called on Congress and the Administration to adopt a program to control medical costs. It declared that "access to high quality health services at costs they can afford is the right of the American people."

The President asked Congress to expand and finance the Partnership for Health program it enacted last year, giving states new flexibility to use federal health grants to meet local and regional needs. He asked supplemental appropriations for planning programs this year and $161 million—an increase of $41 million—for the fiscal year beginning July 1.

Johnson called for a strengthened "partnership with labor, industry, medicine and government" in the occupational health and safety fields.

More Research Funds

He asked a 25 percent increase in federal funds to expand research and training programs in occupational health and strengthen state and local job health programs.

Johnson also directed the Labor Dept. to "improve and strengthen health production and safety standards for workers" through federal-state programs.

The President asked a major step-up in biomedical research and said a lung cancer task force will be set up to supplement existing cancer research.

He called for more money for training health workers to relieve critical shortages, proposed doubling the number of neighborhood health centers in poor areas, asked expansion of community mental health programs and proposed establishment of a new National Center for the Deaf and Blind.

Johnson said federally-supported programs will train 224,000 health workers this year—an increase of nearly 100,000 over 1966—and will also provide refresher training for 30,000 previously-inactive nurses and technicians.

The President said he will name a National Advisory Commission on Health Facilities to consider the future of the Hill-Burton hospital construction program, which expires in 1969, and to make recommendations for "financing the construction and modernization of health facilities."

Johnson recited the "spectacular progress" in medicine and health care and noted that during 1967 the federal government "is investing more than $440 million in the construction of health facilities, $620 million for health manpower education and training, $1.1 billion in biomedical research, $7.8 billion to provide medical care."

But calling for an expansion of these efforts, the President stressed "the unfinished business" in the health field. He told Congress:

- "Infant mortality is far higher than it need be.
- "Handicaps afflicting many children are discovered too late or left untreated.
- Grave deficiencies remain in health care for the poor, the handicapped and the chronically ill.
- American men between the ages of 45 and 54—which should be the most productive years of their lives—have a death rate twice that of men of the same age in a number of advanced countries.
- "We still search in vain for ways to prevent and treat many forms of cancer.
- "Many types of mental illness, retardation, arthritis and heart disease are still largely beyond our control."

26-EPISODE Profiles in Courage television series, based on Pres. Kennedy's book, will be sponsored in the Detroit area by Retail Clerks Local 876. The 23,000-member local will show the episodes without commercial interruption. Signing the contract are E. C. Metcalfe, manager of Station CKLW-TV, Jerry M. Lench of the Leonard Shane Agency, Local 876 Sec.-Treas. Herschel Womack and Jaques Leibenguth of NBC Films.

Morse Re-Elected To Top ILO Post

Geneva—Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse of the Intl. Labor Organization has been re-elected for a new five-year term to begin in September 1968, at the conclusion of his current term.

Morse, who was U.S. under secretary of labor during the Truman Administration, was the unanimous secret ballot choice of the Governing Body. He was first elected to a 10-year term as director-general in 1948, and was re-elected to five-year terms in 1957 and 1962. His 18-year span as head of the ILO is regarded as unprecedented among international organizations.

Boot and Shoe Wins 1st Pact In Maine Strike

Pittsfield, Me. — An 11-week strike by the Boot & Shoe Workers won a first contract for more than 300 employes of the Northeast Shoe Co. here, a division of Penobscot Shoe Co.

The settlement includes union security for Local 815, which won bargaining rights last October.

The agreement provides a grievance procedure, arbitration, payment for waiting time, call-in pay and other standard union conditions.

Insurance coverage is improved and wage increases totaling 18 cents an hour over the contract period are added to 6 cents granted by the company before the strike. The contract runs to October 1968.

Minimum wages at the plant are to be raised to $1.70 an hour and the company agreed to recall all striking workers within 10 weeks.

Company Charged In Rights Act Suit

Raleigh, N. C. — The Justice Dept. has filed its first suit against an employer under the equal employment opportunity section of the Civil Rights Act, asking the U.S. District Court here to direct the Dillon Supply Co. to end all racially discriminatory practices.

The Justice Dept. charged it with assigning Negroes to menial, low-paying jobs and keeping them there regardless of qualifications while promoting white workers who are no better qualified.

Illinois Parley Spurs Consumer Protection

Chicago—Creation of a state agency to represent consumers and protect shoppers from ruthless credit practices was urged by 200 persons attending the first Illinois Consumer Conference here.

The resolution listed a wide variety of functions such an agency could perform: recommending legislation, advising the governor and state boards on consumer interests, helping to enforce consumer protection laws and promoting consumer education.

Other resolutions:

- Authorized Conference Chairman Abner Mikva, attorney and former state representative, to name a steering committee for a permanent Illinois Consumer Conference.
- Urged federal legislation to Consumers and praised Mrs. Esther Peterson, special presidential assistant for consumer affairs, for her work in winning a voice for consumers.
- Requested more effective consumer education programs in elementary and high schools.
- Supported old credit reform legislation pending in the Illinois General Assembly. Two sets of bills await action in Springfield. Thirteen proposals to protect the interests of people who buy on credit have been sponsored by the Mayor's Committee on New Residents, a division of the Chicago Commission on Human Relations. This program is backed by the administration of Gov. Otto Kerner (D.). The Republican Party has sponsored its own bills.

The conference was sponsored by unions, voluntary agencies, cooperatives and credit unions. The Chicago AFL-CIO and Illinois State AFL-CIO were among sponsors. Others were the American Federation of Teachers, Auto Workers Chicago Local 1, Steelworkers, State County & Municipal Employes Dist. Council 19, Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Communications Workers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

David Caplovitz, associate professor of sociology at Columbia University, said in his keynote speech that consumers across the nation are awakening to their problems and are organizing to find solutions.

"The problems we speak of are those of the low-income consumer," he said, "but we must remember that middle-income consumers face similar problems. Our concern is how the poor spend what little they have."

The conference divided into four workshop groups to discuss consumer education, consumer protection, consumer action and consumer representation.

Canada's Civil Servants Given Right to Bargain

Ottawa, Ont.—Some 200,000 Canadian federal employes were given the right to collective bargaining—including the right to strike—as a result of three bills passed by the House of Commons.

The first, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, extends the right of bargaining to civil servants at the national level except for some areas where the government retained control—such as promotions and seniority rules for layoffs.

A second measure, the Public Service Employment Act, repeals and replaces the old Civil Service Act and establishes a Public Service Commission to succeed the Civil Service Commission. The commission's primary responsibility remains in the areas of recruitment and promotion.

The third bill amends the Financial Administration Act to make the Treasury Board the employer bargaining agent for all federal departments and agencies except for a scattering of semi-autonomous bodies such as the National Film Board.

Each bargaining unit is authorized at the start of negotiations for a contract to make a choice between the right to strike and the right to final and binding arbitration of any issues that cannot be settled at the bargaining table. The choice remains in effect until the start of bargaining for the following contract.

Nearly 150,000 of the 200,000 federal civil servants are represented by affiliates of the Canadian Labor Congress. The largest are the Public Service Alliance, which joined the CLC only recently, and the Postal Employes.

The legislation specifies that unions representing operations workers—general labor, crafts and postal groups—conclude their bargaining by Mar. 31, but Treasury Board spokesmen were doubtful that the schedule could be met.

Scientific, technical and professional categories can conclude their contracts on or after Dec. 31. Administrative, foreign service and administrative support employes were authorized to sign pacts after Mar. 31, 1968.

Ramsey Clark Named As Attorney General

Ramsey Clark, acting attorney general since Nicholas B. Katzenbach was named under secretary of state, was appointed to the top Justice Dept. post by Pres. Johnson. His father, Supreme Court Justice Tom Clark, promptly announced he would retire from the court at the end of its current term in June.

Meantime, Justice Clark said, he would review the high court's docket so as to screen himself from participation in any cases where an issue of conflict of interest might arise because of Ramsey Clark's involvement in Justice Dept. activities.

The Senate Judiciary Committee gave swift and unanimous approval to the nomination and Senate confirmation followed the same day.

Ramsey Clark was appointed to the Justice Dept. in 1961 as an assistant attorney general by the late Pres. Kennedy. He was promoted to deputy attorney general under Katzenbach after Robert F. Kennedy, now a New York senator, resigned from his Cabinet post.

A graduate of the University of Chicago Law School, the new attorney general, 39 years old, is known as a strong defender of civil rights legislation, a champion of anti-trust law activities, an opponent of electronic eavesdropping by prosecuting authorities and an opponent of capital punishment.

His father was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1949 by Pres. Truman. He has been a member of the court's conservative wing.

Urges Funds for 5,500:

LBJ Asks Expansion Of Teacher Corps

By David L. Perlman

A strong bid for expansion of the Teacher Corps highlighted Pres. Johnson's education message to Congress.

The Teacher Corps trains teams of experienced and novice teachers to work in slum area schools that request their services. Last year Congress only voted enough money to train 1,200 volunteers and the President said the government has had to turn away 10 times that number, including "some of our brightest college graduates," because of lack of funds. Requests for Teacher Corps trainees, he said, "exceed by far" the number available.

Johnson asked funds for a build-up to 5,500 teachers in the corps by the start of the 1968 school year.

"The schools in our nation's slums deserve a fair share of our nation's best teachers," the President declared. The Teacher Corps, he said, "has become a symbol of new hope for America's poor children and their parents—and for hard pressed school administrators."

To ease some earlier objections, the Administration's new bill requires state approval of a local school district's request for volunteers and permits the local school system to reject any volunteer it finds unacceptable. It also reduces the salary paid teacher-interns. Presently they receive the starting pay for teachers in the district to which they are assigned. The proposed legislation would change this to $75 a week plus $15 for each dependent or the local school salary, whichever is less.

Another section of the message called for "legislation to aid secondary schools and colleges to develop new programs in vocational education, to make work part of the learning experience and to provide career-counseling for their students."

The secondary school program would include grants to plan and carry out "innovative occupational education programs which may serve as models."

On the college level, he asked amendment of the college work-study program so that federal funds could be used to help support "cooperative education" programs which permit students to alternate periods of study with periods of employment.

Johnson called for extension this year of three major education programs scheduled to expire in 1968 and early action on appropriations for aid to schools and colleges so that they can plan ahead.

He asked more money for teacher training and broadening of training authority to cover educators other than classroom teachers.

Johnson also asked a four-fold increase in funds to help states and communities carry out school desegregation.

Aid to Handicapped

Other presidential proposals called for new programs for teaching the handicapped, money for an in-depth evaluation of how existing federal aid programs are working, and a 50 percent increase in adult literacy and basic education programs.

He said the $44 million appropriation the Administration seeks "will help new projects, sponsored by both public agencies and non-profit groups, to train volunteers for work in adult literacy programs and to establish neighborhood education programs reaching beyond the formal classroom."

Johnson said his fiscal 1968 budget requests for all educational purposes amount to $11 billion, a 10 percent increase over the current year and a 175 percent rise since 1963.

Hearing Slated On Rights Act Report Forms

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has called a Mar. 21 public hearing on its proposed wording of two non-discrimination report forms involving unions and apprenticeship programs.

According to the commission announcement, Form EEO-2 is to be filed annually "by all joint labor-management apprenticeship committees in all industries, and by employers and labor organizations in the construction industry which operate apprenticeship programs other than labor-management programs."

The other form, EEO-3, is to be filed by all unions subject to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee is scheduled to review the proposed forms before the hearing and submit its recommendations to the commission.

Copies of the proposed forms are available for inspection at the EEOC's Office of Research & Reports.

Public Television System Proposed by President

A new form of federal aid for educational television—"absolutely free" of federal controls over programs—has been proposed by Pres. Johnson.

The President asked Congress to create a Corporation for Public Television which would use both public and private funds to improve non-commercial television and radio. It would be governed by a 15-member board named by the President from "leaders in education, communications and the creative arts."

One of its first tasks, Johnson said, would be to study the practicability of using communication satellites to establish an educational television and radio network. It would operate as a foundation, making grants to help stations overcome present "serious shortages of the facilities, equipment, money and staff they need to present programs of high quality."

Johnson asked an initial $9 million federal appropriation to set up the corporation. He also urged Congress to boost federal construction aid for educational stations to $10.5 million, more than triple the current appropriation.

Labor and Industry Join NLRB In Celebrating 25-Millionth Vote

a ballot-box process that has "helped millions to achieve better pay, shorter hours, and improved working conditions" while aiding in the creation of a more just society and the advancement of industry.

"On behalf of your President and the nation, I congratulate you all," the Vice President said. "We still place our faith in the ballot, and hope to see it become a universal practice throughout the world."

Scheno, who spoke briefly, was escorted by USWA Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony and Board Chairman R. S. Reynolds, Jr., of Reynolds Metals. Other speakers included NLRB General Counsel Arnold Ordman, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, U.S. Appellate Court Judge J. Warren Madden, first NLRB chairman; Leon H. Keyserling, former assistant to the late Sen. Robert F. Wagner (D-N.Y.); Acting Under Sec. of Commerce J. Herbert Hollomon; Rep. Robert Taft, Jr. (R-O.) and NLRB Regional Dir. John A. Penello, Baltimore, who accepted an award for regional office staffs who have conducted more than 200,000 elections since the first one.

At the Capitol Hill luncheon members of the Senate and House Labor committees spoke briefly along with James D. Secrest, executive vice president of the Electronic Industries Assoc., and William F. May, chairman of the industrial relations committee of the NAM.

May declared that compulsory arbitration can only "significantly undermine" collective bargaining and the time has come to "reaffirm the need to preserve rather than destroy" the bargaining system.

'Unions Accepted'

He said "unions are accepted as an important economic force in our industrial society," and that "management recognizes the need for constructive and responsible approaches and for exercising a greater degree of social responsibility."

Meany recalled that the Wagner Act was passed in a period of industrial strife involving "some of the best known and most powerful corporations in America." Today, except for routine elections at new plants, many of these corporations are seldom mentioned in NLRB proceedings and "they solve their problems through collective bargaining," he said.

This is clear evidence, Meany declared, that "truly responsible employers" have come to accept unionism and collective bargaining as a normal part of the American way of life—"and a good way, for themselves as well as their workers."

But labor, too, Meany observed, can be "proud of our record in observing the onerous restrictions of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin" amendments to the Wagner Act.

"Seven separate types of 'unfair labor practices,' some with numerous subdivisions, are forbidden to unions," Meany said, while "employers must follow only five simple mandates. The clear assumption seems to be that unions are more apt to go wrong." Yet, he declared, only 18 percent of all unfair labor practice complaints were issued against labor organizations in 1966.

Meany called for extension of the labor law to agricultural workers, who are "encountering all the techniques of jungle warfare from which most workers have long been protected by the Wagner Act." Their plight, he said, is a "national disgrace."

Deliberate lawbreaking by employers, particularly in the South, accounts in part for the fact that "nearly two-thirds of the unfair practice charges filed against employers in fiscal 1966 involved the discharge of workers for union activity," Meany continued.

Civil Rights Leader Ties Racists to 'Work' Drive

San Francisco—"Right-to-work" laws to ban the union shop are aimed at the destruction of collective bargaining and would keep Negroes "at the bottom of the economic ladder," Bayard Rustin told the California Negro Leadership Conference here.

The veteran civil rights leader, who is chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, charged that the "right-to-work" campaign is backed "by practically every racist in the country."

It is "no accident," he said, that most of the states which prohibit the union shop "are the poor, segregationist, reactionary states with weak labor movements and disenfranchised Negroes."

Speaking in rebuttal to an officer of the National Right to Work Committee, Rustin said the leaders of the "work" drive can be found "on every right-wing letterhead" and "have by and large, been opposed to every social and economic reform that would benefit Negroes and workers."

Rustin told the Negro leaders that "there is still discrimination in a minority segment of the American labor movement." He added:

"This is a scandal, however, that is being vigorously fought by every unionist, black or white, who is worthy of the name. I myself am, in my own capacity, committed to end the vestiges of discrimination in the trade union movement, but I absolutely refuse to conduct the battle along lines that will ultimately injure the labor movement."

Rustin stressed that "a great measure of the Negroes' economic progress is the result of their membership in the labor movement." Both labor and Negroes have walked together "the bloody road to labor dignity and industrial democracy" and have been "brothers in blood, in sweat and in tears."

He termed the phrase "right-to-work" a "deceptive and insidious" slogan.

Only full employment assures a "genuine right to work," Rustin said, and "the only way to guarantee this kind of right to work is for Negroes and the unions to work together. We cannot do it by ourselves, and the economy cannot do it without us. We both have to weld a great coalition to solve the problems of jobs, education, housing."

Meany Calls for Enactment Of 20% Social Security Rise

Board Hits Stevens in 2nd Order

The National Labor Relations Board has added a new remedy to the three it previously prescribed to undo the "massive and deliberate unfair labor practices" and "flagrantly unlawful conduct" of J. P. Stevens & Co.

In a unanimous order, all five board members ruled that the big textile chain must furnish the Textile Workers Union of America with the names and addresses of all the workers in its 27 North and South Carolina plants.

Firings Cited

The board cited repeated threats, firings and discrimination against union-minded employes in the company's Rock Hill and Greenville, S.C., and Roanoke Rapids, N.C., plants. It declared the usual remedies against management violations to be insufficient and found, in a case involving the firing of 18 union members, that "it is essential that each employe be made individually aware" of his legal rights.

The board declined, however, to grant TWUA's request for an order directing the company to recognize and bargain with the union. It said that, although it is possible the union might ultimately have won majority status except for Stevens' unfair practice, it has not done so.

"We have serious doubts," the board said, "that the policies of the act require or permit the issuance of a bargaining order where ma-

6 Months in Advance:

Armour Unions Win Landmark Contracts

Chicago—Two AFL-CIO unions representing 12,000 Armour & Co. employes have signed new contracts with substantially improved benefits six months before the expiration of existing agreements.

Wage and benefit increases totaling 66 cents an hour for the average Armour worker will take effect as soon as members of the Packinghouse Workers and the Meat Cutters vote to ratify in the 47 U.S. plants involved.

In a joint statement, management and union negotiators voiced "satisfaction" over "reasonable and realistic . . . landmark agreements."

The new pacts provide 34 cents in wage increases over the term ending Aug. 31, 1970; and another 32 cents in pension, health and welfare, holiday, vacation and separation pay improvements.

The joint announcement said they were notable also for these reasons:

- They will permit Armour employes "not only to be protected against increases in the cost of living and of health care, but to enjoy a substantial share in the benefits of rising productivity."
- They will "permit management to plan more efficiently and precisely for the company's future on the basis of a schedule of costs clearly defined in advance."
- They reflect a mutual concern to avoid work stoppages and to maintain peak production at a time of "high and increasing demand" for Armour meats and other food products.

Current contracts were due to expire next Aug. 31. Under usual procedures the two unions, which have cooperated closely in their

LBJ Slates Revisions in Service Draft

Pres. Johnson told Congress he plans major revisions in the selective service system, including drafting of 19-year-olds before older men are called and establishment of a lottery system to assure impartiality on call-ups.

The President said frankly that he hadn't made up his mind yet on whether student deferments should be abandoned. There were good arguments on both sides, he declared, and invited Congress and the nation to debate the issue further. He did

Testimony Spells Out Support

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on Congress to write a new ending to the "grim story" of poverty among millions of elderly Americans subsisting on inadequate social security benefits.

Meany told the House Ways & Means Committee that Pres. Johnson's proposals for a 20 percent average benefit hike, coupled with major improvements in other sections of the program, "are a long step toward the kind of social security system the American people should have."

Promise, Not Peril

The Administration bill, he said, would bring the nation closer to the era "in which old age is a promise instead of a peril, in which illness or premature death are personal tragedies rather than family catastrophes."

Labor regards the proposed 20 percent rise as "a substantial down payment" towards a needed 50 percent increase, he said.

"Social security is not just an old folks' program," he noted. "It protects the widows and children of breadwinners who die. It protects the younger worker who is disabled and those who have depended upon his earnings. These are vitally important safeguards that are too often overlooked, especially by the younger generation of workers, who need them most."

U.S. 'Initiative' Urged On Slave Labor Pact

The United States should assert "moral leadership" by ratifying an international convention that would abolish the use of forced labor in the world, the AFL-CIO urged Congress.

Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the federation's Dept. of Legislation said the proposal, which was adopted by the Intl. Labor Organization ten years ago, "goes to the heart of the struggle between democracy and communism." Ratification, he said, would emphasize to the world our commitment to the realization of human rights not only at home but also abroad.

Biemiller told the Senate Ad Hoc Subcommittee on Human Rights that a decade of U.S. inaction on the convention has had an adverse effect on uncommitted countries as has our "refusal of recognition to millions of persons still denied human dignity in slave labor camps."

For too long, he said, "the United States has supported the charter of the United Nations and its human rights principles without agreeing to give these principles real meaning and force."

Ratification would amount to a declaration by the United States

Court Urged to Dismiss Suit to Block Wage Law

The AFL-CIO has asked a federal district court to throw out a suit by the State of Maryland designed to prevent enforcement of federal wage-hour standards for the protection of employes of public schools, hospitals and bus lines.

In a brief filed with a three-judge court in Baltimore, the federation cited the "compelling interest" it felt in the issue.

"Affiliates of the AFL-CIO represent a substantial number of employes" who would be affected by the outcome of the suit, the brief declared, and the federation "was active" in persuading Congress to provide protection of the workers in 1966 amendments to the wage-hour law.

It also quoted Pres. George Meany as saying that improvement of the law was "the greatest single victory in the war on poverty" and pointed out that the federation has set up machinery for a nationwide drive to secure effective enforcement.

Maryland asked the court to declare the amendments unconstitutional as they relate to state em-

SIGNING NEW CONTRACTS benefiting 12,000 workers at Armour & Co. plants are (left to right): Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters, Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers, Vice Pres. Harold Brooks of Armour and Vice Pres. Russell E. Dresser, Meat Cutters. dealings with the big meat-processing firms, would have drawn up their contract proposals in late spring and negotiations would have begun in midsummer.

The early opening of negotiations was attributed by the parties to the existence of a joint Armour Automation Committee. They acknowledged the value of the committee in fostering an atmosphere in which the idea of an early agreement could be considered, and said it would be continued under the new agreement.

The committee was set up eight years ago to improve communication between labor and management away from the bargaining table.

'Gratifying' Result

Achievement of new contracts, the joint statement said is, "gratifying to all of us" not only because of the contract improvements but also as renewed evidence of the effectiveness of collective bargaining.

Under the new pacts, a wage boost of 12 cents an hour now will be followed by 11-cent increases in September 1968 and again a year later. The present cost-of-living clause is retained but the unions agreed to forego any adjustment that might be due next July 1.

Workers in three Texas plants will get an additional increase of 10.5 cents this year, and another 8 cents next year, to eliminate or reduce remaining wage differentials among Armour workers. The plants are at Houston, Lubbock and San Angelo.

Workers in southeastern plants and master agreement distribution centers will get additional increases of 8 cents an hour effective Sept. 1, 1968, and another 8 cents a year later.

Pension benefits will be increased from $3.25 a month to $5 for each year of service effective Jan. 1, 1968, but applicable to all those retiring after Feb. 22, 1967. This will permit retirees with 30 years of Armour service to get a monthly pension of $150 exclusive of social security, instead of the present $97.50 a month.

Employes may retire at 62 without actuarial reduction of the pension benefit, instead of the present 65. Full vesting of pension rights is provided after 10 years of service regardless of age. Also provided are pensions for disabled workers after 10 years of service and full payment for retirees' hospital, medical and surgical insurance by the company as of next Dec. 1.

Armour agreed to increase company-paid life insurance coverage for employes from $2,700 to $5,000; and to cover 80 percent of "major medical" costs not covered under the basic plan.

Medical coverage for those with mental or nervous illness was extended from 30 to 365 days. Vacations and holiday clauses were improved and in the event of plant closings, workers will be given six months' advance notice instead of the present three-month notice.

Steel Union, Mine-Mill Sign Canadian Pact

Toronto, Ont.—The Steelworkers and the Canadian arm of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers have entered into a mutual aid agreement and a USWA spokesman said talks exploring the prospects for merger are continuing.

The assistance pact prohibits inter-union raiding and provides for cooperation in collective bargaining and in working for better labor and social legislation.

A merger would duplicate the course of relations between the two unions in the United States. The mutual aid agreement signed last summer was a prelude to a merger approved by a special Mine-Mill convention in January. The Canadian section of Mine-Mill was not covered by that action, however.

Mine-Mill leaders in Canada have scheduled a special conference for discussion of merger and have tentatively set a national convention for September to act on affiliation with the USWA.

Mine-Mill was expelled from the former Canadian Congress of Labor in 1949, shortly before its U.S. unit was expelled from the former CIO because of Communist domination.

Reuben Block Dies, ACWA Official

Philadelphia—Vice Pres. Reuben Block of the Clothing Workers, manager of the union's Eastern Pennsylvania and South Jersey joint boards, died at 70 following a heart attack. He was on his way to a meeting of the ACWA executive board when stricken at the Philadelphia Airport.

Block had been a board member since 1948. He joined the union more than 50 years ago in Chicago, was active in the Chicago clothing strikes of 1915 and 1919, and served the ACWA as an organizer, business agent and manager in several cities. Last rites were held in Allentown, his home city.

NLRB Orders Stevens Firm To List Employes for Union

jority status has never been attained."

The order was the second such board finding—in addition to four examiners' findings—against Stevens, a firm headed by Robert T. Stevens, former secretary of the army under Pres. Eisenhower and a major government contractor. Besides the usual remedies for illegal practices, including reinstatement of the 18 fired workers, the NLRB ordered Stevens to:

- Direct its supervisors to read the board's "Notice to All Employes" to the workers in their departments, "thereby directly placing the imprimatur of recognizable supervisory authority on the notice."
- Mail copies of the notice to all workers to "ensure that employes who are sick, on vacation or otherwise absent when the notice is read" can be "adequately informed of the respondent's intention to refrain from" unfair labor practices.
- Give the union and its representatives "reasonable access" to Stevens bulletin boards for a period of one year.

The NLRB, reviewing the record of Stevens' conduct since the TWUA began organizing Carolina plants in 1963, summed it up as follows:

The total of unfair labor practices committed by the company in this case and in a 1966 case, involving more than 20 Stevens plants, supports Trial Examiner Horace Ruckel's report of the "systematic, continued determination of this employer" to "destroy the union root and branch by discharging its most active members on any pretext which might come to hand, or could be invented."

In these two cases, the board declared, Stevens "unlawfully discharged 88 employes for their union activity and discriminated against four employes" because of their union affiliation by not permitting them to work overtime.

In addition, the NLRB said, Stevens unlawfully discharged seven employes for participating in NLRB proceedings; it interfered with employe rights by making "at least 30 threats of reprisal and promises of benefit to employes, by engaging in four acts of surveillance, by demanding on two occasions that employes remove union insignia, by posting threatening notices on its bulletin boards and by discriminating against union adherents in the application of a no-solicitation rule."

Record of Unlawfulness

This record, and that of earlier cases, the board noted, is "replete with examples of unlawful attempts by supervisors to wean individual employes away from the union or to prevent them from joining it."

These illegal attempts "involved interrogations, promises and threats that were most often followed by unlawful discharges of union members, carried out by these same supervisors" and reaching massive proportions, the board continued. This individual, face-to-face approach by supervisors was found to have a "greater psychological impact" upon employes than similar remarks made by an employer in a letter to all employes or in a speech to assembled workers.

The record also shows, the NLRB said, that Stevens "carried on a long campaign of illegal intimidation and unlawful discharge of those employes who were actively soliciting for the union."

The company's efforts to eliminate such employes, the board observed, were "largely successful."

In these circumstances, it concluded, a "simple cease and desist order will not suffice. Few if any union supporters are left. . . . The atmosphere of fear generated by illegal threats, interrogations and discharges undoubtedly will hinder lawful propaganda activities during non-working time on company premises."

Less Coercion

The NLRB order that Stevens must supply the union with all employe names and addresses will enable the TWUA to make known its views "in an atmosphere relatively free of restraint and coercion," the board concluded.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock pointed out recently that not one of the 103 Stevens workers fired by management since 1963 has been returned to his job and that the firm's "studied law violations" continue.

In February the AFL-CIO Executive Council directed Pres. George Meany to appoint a committee to meet with Pres. Johnson and seek "effective steps to end this national disgrace" of defiance of the nation's labor laws by government contractors.

There is nothing in the law now to compel government agencies like the Dept. of Defense to cooperate with the NLRB, Meany told a press conference in Bal Harbour, Fla., but this can be changed by a presidential order similar to the order on race discrimination and contracts.

Citing recent findings by NLRB Trial Examiner Boyd Leedom that continued law violations by Stevens stemmed from a calculated program at the top of the management structure, the council declared: "The continued award of government contracts to companies like this is intolerable."

ployes and to enjoin their application by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce does not include a power to regulate wage-hour conditions in locally situated facilities of a state or political subdivision, the state argued. It also cited the 10th Amendment restricting federal powers of specified subjects.

Twenty-three other states joined Maryland in its attack on the amendments. A constitutional decision by a three-judge court is subject to direct review by the Supreme Court.

States Challenged

The AFL-CIO, in its brief signed by General Counsel J. Albert Woll and Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris, challenged both the arguments of the states.

The courts have repeatedly held that the regulation of wages and hours may be applied to so-called "local" employers, including retailers and service industries, under the commerce clause, it was pointed out.

The brief also cited a declaration of policy in the wage-hour law holding that "labor conditions detrimental" to minimum standards "necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being" may spread and perpetuate such conditions in several states and lead to "labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce."

The intent of Congress, the citation of the policy declaration continued, was "to correct and as rapidly as practicable to eliminate" substandard conditions.

The brief further pointed out that Supreme Court decisions have established that "state activity as well as private activity which burdens or obstructs commerce may be regulated by Congress under the commerce clause."

In a case involving a state-owned railroad, the courts held that the federal Safety Appliance Act took precedence over California's safety regulations, and in another case ruled that the Railway Labor Act must displace state civil service regulations governing employes.

"We have been unable to find even a single intimation by the court which would suggest that state activities may not be governed by an otherwise valid congressional enactment" under the commerce clause, Woll and Harris said.

The government brief filed by the Labor Dept. and Dept. of Justice in reply to the Maryland suit pointed out that wage-hour coverage was extended to employes of public schools, hospitals and bus lines in the 1966 amendments by the specific removal of an exemption previously existing in the law.

The amendments extending wage-hour protection to employes of schools, hospitals and bus lines, whether publicly or privately owned, establish a minimum wage of $1 an hour the first year, rising in steps to $1.60 an hour the fifth year. Overtime pay of time and a half would be payable after 44 hours of work the first year, dropping to 42 hours and 40 hours the next two years.

Betty Furness New LBJ Aide On Consumers

Betty Furness, television and radio personality, has been named by Pres. Johnson as his special assistant for consumer affairs.

She succeeds Mrs. Esther Peterson, who will devote full time to her post as assistant secretary of labor. Miss Furness in addition will be chairman of the Committee on Consumer Interests and executive secretary of the Consumer Advisory Council.

The 51-year-old grandmother, a movie actress in the 1930s, became widely known for her commercials for Westinghouse Corp. products in the early days of TV. Lately she has had her own CBS radio show, "Ask Betty Furness."

Mrs. Petersen, a former legislative representative for the Clothing Workers, won warm praise from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and bitter attacks from industry for her zeal in promoting consumer interests.

80-Day Injunction Sought:

T-H Law Invoked In Shipyard Dispute

Pres. Johnson ordered the Justice Dept. to seek an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction sending back to work 1,300 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, on strike since Nov. 4 against 13 West Coast shipyards.

The President instructed the attorney general to seek the injunction in the U.S. District Court in San Francisco on the basis of an emergency board report on the issues in dispute, and an affidavit by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara that the strike was causing delays in the Viet Nam sea lift.

Board members were: Chairman J. Keith Mann, of the Stanford University law school; Pres. George E. Reedy, Jr., of the Struthers Research & Development Corp., former White House press secretary, and Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney.

An IBEW spokesman, disputing government claims that the strike imperils the national health and safety, said an injunction would only prolong the dispute for 80 days. He said union members nevertheless would obey a court order if one is issued at the President's request.

The union protested to the board that the shipyard strikers could not return to their jobs under contract terms formerly existing, as required in the usual injunction process, since the IBEW is striking for a first contract. The board referred the question to Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, which assigned Willoughby Abner, special assistant to the service's director, to meet with IBEW negotiators on the issue.

Some 400 of the strikers are working temporarily at "independent" shipyards whose operators have settled with the IBEW for a 57-cent hourly package of improvements but 900 others have been largely unemployed since the walkout began.

The union has signed up many independent operators but has been unable to get the major yards, represented in bargaining by the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association, to meet the strikers' minimum settlement terms, said a spokesman for IBEW Vice Pres. W. L. Vinson.

Association members have offered to settle for a pact providing wage hikes of 10 cents an hour for each of three years, plus welfare improvements.

Wages of shipyard electricians are "far below" those paid by non-shipyard employers, said the union. Navy shipyards are paying IBEW members 29 cents an hour more than private yards—a rate based on area wage standards, according to the same source.

"We want a coastwide agreement with the association based on today's prices, not those of 20 months ago," when other unions reached contract agreement, the IBEW said.

Charging that the intent of Taft-Hartley is "to put the weight of federal government pressure behind the employer," the union said the emergency procedures of the act were being invoked just as the strike was becoming effective.

State Job Service Hit For Rights Act Failures

Ohio's state employment service faces a possible cutoff of federal funds for failure to comply with the Civil Rights Act and with Labor Dept. non-discrimination regulations.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley H. Ruttenberg announced that he has recommended "appropriate action" against the Ohio agency to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. One possible action would be withdrawal of federal funds under Title VI of the civil rights law.

Ruttenberg said Labor Dept. investigations indicated that the Ohio Bureau of Unemployment Compensation:

- Made "no significant, purposive, or effective effort to ensure against its servicing employers who discriminate in their hiring practices on the basis of race."
- Continued "to consistently fill job orders from employers who restrict the hiring of Negroes to particular, usually menial, occupations —for example, the hiring by restaurants of Negroes for kitchen jobs but not as waitresses."
- Violated government record-keeping requirements.
- Coerced "state employes to disclose statements made by them in the course of the investigation."

The Labor Dept. released copies of correspondence over several months between Ruttenberg and Willard P. Dudley, administrator of the Ohio agency.

Ruttenberg detailed the corrective actions he thought the agency should take to make sure that the employers it services are following non-discrimination standards in hiring.

Dudley replied in effect that his agency was doing the best it could, disagreed with some of the Labor Dept. allegations and didn't have the staff to permit "100 percent compliance" with Ruttenberg's suggestions.

This reply was rejected by Ruttenberg as lacking "adequate and clear assurances" that corrective actions will be taken.

Meany Urges Labor Support For Red Cross

The Red Cross "merits our support as citizens and trade unionists," AFL-CIO Pres. Meany declared in a special report on the agency's activities and needs to the top officers of affiliated unions.

Meany is a member of the ARC board of governors and is vice chairman for labor for the 1967 Red Cross campaign for members and funds.

Total needs for the year, the report shows, are estimated at $118.8 million, the highest since World War II. Included is $47.4 million for services to the armed forces, veterans and their families, an increase of $8.4 million over the previous year because of expanded work in Viet Nam.

The first aid program, through which increasing numbers of union members are being trained, is earmarked for $6.7 million; the blood services program, which has strong labor support, is down for $17.2 million, and the minimum for disaster relief is given as $12.8 million.

AFL-CIO members give most of their contributions to the Red Cross through united appeals. However, some 1,800 of the 3,000 Red Cross chapters raise their funds in campaigns during March. Other chapters conduct educational and recruitment drives during the month, and seek blood donors and students for first aid programs.

LPIU Negotiates Fund For Early Retirements

An employer-financed plan providing for early retirement of members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers has been formally established by a 12-man joint union-employer board of trustees.

The LPIU Early Retirement Fund will make it possible for a covered member to retire at age 60 with the equivalent of full social security benefits which will continue until age 65, when he will receive retirement benefits from the government and from pension plans negotiated by the union.

The trustees announced that more than 21 percent of the LPIU's 52,000 members are now covered by bargaining agreements making them eligible for early retirement.

The union's objective, it said, is to make it possible in the next decade for a member to retire at age 60 and to receive up to 40 percent of his earnings to the age of 65.

LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown described the plan as one that "dovetails into our whole union approach for creating job security in a time of rapid technological development in our industry."

The plan was first negotiated in Chicago and Philadelphia and 10 additional locals have since won coverage in negotiations.

The plan is entirely financed by employers beginning with a one percent contribution of straight time earnings in the first year and growing to three per cent in the third year. The plan initially will have 12 trustees, six from the union and six from management.

St. John's Teachers Get Arbitration Bid

New York—Trustees of St. John's University have offered to arbitrate a dispute over the firing in December 1965 of 29 faculty members. The offer was announced by the university president at a press conference.

Pres. Israel Kugler of AFT College Teachers Local 1460, with 200 members on strike for more than a year in support of the fired teachers, called a week-end meeting to discuss the offer. A union spokesman called the proposal an encouraging "breakthrough" but said it was directed to individual teachers and not the union.

Anniversary Pickets

Union members picketed the university's new Jamaica, N.Y., campus Mar. 6, the second anniversary of the first walkout of 200 faculty members protesting the refusal of the administration to discuss faculty raises and pensions. St. John's—one of the nation's largest Catholic universities—has 12,200 students on its Jamaica and Brooklyn campuses.

Kugler said the union's latest offer to settle the dispute was rejected recently by the current university president, the Very Rev. Joseph T. Cahill of the Vincentian Fathers. The university has refused to recognize the union or meet with its leaders, one of whom is the Rev. Peter O'Reilly, a former St. John's teacher.

The American Association of University Professors officially censured the St. John's administration last spring for the firings. In December the Middle States Association of Colleges & Secondary Schools ordered St. John's to show cause by next Dec. 31 why its accreditation to give degrees should not be revoked.

The university now proposes to arbitrate this question: "Whether under all of the circumstances then prevailing the . . . trustees acted reasonably" in dismissing teachers or declining to renew their contract.

Trustees attached these conditions to their offer: hearings shall be conducted in private; each faculty member may be represented by counsel of his own choice; all pending litigation shall be withdrawn "with prejudice" and both sides shall be "protected against libel or slander" in connection with the hearings.

Father Cahill said the university pledges itself to abide by the decision of an impartial panel of arbiters.

Sound Service Aides Win Raise

New York—Sound service engineers in movie theaters throughout the United States get wage increases totaling $10 a week in two steps under a new contract negotiated by the Theatrical Stage Employes and the two major service companies, Altec and RCA.

The first step of $6 is retroactive to Jan. 2, and the remaining $4 is effective on Jan. 2, 1968, when the top straight-time salary becomes $190.43 a week. Meal allowances in connection with overtime were hiked from $1.50 to $2.

IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh said that following past custom, smaller companies in the industry are expected to sign contracts carrying identical terms.

GM Ordered To Bargain on Subcontracts

A three-judge U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington has ruled that General Motors Corp. must negotiate with the Auto Workers on subcontracting of work which has the effect of reducing the number of jobs held by UAW members.

The court unanimously overturned a National Labor Relations Board ruling in favor of General Motors.

GM had hired an outside firm to take over an operation at its South Gate, Calif., plant. The court said this took away the jobs of six UAW members.

"Though these men got similar jobs elsewhere in the plant, the change had an adverse impact on the bargaining unit since it diminished by six the number of jobs performed by its members," the decision said.

General Motors had refused to bargain on the subcontracting issue. It claimed in court that the so-called "management rights" clause in its union contract gave it the authority to revise operations at the factory.

A company spokesman said GM is considering a further appeal of the court ruling.

Make Old Age a Promise, Not a Peril...

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before the House Ways & Means Committee in support of the Administration's social security bill, which has been introduced by Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.). Following are excerpts from his testimony:

IT SEEMS TO US that H.R. 5710 offers a wide range of badly-needed improvements in social security benefits; and it offers a sound and equitable program for financing.

We can all agree, I think, that the benefit increases are long overdue. We can all agree, as well, on the reason for the delay. Over the last several years, the major objective of those who are deeply interested in social security was its extension to include medicare.

Now the time has come to return to fundamentals—the basic social security benefits.

Pres. Johnson has made a number of excellent proposals, which are incorporated into the bill. We believe the President's proposals are a long step toward the kind of social security system the American people should have.

This is most apparent when we consider the retirees—the elderly, who depend upon social security pensions for their support.

It is true, and it ought to be emphasized more strongly, that social security is not just an old folk's program.

It protects the widows and children of breadwinners who die. It protects the younger worker who is disabled, and those who have depended upon his earnings. These are vitally important safeguards that are too often overlooked, especially by the younger generation of workers, who need them most.

But the great majority of the 22 million Americans now dependent upon social security are elderly retirees. So let us look at their plight. It is a grim story.

THE AVERAGE monthly social security benefit for a single retired worker is about $84 a month—about $20 a week. The average benefit for a retired couple is about $144 a month or about $33.50 a week. For 2.5 million widows the average is only about $74 a month.

For millions of Americans these benefits, inadequate as they are, spell the difference between grinding poverty and at least subsistence living. Only 25 percent of the aged who now get social security benefits would be above the poverty level without them. In 1965, social security benefits lifted 5.5 million, or 38 percent of the aged, out of poverty; but they left 5 million, or 35 percent, below the poverty line.

What poverty line am I talking about? I mean the Social Security Administration's definition of poverty. According to that definition, a single worker isn't poor if he has an income of $1,500 a year. A couple isn't poor if they have $1,900 a year coming in. It seems to me that this is about as poor as you can get.

Now I understand that this poverty level is based on a Dept. of Agriculture "economy food plan," intended for "temporary or emergency use when funds are low." That "economy food plan" allows 22 cents a meal for each person. Imagine that—22 cents. And since they came up with this figure, living costs have risen over 5 percent. So the social security poverty standard today isn't even enough for a "temporary or emergency" period. Yet for millions, it is not temporary; it is permanent.

'It's in Everybody's Future'

Best Buy

In contrast, the Dept. of Labor budget for a minimum but adequate living for an elderly retired couple is about $3,000 a year in a large city and $2,500 in a smaller one. But even this is pitiful when you see what it provides. For example, it allows only about a half pound of meat and less than two eggs a day (and that's for two people); three dresses a year (including house dresses) for the wife; the man can replace his topcoat every ninth year.

For another comparison, let's look at the minimum wage. The $1.40 minimum wage which went into effect last month gives a full-time, year-round worker about $2,800. Next year he'll get $3,200 when the minimum goes to $1.60. Even this year, the worker at the minimum gets nearly three times the average social security benefit of a single retired worker and 60 percent more than a retired couple. Yet he's at the bottom of the scale; less than 15 percent of all workers get no more than the federal minimum wage.

During the 12 years from 1955 to 1966, inclusive, 90 percent of those who are now on the social security rolls began to draw their benefits. So when we use these 12 years as a base, we are including practically everyone who is now on the receiving end.

There have been two increases in social security cash benefits over these 12 years. There was a 7.5 percent increase in 1958 and a 7 percent increase in 1965.

But neither of these increases—or both of them together—kept pace with the cost of living, much less the general standard of living. The figures are beyond dispute.

And, of course, we are not concerned just with the purely arithmetical calculation, we are concerned with the broader principle that older Americans are entitled to do better than just keep pace with the cost of living in a society when the standard of living is steadily rising. The American standard of living has gone up almost 50 percent since 1954. Surely all of us have an obligation to do more for older people than merely to hold them at a static—and extremely low—level of living. Who is better entitled to share in the increased standard of living than our senior citizens, who did so much to make it possible?

Consider this contrast. Average wages have risen more than 55 percent since December 1954. That average beneficiary with $66.60 a month in 1954 and $76 now, would need 36.5 percent, or $103.76, to keep pace with average wages. The 1959 retiree now receiving $95.30 would need 18 percent more.

One of the bills this committee is considering provides for an increase in social security benefits of only 8 percent. Its inadequacy is appalling.

In contrast, the average 20 percent increase in social security benefits recommended by the President would have real significance. They would enable the elderly and others dependent on social security to begin to share in the fruits of the nation's economic advance. I said "begin to share," and that's what I mean. The AFL-CIO Convention in December 1965, and the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month pointed out that a fully adequate level of social security payments would require a boost of at least 50 percent in present payments. But we regard, and we hope the Congress will regard, the proposed 20 percent increase in benefits this year as a substantial down payment toward that goal.

WE HAVE REFERRED to the erosion of social security benefits by rising prices. We in the AFL-CIO would favor some suitable arrangement for preventing this erosion. We believe that such a provision could be included in the program without any additional financing. The Federal Employees Retirement System and the military retirement system already contain provisions that adjust benefits automatically in accordance with increases in the Consumer Price Index. We see no reason why social security beneficiaries should receive any less.

Introduction of a cost-of-living mechanism in the social security system would be a forward step, but we would emphasize that this alone does not guarantee benefits.

Social security beneficiaries have a right not just to keep from falling behind in the race with living costs but to participate in the nation's increased standard of living. Therefore, Congress should give consideration to effective means of keeping social security benefit levels in line with other incomes. One way to do this would be to provide for periodic adjustment at fairly frequent intervals of benefit levels to some appropriate measure of active workers' earnings.

ON THE WHOLE, we are most enthusiastic about the proposed increases in minimum benefits. Those at the minimum are the poorest of the poor, and they are therefore a shockingly large group. For example, of the million-plus new social security beneficiaries in 1964, 16 per cent were at the minimum. Some 2.5 million individuals now receive the minimum of $44 a month.

Farm workers, who are among the lowest paid workers in the nation, make up a large proportion of this minimum benefit group.

Though the purpose of a social security system is broader than the elimination of poverty, it can be used for this purpose to a much greater extent than in the past. Increasing the minimum benefits would be a major blow against poverty among the aged. We also endorse the higher minimum for those with long histories of contributions, so that the 25-year worker would get no less than $100 a month.

The increase of at least 15 percent for most beneficiaries would represent considerable progress, but we urge that this be only a first step toward the 50 percent goal I have stated.

As you well know, higher benefits must be paid for, one way or another.

The AFL-CIO has long felt that substantial benefit increases should be partially financed by raising the earnings base on which both contributions and benefits are determined. From the inception of the social security program, contributions have not been paid on all the earnings of workers, but in the early days they were paid on a very large proportion. The original $3,000 wage base covered 95 per cent of all taxable earnings. It is true that Congress has raised the wage base from time to time, but neither fast enough nor far enough.

This lag violates a cardinal principle of the American social insurance system of relating benefits to wages, and thus maintaining, to the greatest possible degree, established pre-retirement living standards. I might add that it also weakens the appeal of the social security concept to the younger, well-paid worker.

The Administration bill would increase the wage base in three steps to $10,800 by 1974. This is a long step toward what we believe is the proper goal—at present income levels—of $15,000.

The bill would also raise the contribution rate from 4.4 percent in 1969 to 4.5 percent, and change the present eventual maximum of 4.85 percent to 5 percent (excluding the medicare tax).

AFL-CIO MEMBERS are properly known for their willingness to pay for what they get, in war and peace. I am completely confident that they will gladly pay their share toward a better social security system.

But in all candor I think you should know that in time, we shall urge a modest and gradual contribution to the social security trust fund from the general revenues of the United States. We believe that would be an effective way—and a simple one—to introduce the principle of progressive taxation to the social security system. We are not asking for this now, so I will not argue the case for it. But we will be back.

Now let me deal briefly with the proposal to raise the allowable earnings of social security beneficiaries. In one sense we are sympathetic, since those who have unearned income don't have to count it at all. But on balance we are against the idea. If people who can support themselves draw social security benefits, there will be less money for those who can't. What is proposed in the bill is no cause for alarm, but we would oppose any drastic rise in the earnings allowance.

NOW AS TO MEDICARE. The AFL-CIO supports the provision in the bill for extending medicare coverage to the disabled. All the reasons for providing health insurance coverage for the aged apply equally to those who are disabled. They are a high-cost, high-risk group, living on reduced incomes. At the very time they experience a drastic reduction in income, they are faced with medical and hospital care expenditures far in excess of those confronting the rest of the population. The increase in the earnings base provided in the bill, which applies to medicare as well as the basic social security contributions, would more than meet the additional cost involved.

There have been many complaints from older workers concerning the financial problems posed by prescription drugs and eye examinations. The AFL-CIO feels that the cost of these items, so essential to the health of the elderly, should be covered within the medicare program.

Doctors who insist on direct billing are also causing problems for medicare patients. Many retirees are required to raise substantial amounts of money, often thousands of dollars, to pay a doctor so they can have a receipted bill to secure reimbursement. Even though the retiree will eventually be paid in full or in part, the interval causes resentment at best and hardship at worst.

We say the direct billing method is wrong and the assignment method should be the sole procedure for paying doctor bills. This would relieve medicare patients of the burden of raising large amounts of cash prior to reimbursement by the intermediary and would protect them from unreasonably high charges by doctors.

This is a forward-looking bill which would make substantial improvements in the social security system. But even its enactment will leave gaps that will need to be filled in the near future.

FOR INSTANCE, our members are increasingly faced with the hardships of enforced early retirement. We understand that more than half the men who apply for social security benefits do so before age 65. This means that their benefits are computed on an actuarially reduced basis, and this reduction is substantial.

We believe a flexible zone of retirement between 60 and 65 could be incorporated in the social security law—one that would permit retirement at age 60 with less than full actuarial reduction, and would allow older workers to draw disability benefits if their disability prevents them from doing their usual work—provided of course, such changes were accompanied by a substantial increase in benefits.

We would also like to see improvements in the basic disability insurance provisions. Disability benefits are not paid unless total disability lasts six months and only if the disability is expected to result in death or last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months. This long waiting period means that large numbers of workers, though disabled for extended periods of time, are without either earnings or benefits just at the time when their expenses are highest. The disability provisions should be changed to allow benefits after a shorter period of total disability—as a first step, three months, but eventually, one month—and without regard to the expected duration of the disability.

This year's gains should be regarded only as a down-payment toward a much better Social Security system in the future.

NOW LET US TURN to a related field, also covered in the bill—public welfare.

Most poor people—78 percent, in fact—get no public assistance whatever. And again I am referring to those who are "poor" by the Social Security Administration's definition, which, to me sounds more like destitution.

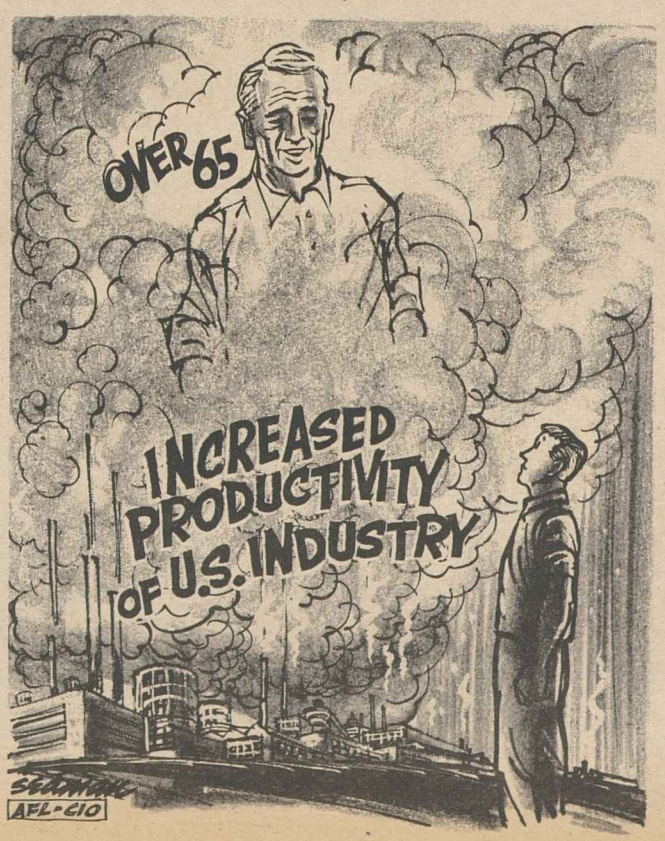
The main reason why so few people get public assistance is that less than half of the poor fall into the four narrow, artificial categories that now prevail: the needy aged, the blind, the permanently and totally disabled and certain needy families with dependent children. These are the categories for which federal matching grants for public assistance are available.

Besides the limited categories, there are other reasons why public assistance helps only a small fraction of the poor. Some states lack the money—or the will—to participate in all the available federal programs. Some states impose limitations and restrictions not required by federal law. And assistance standards in some states are so low that they exclude many persons who are below the state's own minimum needs standard and far below the poverty level—any sort of poverty level.

The President has recommended, and the bill requires, the states to raise cash payment to welfare recipients to the level the state itself sets as the minimum for subsistence; and it requires the states to bring these minimum standards up to date annually. We endorse this proposal.

We also support the bill's extension of aid to families with dependent children. But we strongly urge that this program, now voluntarily with the states, be made mandatory, and that the so-called "man in the house rule" be immediately eliminated wherever it is in effect.

'I Did My Part'



It All Adds Up

Adult recipients of these family benefits often lose welfare payments dollar-for-dollar, because of the money they earn when they are able to find work. This is a senseless penalty which destroys employment incentives. As the bill recognizes, earnings should be permitted up to some reasonable amount before welfare payments are reduced.

WE WARMLY SUPPORT the provision in the bill for temporary assistance to migratory workers and to others who come into a state seeking employment, who are ineligible for public assistance because of state residence requirements.

Other improvements are needed. Minimum standards should be required in housing occupied by public welfare recipients, the rents of which are paid from public funds. Public welfare should stop subsidizing slum housing.

Aid to the permanently and totally disabled should be extended to the relatively short-term disabled, recognizing partial disability which is seriously incapacitating and eliminating the present minimum age of 18.

Detailed investigations of public assistance applicants and recipients are essentially demeaning. They should be replaced by less costly and more democratic methods of determining eligibility. These should be consistent with constitutional and statutory rights, and should not violate the privacy or dignity of individuals seeking assistance.

Child welfare programs should be extended and improved. Better services are needed for the care and protection of children, including foster care, day care and institutional services.

FINALLY, LET ME INCLUDE in the record these paragraphs from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement adopted on Feb. 20:

"The general objectives of the President's proposals for revision of the tax structure for the elderly are based on the fact that the present structure is both unduly complex and lacking in equity.

"However, we find one major fault in the particular mechanism the Administration has proposed for achieving these objectives. We particularly oppose the aspects of the Administration's recommendations which involve taxation of social security and railroad retirement benefits.

"Social security payments under federal programs have always been tax exempt while the incomes on which contributions to the social insurance funds have been based have been subject to tax. This should continue to be the guiding principle."

The matter at issue is both complex and important.

Social security, in the broadest sense, represents the striving of mankind for a better world; a world in which old age is a promise instead of a peril, in which illness or premature death are personal tragedies rather than family catastrophes.

There is a long way to go before this nation, much less the world, reaches these goals, and the bill before you falls far short of them.

Yet the goals are important. They are important because if we stop striving for them, if we settle for a comfortable version of things as they are, the American spirit will be dead indeed.

I know it is not dead, and, Mr. Chairman, so do you.

The Exceptions

THE EMPLOYER who is willing to scrap his authoritarian—or, at best, paternalistic—role and accept employes as free human beings, with all the dignity that term implies, has the most to gain, and gains the most, from collective bargaining. Recognition of that fact by many employers is a great accomplishment of the National Labor Relations Act.

For our part, we in the labor movement can be proud of our record in observing the onerous restrictions of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts. Seven separate types of "unfair labor practices," some with numerous subdivisions, are forbidden to unions; while employers must follow only five simple mandates. The clear assumption seems to be that unions are more apt to go wrong. Yet in 1966 only 18 percent of all unfair labor practice complaints were issued against labor organizations.

Those who blandly insist that "labor is accepted today"—and they are usually people who want us to roll over and play dead—ought to look at the exceptions.

Let me give you two examples. One arises from a fault in the the law. The other arises from the primitive behavior of a certain kind of corporate management.

The first has to do with agricultural workers. Today the farm worker is encountering all the techniques of jungle warfare from which most workers have long been protected by the Wagner Act. That such circumstances should exist in the wealthiest country in the world—and in some of the richest states of that country—is a national disgrace.

The farm worker does not ask for charity or special privilege. All he seeks is that the national labor policy, applied to all other industries, be applied to him as well. All he asks is that the machinery established by Congress, to resolve labor-management problems and settle any question of representation, be made available to him.

THE SECOND EXAMPLE relates to the continuing, calculated and concerted violation of the National Labor Relations Act by certain employers and groups of employers, including some very large corporations.

This deliberate law-breaking is primarily identified with the South, particularly the southern textile industry. But it can be found in other sections, too.

The behavior of these employers accounts for the fact that nearly two-thirds of the unfair labor practice charges filed against employers in fiscal 1966 involved the discharge of workers for union activity.

This not only indicates a widespread disregard for the law. It also reveals a total lack of humane regard for workers and their families.

I am not talking about the legal resistance of employers to union organization. We think even the legal resistance is short-sighted, but we acknowledge the constitutional right of employers to be foolish.

What I am talking about is the defiance of law, right down to the perjury level. One remedy would be more adequate penalties on the deliberate law breakers. The NLRB has been moving in this direction, even under the present statute, and we hope it will move farther.

Meanwhile, much could be accomplished if employers who have accepted unionism and collective bargaining would actively and publicly disassociate themselves from those who flout the law.

Executive Council Statement:

Labor Warns Against Retreat In Nation's Battle on Poverty

The following is excerpted from the statement, "The War on Poverty," adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Feb. 26, 1967, at its meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE AFL-CIO is deeply committed to our nation's efforts to eradicate poverty. When Pres. Johnson first called for "an unconditional war, here and now, on poverty," he struck a deep response from the labor movement. Organized labor, since its birth, has sought to eliminate poverty through trade union organization, collective bargaining, and social legislation.

We have supported, and continue to support, programs aimed at helping the poor move from the hopelessness and despair of poverty toward a sharing of America's general prosperity. The AFL-CIO has long recognized that such programs essentially must be based on:

1. Job opportunities, at decent wages, for the millions of impoverished who are able to work and seek employment.

2. Adequate social security benefits for the aged who are retired.

3. Adequate income maintenance, through a much-improved and overall system of public assistance, for those additional impoverished millions who are not self-sustaining, due to the absence of the family breadwinner, disability or other causes.

The road out of poverty requires full and fair opportunities for education and vocational training, decent housing, effective enforcement of civil rights, and adequate social service assistance. The eventual elimination of poverty, however, must emphasize jobs, income and upgrading as its foundation.

Many essential measures have been enacted by Congress, since 1961, that are parts of the anti-poverty effort—including civil rights legislation, substantial improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act, federal aid to general and vocational education, model cities legislation, and the Economic Opportunity Act. The AFL-CIO was a major force in seeking adoption of all these advances.

The Economic Opportunity Act—with its broad attack on the causes and continuation of poverty—is a vital part of the overall effort to break the poverty cycle.

Organized labor has not only given moral support to this program, but it has been involved at all levels. Today, hundreds of AFL-CIO members serve on community action boards and committees. In addition, AFL-CIO unions have assumed active sponsorship of anti-poverty programs.

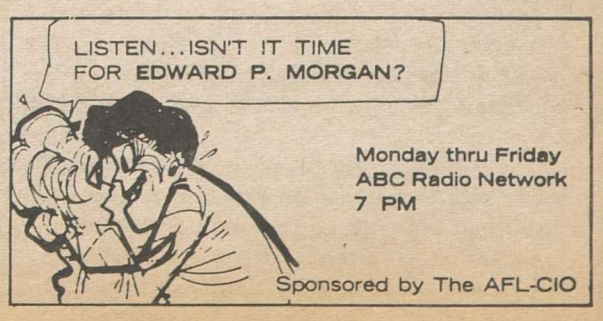
Such efforts by organized labor should be expanded in the thousands of communities across the length and breadth of our country—translating AFL-CIO supported national legislation into reality in local communities.

WE REPUDIATE the attacks on the war on poverty aimed at crippling or destroying the entire program. We likewise reject the attempt to erect a mythology that America cannot afford to wage an effective war on poverty.

The AFL-CIO remains convinced that our country has the material resources and human talents to meet both its international requirements and its homefront needs. A retreat now—through a failure to appropriate adequate funds to carry the war on poverty forward—will dash the hopes of those millions of Americans who have yet to rise out of poverty and who are still denied full and equal opportunities.

Recent proposals to involve the business community more directly in the war on poverty, along with others, are highly commendable. The normal functions of business enterprises, as well as the managerial and technical abilities of industry, have their vital and proper roles in the nation's effort to eliminate poverty.

It is our conviction, however, that no segment of our society should seek to profit from the special services it renders to the war on poverty program. We are opposed to the proposal of a federal charter for a profit-making, war-on-poverty company. We view with skepticism and misgiving other proposals for profit-making business ventures in Office of Economic Opportunity and related programs.



Morgan Says:

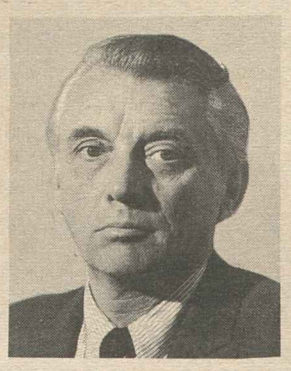
New City School Textbooks Tie Reading to Reality of Urban Life

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

WHEN VICE PRES. HUMPHREY was still senator from Minnesota he made a dramatic speech on the floor of the Senate about the disreputable quality of the textbooks in the District of Columbia public schools.

He held one up and it disintegrated in his hand. He noted that the content of many of these volumes was as worn out as their physical condition. In the resultant flurry of protest some improvements were made but in proportion to the problem they were microscopic.



Morgan

The issue has emerged again and it should be studied just as carefully as the inequities in the draft, for basically an inferior school book is just as unfair. But school boards, whether in the nation's capital or across the country, seem to have the idea, with rare exceptions, that reading texts, for example, should carry words and pictures that are a bland but golden-tinted reflection of middle class American life.

For poor children, for children of racial minorities, these lessons are nearer to never-never land than if they were reading the Wizard of Oz. There is nothing for them to relate to.

After years of rubber-stamping the selections of a committee, Washington's Board of Education, a court-appointed body already under fire for its antiquated ways, has begun to examine the books and raise some questions of how appropriate and effective they may be for children in the public schools, 92 percent of whom are Negro and a large number from homes of the poor.

After reading several texts, Board Member John A. Sessions told the Washington Post that most of the elementary readers are "filled with trivia and banalities, unrelated to the significant concerns even of middle-class children, let alone the concerns of the inner city children who constitute a major portion of the District school population."

The board approved this year's textbook list anyway.

There is something more serious than trivia and banality built into lessons. In many schools, vital things are being left out, including science lessons with some awareness of nuclear power and the space age. Some District history textbooks, the Post found, were printed in 1941, even though 1960 and '61 editions were available.

The sociological omissions here may be critical. A history book produced in 1941 would not only have nothing about U.S. participation in World War II, Korea and other such trifling events, but would be blank on the civil rights revolution that began in 1954.

Some educators and publishers are beginning to close this negligence gap. Some efforts have been patently ridiculous. But some bold and encouraging experiments are being made with elementary readers for city kids from low-income families.

MRS. CHARLES BROWN of St. Louis has produced some reading lessons that should be a joy to study. Several stories were prompted by actual experiences. Some are based on classroom situations. There is one called "Who Cares" about a rejected boy named Charles. He wears his older brother's hand-me-down jacket and the sleeves were too long. But one day a music competition comes to the classroom and Charles suddenly finds something that turns him on.

Mrs. Brown thinks "children ought to have a chance to experience real problems with the youngsters in the readers and the story should lead them to solutions to problems they may have in their own lives." The illustrations, of recognizable urban scenes, incorporate story clues and are tightly woven to the text.

Actually the problems she poses, being recognizable, are helping children learn to read faster. "Who Cares" is the third book in a series published by McGraw-Hill. It is commanding attention in school systems outside poverty or deprived areas.

So is another called "The Bank Street Reader" published by Macmillan and developed by instructors and students at Bank Street College in New York. It, too, makes the child aware that what he is reading has something to do with life.

It's time that everybody, educators included, realized that life has something to do with reading.

Seen Possible Key:

Wide Public Support Spurred To Win Social Security Hikes

WIDE GRASSROOTS support for the Administration's social security improvement proposals could be the key to their enactment, an AFL-CIO spokesman observed in a network radio interview.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, noted that the mobilization of such support is the object of a major drive undertaken by the federation.

Social security, Seidman said, "has always been a popular program both on Capitol Hill and in the country at large." If people will tell their congressmen that they are in favor of the President's proposals, "the chances of congressional approval this year will be enhanced," he added. His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Seidman called attention to the series of rallies being sponsored by the AFL-CIO across the country to help promote Pres. Johnson's social security improvement plan. Most of the rallies are scheduled for Sunday, Mar. 12.

He said that civil rights and minority groups, church organizations, senior citizens clubs and others who have "worked in their own communities for better education and for social welfare" are cooperating in the rally effort. He added that support from organizations like these will give a big boost to "advancing the cause on Capitol Hill."

SEIDMAN SAID that the over-all 20 percent increase in benefits urged by the President is not "the end of the road by any means," but it would do more than "just catch up with the lag that has occurred as a result of the increase in the cost of living."

"It would provide, at least to some extent, a higher standard of living for people on social security," he said.

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced program were Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers, and Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

New Schedule

Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program heard weekly over the Mutual Radio Network for the past five years, will now be carried on the nationwide network on Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST.

The new schedule is designed to enable more of Mutual's 520 affiliates to carry the program. Local radio schedules should be consulted for exact time of broadcast.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES involved in the State of Maryland's suit designed to save itself (and 23 other states which have joined the action) from the federal wage-hour law will be decided, of course, by the federal courts. The moral issue is something else.

From the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938 until the 1966 amendments, there has been a blanket exemption of applicability to federal employes and employes of the states or political subdivisions of states.

Congress decided last year to modify this exemption so that workers in state hospitals, schools, "institutions," railway or bus lines would be specifically brought under the umbrella of wage-hour protection.

Not all such workers, of course, for administrators, teachers and professionals are still exempted. The applicability, therefore, is confined to workers in more humble jobs related to the schools or the care of the mentally ill or physically handicapped.

As is its familiar custom, Congress in blanketing new groups of workers proceeded with deliberate care. The minimum wage established for the first year was $1 an hour (40 cents lower than that for previously covered workers in private industry); the requirement for time and a half overtime pay would apply only after 44 hours a week (four hours more than for workers in private industry).

The states would be given five years to come up to the $1.60 cent level that will become the minimum hourly wage for most workers in private industry on Feb. 1, 1968, and three years to prepare themselves for overtime rates after 40 hours a week.

A decision by Congress to remove a long-standing exemption in wage-hour law coverage has an obvious explanation: the lawmakers were persuaded that a substantial number of states were falling short of paying adequate wages and overtime to a substantial number of workers hired in their schools, hospitals, "institutions," railways and bus lines.

A wage of $1 an hour for a 40-hour week would mean annual income of no more than $2,080 even assuming a paid two-week vacation period. A $1-an-hour wage for a 50-hour workweek, without overtime, would mean no more than $2,600 a year.

Both figures are seriously below the theoretical "poverty line" cutoff level of about $3,000 for a family; the $2,080 figure is grossly below it. Even when the states, in the fifth year of coverage, are required to pay a minimum of $1.60 an hour, the yearly pay will be only $3,328.

THE SOVEREIGN STATES ought to have been able to do better than this for employes in the more humble tasks in their schools, hospitals, "institutions," railways and bus lines.

The moral obligations of the states as employers are no different from the obligations of any other employers. The wage-hour law since the time of its enactment has declared that it is contrary to federal policy for workers to pursue their tasks under "conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standards of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being."

For 29 years this policy declaration has remained on the statute books. Congress has raised the statutory minimum wage from 40 cents an hour to 75 cents to $1 to $1.25 and now, in two steps, to $1.40 and $1.60. Congress in 1961 broadened coverage so as to afford protection to some 4 million workers previously without it, and last year amended the law again to afford protection to some 7.2 million additional workers.

The concept of a floor beneath wages and a ceiling over hours is thoroughly embedded in federal statutes and practice. Yet the states, instead of acting on their own to protect the "health, efficiency and general well-being" of many of their own employes, waited until Congress decided to do it for them.

A good many states, of course, have been negligent about minimum wage laws for strictly local private enterprises. Those who speak over-quickly about "states' rights" might nevertheless consider their responsibility in setting an example.

DETAILS of labor's nationwide drive to enlist grassroots support for the Administration's social security improvement program were reported by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman (center) on Labor News Conference. Sam Sharkey (left) of the Newhouse Newspapers and Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard questioned Seidman on the public affairs interview, now heard at 7:35 p.m. Tuesdays over the Mutual Radio Network.

How to Buy:

3-Way Choice on Deductions Offers Chance for Tax Savings

By Sidney Margolius

LET'S LEARN ALL we can about taxes. Otherwise people who work for wages, and have their taxes deducted right from pay, are at a serious disadvantage. They don't have access to all the loopholes the laws make possible for executives, businessmen and investors.

Congress long has been urged to close these loopholes, but has done little about it. Thus, you do need to at least know all the tax savers which can apply to your situation. You also need to take the trouble to "try out" your tax return on the long form as well as the short form, to see which results in a lower tax.

It is not possible to tell about all the tax-saving possibilities here. We are going to discuss some of the more important ones wage-earners may tend to overlook. There are many moderate-price books available which provide detailed information, including the government's own "Your Federal Income Tax," 50 cents from the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D.C., or local Internal Revenue offices. Some of the "tax guides" on the market are merely copies of the government book but at higher prices.

Choice of deduction methods: you have a choice of (1) itemizing deductions; (2) an allowance of 10 percent of your adjusted gross income, or (3) a minimum standard deduction, which allows you $200 plus $100 for each exemption.

For example, a couple with three children and adjusted gross income of $6,500, would first add up their potential deductions for charity, medical, and so on. They find that these total, say, $750. Obviously, it would be better for them to itemize than take the 10 percent allowance which would allow them only $650.

Working children: if your child has worked part-time, make sure he files a return to get a refund of taxes he paid. (An individual is not liable for any taxes if he does not earn over $900 for the year, but does have to file a return for earnings of $600 or over.) He escapes taxes until the over-$900 level because he not only gets $600 exemption for himself, but can take the minimum standard deduction for himself of $200 plus $100.

The helpful part is that even though your dependent child claims himself as an exemption on his return, you too can claim him as long as he is under 19 or a full-time student, provided you do furnish more than half his support. Dependency exemptions: You can take a dependency exemption for yourself, wife, and each of your qualified dependents.

SOCIAL SECURITY, Railroad Retirement, V.A. pensions and similar benefits received by close relatives you support are not taxable income, and are not counted in the $600 limitation. But they are evidence of income which the dependent could use for his own support.

If the dependent owns his own home, you also have to take into account a fair rental value of the home as part of his contribution towards his own support. But if you provide the lodging, you can include the dependent's share of your rent or home expenses, including utilities, as part of your contribution (as well as his or her food; clothing; medical and dental bills and health insurance; entertainment; contributions; transportation; and personal care such as barber, toiletries, etc.)

When two or more persons, each of whom otherwise could claim the exemption, jointly provide over half the support, but none over half, one can claim the exemption. But taxpayers in this situation sometimes get into trouble with the revenue service because they fail to file the required statements from the others who contribute that they will not claim the exemption for that year.

Even if you cannot claim a dependent as an exemption because he had too much taxable income, you can include in your own medical deductions any medical bills you pay on his behalf, as long as you do provide more than half his total living expense. Thus, it is better to pay medical expenses for a dependent you help support but cannot claim, than to give him or her the same amount in cash.

LBJ Asks Increase In Job Health Funds

PRES. JOHNSON HAS PUT WHEELS in motion to meet the problem of injuries on the job.

In his message to Congress on education and health he announced two attacks on the problem:

- He is recommending in the 1968 budget an appropriation of $8.1 million—a 25 percent increase over this year—to expand research and training programs in occupational health and to strengthen state and local public health programs in this field.

- He is directing the secretary of labor "to improve and strengthen health protection and safety standards for workers through cooperative federal-state programs."

"We must learn more about the nature of job-connected injuries," the President said, "so we can set effective safety standards and develop better protective measures."

And to stress the urgency of action, Johnson painted this picture:

"In 1965, more than 14,000 job-connected deaths and 2 million disabling work injuries caused untold misery and privation to workers, 230 million lost man-days of production and billions of dollars in lost income."

Modern industry has provided the nation unmatched prosperity, it is generally agreed, but a by-product of this are the new hazards for the worker in terms of dangerous substances, machinery and situation.

These hazards may range in health conditions from skin diseases to cancer. More than seven million people work in noisy jobs which can damage hearing. Nearly 100,000 Appalachian coal miners suffer a disabling chest disease caused by their work. Four million other workers in manufacturing, construction and automotive repair industries work under conditions either immediately dangerous to their health or hazardous enough to require continual inspection.

Yet, it is estimated that 80 percent of the nation's workers are employed in places where no type of health service is provided, The protection given the remainder ranges from excellent to minimal.

TOO FEW PEOPLE today really understand the extent of health problems on the job, says Dr. Murray C. Brown, chief of the Division of Occupational Health of the U.S. Public Health Service:

"The average layman—asked to give his version of what constitutes occupational health hazards—is more than likely to reply that it has something to do with mining; or with high voltage wires; or involves those strong-nerved workers who rivet skyscraper girders or build towering dams.

"All of these, of course, are hazardous occupations. But they are occupations accepted as such and the man in the street is apt to regard the practitioners of those activities with a sense of awe and remark, in passing, that there are certainly some curious ways people earn a living."

Brown points out that even simple office jobs now often mean danger.

"Exposure to chemical agents," he says, "which may prove harmful to workers can be classified under dusts, fumes, mists, vapors and gases."

Brown notes that a worker may work at a job many years without realizing that he is soaking up poisons in his system. He suddenly develops a sensitivity to the same material he has been handling, without trouble, for a long period of time.

"He must give up his job," he says, "the seniority he has accumulated, the skills he has learned—all of which results in a terrible loss to the individual concerned and to the employer losing the valuable services of a worker with proven experience on the job." (PAI).

From Soup to Nonsense:

Feeding Leftovers to Freezer Keeps Family from Rebellion

By Jane Goodsell

I ONCE OVERHEARD a lady in a grocery store tell another lady that she loved having leftovers around because they made cooking so much simpler. I couldn't have been more surprised if she'd pronounced herself in favor of industrial smog or migraine headaches which rate, on my scale of values, only slightly below leftovers.

I happen to be an authority on the subject of leftovers because my mother taught me (as her mother taught her) that (a) one should always cook more than enough to eat; and (b) that it is a sin to throw food away. Clearly, this philosophy leads to a lot of leftovers.

Just as clearly, that lady must have had in mind a different type of leftovers than those we stockpile at our house.

Surely that lady couldn't have had in mind those little icebox dishes, filled two-thirds full of table scraps. A housewife who can take a hunk of leftover pot roast and combine it with half a cup of creamed corn, a few spoonsful of stewed tomatoes, a handful of green beans, a third of a cup of scalloped potatoes, a dab of salmon loaf and two stalks of cooked broccoli—and make a nourishing casserole that her family will eat—either has magical powers or a family with malfunctioning taste buds.

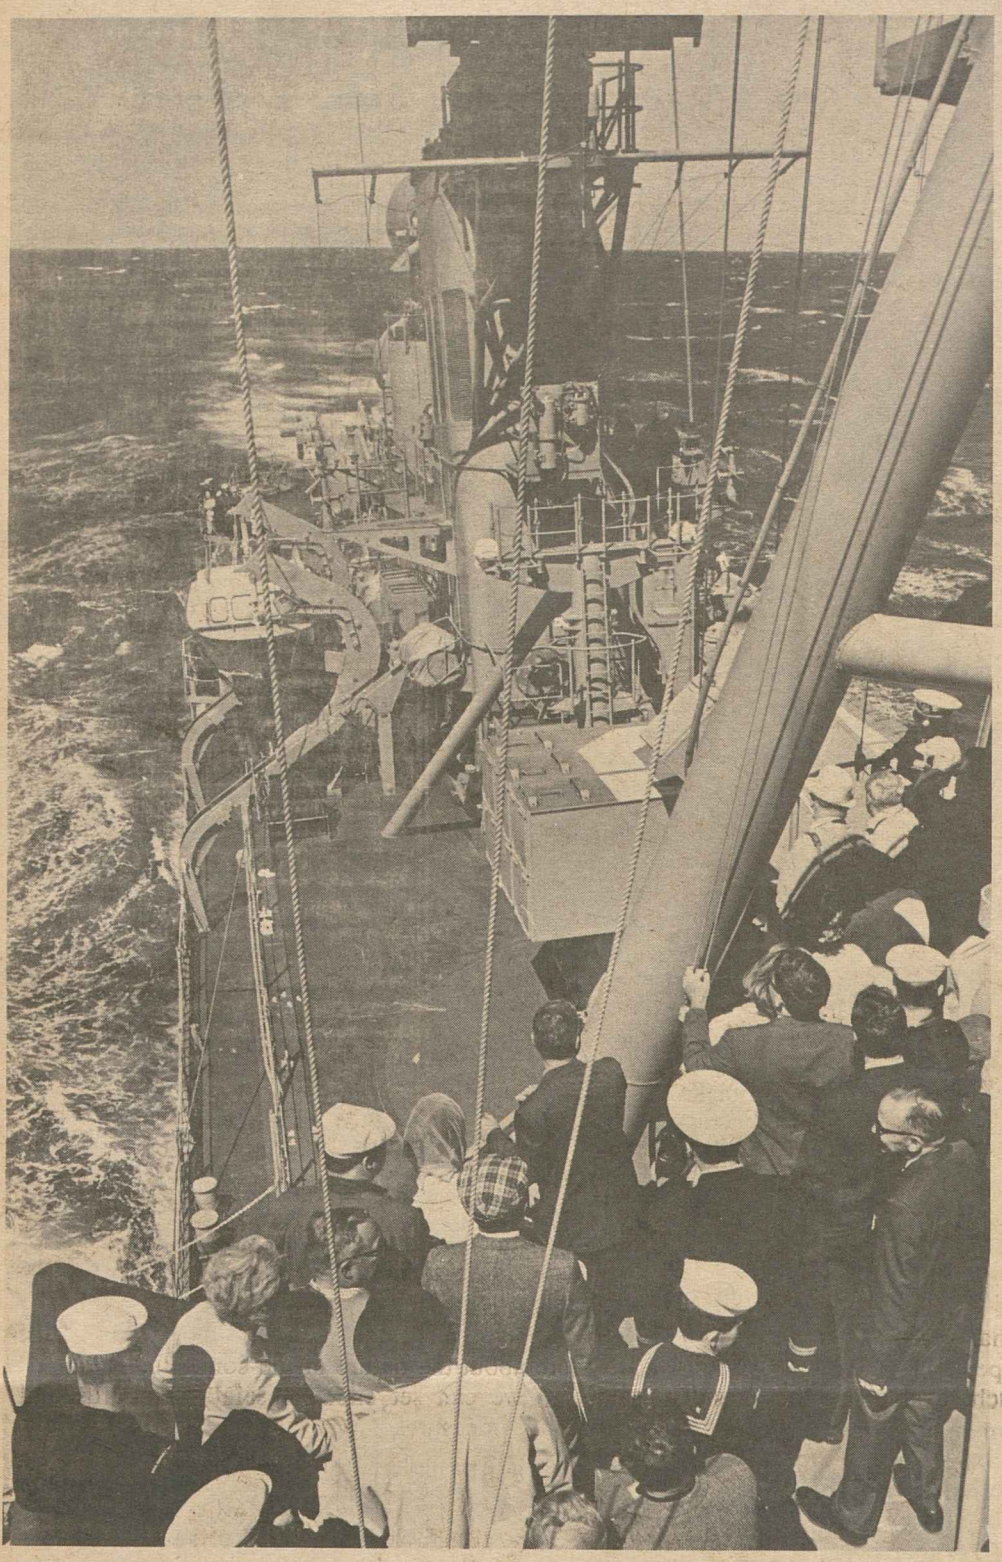
My own method of dealing with those depressing dibs and dabs is to shove them into the refrigerator and leave them there until they turn to penicillin—and then throw them out. I feel remorseful, but what else can I do?

BUT NOW ALL these distressing dilemmas are a thing of the past. I have found salvation (and come to think of it, I'll bet that lady had, too) in a freezer. Actually, I think of the freezer as another mouth to feed—one with a huge appetite and an uncritical palate on whom I can palm off the reject that nobody else will touch. That freezer is a joy to cook for. It never turns up its nose at anything.

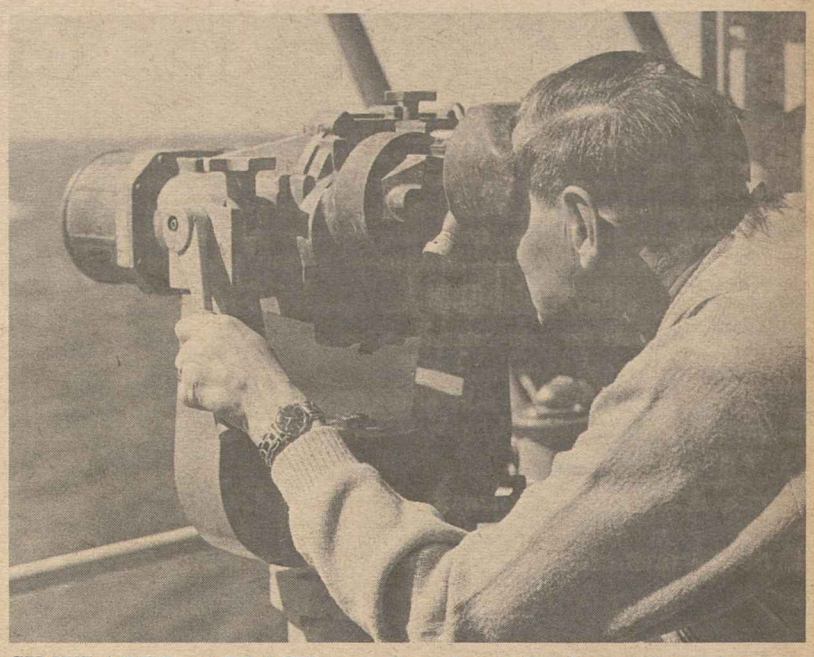
Whatever I don't know what else to do with, I stuff into the freezer, which accepts it without a word of complaint. The ham bone which will make a nice split pea soup some day but not, thank heaven, this week. The five fruit cakes we got for Christmas. The trick'r treat candy left over from Halloween. The chocolate marshmallow Easter bunnies that usually kick around the house for months after Easter. The banana bread that was beginning to get stale. They've all disappeared into the freezer, gone like the snows of yesteryear.

Well, maybe they're not gone exactly, but they're forgotten. I have no idea whether all these things freeze successfully, but who cares? My conscience is clean and so is my refrigerator.

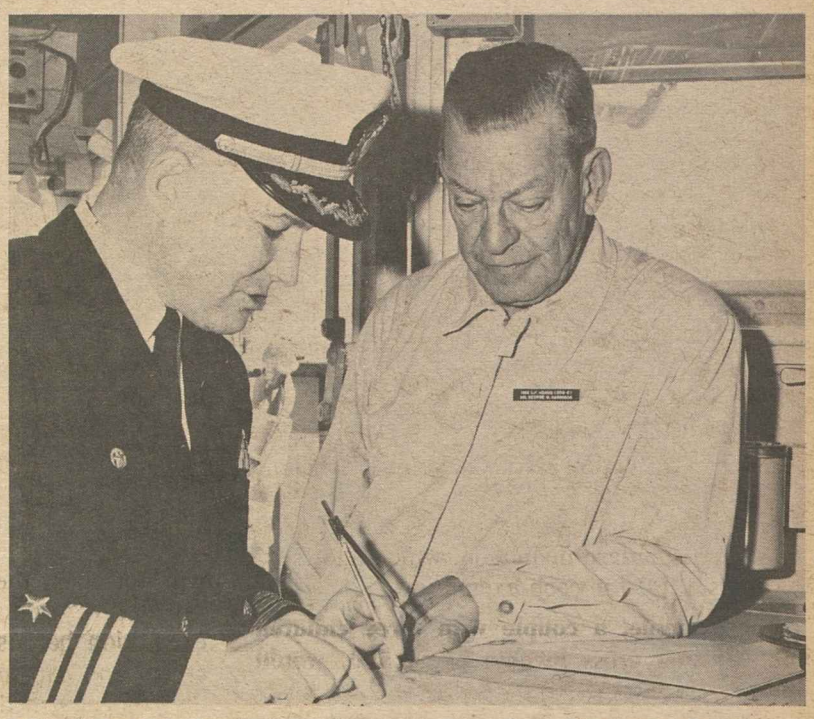
Navy Shows Missiles to Union Leaders



DEMONSTRATIONS of anti-submarine and anti-air missile warfare weapons were given for AFL-CIO leaders aboard the guided missile destroyer Charles F. Adams off the Florida coast. Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler led the unionists.



SIMULATED ATTACK on the destroyer by a jet plane is tracked by Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks. Executive Council members broke their midwinter meeting for the trip.



MYSTERIES of navigation were explained to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison (right) by Cdr. Roy F. Hoffmann, skipper of the Adams. The ship is a unit of Missile Destroyer Division 62.

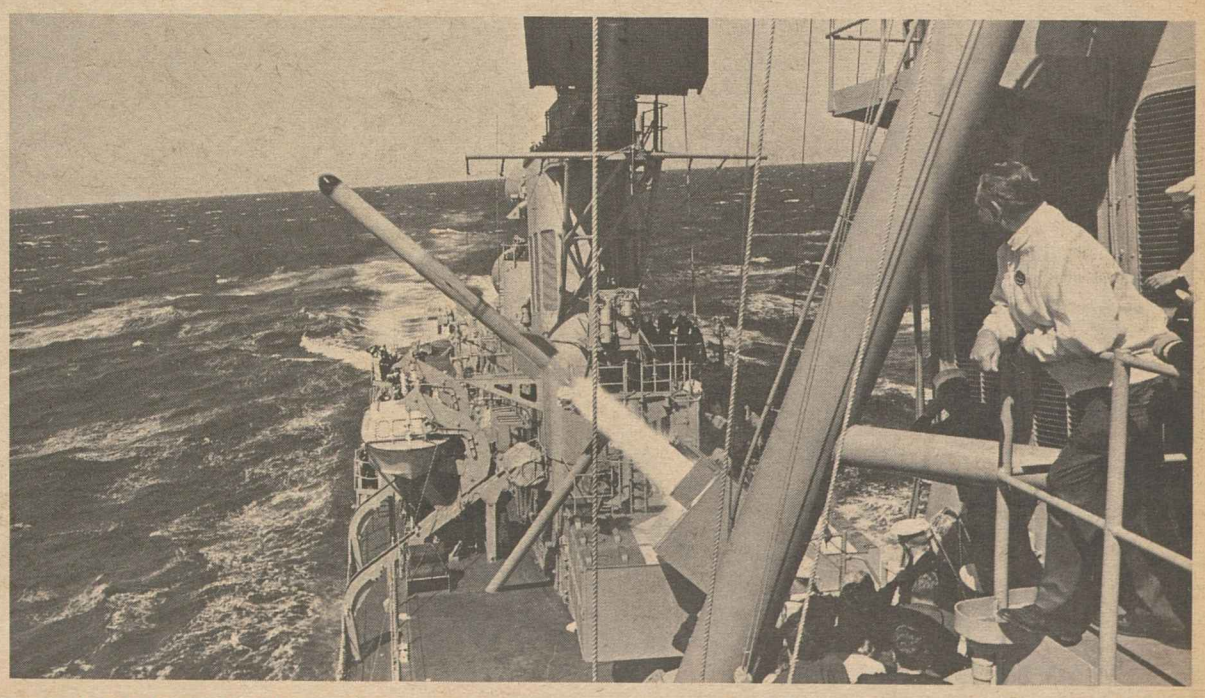
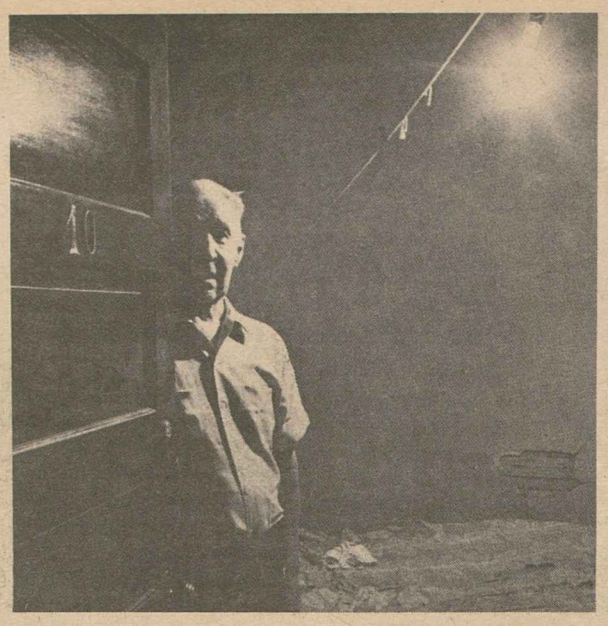
CONVERSATIONS between union leaders and members of the Adams' crew were many, and here AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton exchanges a few words with a couple of the bluejackets.



TARTAR MISSILE SYSTEM, a surface-to-air weapon, was fired for the union officials as part of the day-long demonstration. Schnitzler is at top right, other AFL-CIO aides on deck below. The visitors also saw the destroyer's sonar control room and the combat information center.



WELFARE PROGRAMS are so under-financed that only 22 percent of the poorest and most underprivileged can get even the sub-minimum maintenance and inadequate social services the wealthiest country in the world provides. The children of the poorest and the poorest of the elderly suffer most.

Better Solution Seen Essential To Problem of Grinding Poverty

Recent social legislation, geared to the future, will do little or nothing to help 30 million Americans who haven't enough money now to live decently, U.S. Commissioner of Welfare Ellen Winston writes in the current American Federationist.

However, she states, the enactments are "beginnings" from which the nation can move forward in its search for answers to the problems that confront it.

And she sees encouragement in the major recommendations of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare, which reported to the secretary of health, education and welfare last June after two years of inquiry into all phases of public assistance.

The council's proposals, she writes in a detailed discussion of "Americans in Need," are addressed "to the dual problem of failure to reach all the poor people, including those who cannot earn their way out of poverty, and of undergirding present efforts by adding the element of immediate present gain."

Dr. Winston notes that the poor, as repeated studies have shown, are "present-oriented." She continues:.

"Life has taught them to take each day as it comes because tomorrow may be worse and even the soundest programs seem to have a pie-in-the-sky quality when they include no tangible element of present gain.

Ground Down

"Moreover, the grinding poverty in which the poor live affects their ability to participate in community improvement programs, in study and training projects. It even affects their interest in using health resources, social services, legal aids and other measures that would alleviate some of their immediate problems.

"The struggle for mere physical survival is too all-absorbing to leave room for anything else."

The "poorest of the poor" who get most of their income from public assistance are undernourished, poorly-housed, have so few dishes that families can't eat a meal together, use packing boxes for furniture, lack blankets and haven't an iron to press what clothes they own, Dr. Winston points out.

But they seem "well aware" that life for the majority of Americans is "very different."

"The poor live in a society where jobs are plentiful, where there is, in fact, a serious labor shortage," she writes. "But the shortage is for highly skilled technical and professional personnel. And what do the poor have to offer?"

Today's adults, Dr. Winston writes, include 23 million men and women who never finished grade school and nearly 3 million who never went to school at all.

"Some are too old to work," she says, "some are able to earn despite this handicap, but even if work training programs are expanded to reach all the rest—and we are far from that goal — can they be equipped for the jobs the present economy needs to fill? How fast can an illiterate master a job that will pay enough to support a large family of children? How much training can he absorb when he must concentrate his thought and energy on the problems of day-to-day survival?"

Up to now, she goes on, efforts to relieve the situation have been "primarily remedial," dealing with social problems after they have occurred. But this isn't enough, she maintains, and the country must "create the conditions that prevent social pathology" just as it has developed preventive medicine.

Economic and business institutions cannot do the job alone, she says. It can be done she asserts, "only through the meshing of economic and social development in a climate, or social milieu, that will support a massive team approach."

A few programs of this type have been initiated, Dr. Winston notes, citing one supported by the Massachusetts Welfare Administration to illustrate the "practical way" organized labor can contribute. The project is being conducted by the Labor Relations Center of the University of Massachusetts in cooperation with labor unions and provides job training and work opportunities for youths with court records, she writes.

"Another type of effort to bring economic and social forces together in a team approach," she adds, "involves joint visits of welfare workers with business, labor and other civic leaders to some of the individuals who have been most affected by their separation from the mainstream of society.

Dr. Winston reviews the recent social enactments in some detail and finds some of them "exciting," though she adds that "all these are beginnings." She continues:

"From them, however, we can move faster toward a time when we no longer leave to chance such matters as whether a city can effectively absorb its influx of rural people or whether youth at school-leaving age will be left adrift, or whether retirement from a job will mean retirement from life."

A summary of the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare includes:

- A nationwide minimum standard for public assistance payments.
- A national comprehensive system of public assistance based on a single criterion: Need.
- A uniform, simple plan for federal-state sharing in costs of all public welfare programs which provide for equitable and reasonable fiscal effort among the states and recognizes the relative fiscal capacity of the federal and state governments.
- Comprehensive social services readily accessible, as a right, at all times to all in need.
- Administration of all welfare programs receiving federal funds consistent with the principle of public welfare as a right.

The council's report is entitled "Having the Power, We Have the Duty," a quotation from a speech Pres. Johnson made in 1964 on striking down the barriers to "full participation in our society."

"The council's aim," Dr. Winston concludes, "was to offer the nation a practical blueprint for fulfilling that duty. It (the report) merits study by members of organized labor and by all citizens who believe that action can and must be taken to relieve unnecessary suffering and hardship."

Englander Products Off Unfair List

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has withdrawn its call upon the general public to refuse to buy Englander mattresses and sofa beds, a product of Union Carbide Company.

The council, continuing its full support of the strikers at Union Carbide's plants, noted that the products bearing the Englander label were made in union plants under union conditions.

'Severe Hardships' Found:

Federal Study Hits High Medical Costs

Soaring prices for medical care are causing "severe hardships" to people who need doctors or hospital services and are inflating the cost of government-financed medical care programs, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare told Pres. Johnson.

The government study predicted that medical costs will continue to rise. But it stressed that the rate of increase can be slowed by measures to make more efficient use of medical resources and bring down the cost of drugs.

Physicians fees and hospital charges led to an explosive rise in medical costs during 1966.

Fees charged by doctors shot up 7.8 percent, more than double the 1965 increase and the biggest one-year rise since the government began collecting statistics on medical costs 40 years ago. The study also showed a long-term trend indicating that doctors are spending less time on each patient as well as charging bigger fees.

Hospital costs jumped 16.5 percent last year to an average charge of about $45 a day, with no sign of a letup.

While drug prices did not rise markedly during the past year, they are an important factor in the high cost of medical care and the report recommended steps to lower prices of prescription drugs.

Many of the report's findings and recommendations paralleled a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting.

The HEW study recommended "an intensive examination of frequently prescribed drugs" to compare the effectiveness of more expensive brand name products with unbranded equivalents so that doctors can be authoritatively assured if the two are equal in value. It asked that the Food & Drug Administration provide unbiased information to doctors about the efficacy of drugs.

The Executive Council had urged consideration of such a listing by the Food & Drug Administration.

Both the report and the council statement called for consideration of the efficiency of hospital and nursing home facilities in determining the amount of reimbursement under the medicare program.

A council proposal for grants-in-aid "to stimulate the growth of consumer-controlled comprehensive health plans" was matched by an HEW recommendation for encouragement of group practice and federal "seed money" to encourage the start of group practice prepayment plans.

The 36-page HEW report also included these major proposals:

- Broadening of private and public health insurance plans to include less costly types of medical care as an alternative to hospitals where the nature of the ailment does not require such intensive care.
- Substantial federal funds for training "physician assistants" and evaluating their performance as a means of reducing the critical shortage of doctors and lowering the cost of medical care.
- Federal leadership in helping hospitals reduce their costs.

HEW Sec. John W. Gardner said he is taking steps to carry out many of the administrative recommendations developed in the study, including establishment of a National Center for Health Services Research & Development to "serve as the focus of a national effort to improve the organization and delivery of health services."

ILO Worker Unit Hits Governments on Budget

Geneva—Workers are "bitterly disappointed" at the failure of governments to appropriate more funds for the Intl. Labor Organization's 1968 budget, Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, declared at a meeting of the ILO Governing Body here.

The entire worker group on the Governing Body, which is the equivalent of an executive committee, joined in protesting the limitation on funds voted by many countries.

The budget of $24,788,611 was given final approval. It is $2,316,211 more than that of the current year, but most of the increase is absorbed by rising administrative costs and little is left for the expansion of operating programs.

Faupl was particularly critical of the "shortsightedness" of the governments of major nations such as the United States, the Soviet Union and France.

"These governments just do not realize," he said, "the tremendous need for financial resources to assure that the ILO can effectively accomplish its assigned tasks."

Worker members of the Governing Body were able to persuade a majority to set aside recommendations by some governments and employer representatives that the ILO conference be held biennially instead of yearly, as at present.

Albert J. Hayes, retired president of the Machinists, was named to participate in a meeting of experts on the problems raised for workers by automation. The sessions will be held in Geneva in May.

Nelson H. Cruikshank, retired director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, was named a worker expert for a forthcoming ILO meeting on social security problems.

Plain Dealer Added to Empire:

Cleveland Purchase Swells Newhouse Newspaper Chain

By Eugene A. Kelly

Cleveland, O.—Publisher Samuel I. Newhouse came to town the owner of 20 newspapers with 2,925,000 circulation. He left with title to his 21st—the Cleveland Plain Dealer, morning circulation 377,089, Sunday 522,391.

The price was not disclosed, though Plain Dealer Editor-Publisher Thomas Van Heusen Vail said it was "the highest price ever paid for a newspaper property in this country." Other sources said Newhouse paid $500 a share for 90,000 shares of stock in the Forest City Publishing Co., with 10,000 shares still outstanding but sought by Newhouse.

That would make the total $50 million for the Plain Dealer, its printing plant and offices on the edge of downtown Cleveland, and the adjoining plant of the Art Gravure Corp., publisher of newspaper roto and comic sections.

Newhouse did not stay to meet the public. He conferred with Plain Dealer executives at the Hollenden House, then returned to his Park Ave. headquarters in Manhattan, saying only: "Our first concern in acquiring a property is its strength, health, growth potential. We are very happy to be here. The Plain Dealer is the largest newspaper in our chain."

Executive Editor William M. Ware, once a Newspaper Guild vice president, broke the news to city room workers late that afternoon. Ware walked in, hopped on a chair and said "Will you all gather round, please? I have an announcement."

News to Employes

That was the first most employes knew about it, though Vail told a press conference that while dining with Pres. Johnson the week before in Washington, the President mentioned he "had heard an inkling" that the paper might be sold. Vail said he and Johnson "discussed the sale."

Why was the Plain Dealer, stable, solid and prosperous for many years, sold to out-of-town interests? Vail said in a statement:

"A majority of the owners . . . none of whom are employed by the company and many of whom live outside Cleveland, have decided for estate reasons to accept a substantial offer from Mr. S. I. Newhouse."

"Complete control of the Plain Dealer, its business, personnel and editorial policies has been left in my hands. Management of all departments and corporate officers will continue as before."

Vail emphasized that the change of ownership would "in no way affect our daily operations." He announced that he had signed a 10-year contract with the new owner as editor and publisher. "This does not mean that the contract will terminate after 10 years," he explained.

The Plain Dealer started as a weekly in 1842. It was sold in 1885—seven years after E. W. Scripps came from Detroit to start a new daily, the Press, which soon outdistanced all competitors in a town with 15 or more competing journals. Today the only surviving papers are the Plain Dealer and the Press, both owned by chains headquartered on Park Ave., New York.

Holden Built It

The modern Plain Dealer era began with Liberty E. Holden, lawyer, professor of English and realty man who was editor and owner from 1885 to his death in 1913. His heirs were the ones Vail—a great-grandson of Holden—referred to in his statement. Their control had been diluted through the years by the addition to the board of Cleveland Trust Co. executives acting as trustees, Western Reserve University representatives and a few others like Rep. Frances Bolton of nearby Lyndhurst, herself the heiress of a venerable Cleveland family antedating even the Holdens.

Newhouse is 5 feet 3 inches in height and still vigorous at 71. He runs the business affairs of his papers largely by telephone, and is named on the masthead of only a few. He is the owner also of several radio and television stations and several magazines—Glamour, Vogue, House and Garden, among others.

Five AFL-CIO unions have contracts with Newhouse papers in about 10 cities. Their experience has been that he will agree to pay going wage rates when he has to, will be tough or accommodating according to local conditions.

The Newspaper Guild was only one year old when Newhouse defeated its attempt to organize the Staten Island Advance. The ANG revoked the charters of locals in Newark and Syracuse in 1948 and 1949 on the ground that its contracts with Newhouse were inferior and its leadership so subservient to management as to be not worthy the name.

Members of the Stereotypers, the Typographical Union, the Guild and other unions were replaced by Newhouse after a long strike in Portland, Ore., and no unions hold a contract on the Oregonian or Journal.

Guild contracts with Newhouse's Long Island papers have top wage minimums for key classifications of $160.50 a week, $40 below the New York daily minimums. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, however, matches the $200 top minimum on the competing Post-Dispatch, the ANG reported.

If Newhouse follows a current trend, union observers say, he will seek to reduce his costs in Cleveland by consolidating the printing facilities of the Press and Plain Dealer, and by merging the advertising and bookkeeping departments. The Plain Dealer has union contracts in all departments except the latter two.

Newhouse was born in New York City in 1895, the eldest of eight children. He took his first job at the age of 13 after the family moved to Bayonne, N.J., and the father became ill. He passed the New Jersey bar examination after attending night school classes, but stopped practicing when he lost his first case, according to a biographer.

50-Year Span

He was 16 when the owner of the Bayonne Times named him to run the 5,000-circulation daily. He got the paper in the black, and by 1916 was making $30,000 a year from the rejuvenated Times.

Newhouse bought his first paper soon afterward—in Fitchburg, Mass. He sold it at a 50 percent profit after transferring its newsprint to his Bayonne paper, and with a partner took over the Staten Island Advance in 1922. From then on his ownership accelerated.

In the 1930's he bought the Long Island Press, the Long Island Star-Journal, the Newark Star-Ledger, and the Syracuse Herald-Journal. In the 1940's he added the Syracuse Post-Standard, the Jersey City Journal and the Harrisburg, Pa., Patriot & News.

In the 1950's Newhouse took over the Portland Oregonian, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the Birmingham, Ala., News and the Huntsville Times. He bought a 20 percent stock interest in the Denver Post in 1960, but still does not control the paper. His more recent purchases include the Springfield Union, News and Sunday Republican; The Portland, Ore., Journal; New Orleans, La., Times-Picayune and the States-Item; the Mobile, Ala., Press and Register and a subsidiary in Pascagoula, Miss.; and the Plain Dealer.

A spokesman for the ITU charged that the acquisition of the Plain Dealer by Newhouse was new evidence of the growing concentration of ownership in the newspaper industry.

When Newhouse bought two New Orleans papers in 1962, the ITU issued a statement prepared for a congressional subcommittee pointing out that the publisher then owned the only dailies in Syracuse, Harrisburg, Huntsville, New Orleans, Staten Island and Jersey City. Since then he has become sole daily owner in Mobile, Ala., and Springfield, Mass.

Reorganization Bill Approved by Senate

Senators would have more staff help, less patronage and a summer vacation under a legislative reorganization bill, approved 75-9 after more than six weeks of on-and-off debate. The measure now goes to the House.

Other features of the legislation would establish a "bill of rights" for committees, tighten controls over lobbyists and establish a Senate Veterans Affairs Committee.

The bill was steered through the Senate by A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.). A companion bill in the House is sponsored by Rep. Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.). The legislation is the outgrowth of a two-year study by a joint House-Senate committee.

Each senator would be authorized an additional top-level aide and each committee would be given two more professional staff members plus a "review specialist" whose job would be to check on the administration of laws passed by Congress.

Congress would be forbidden from meeting during the month of August except during a declared war.

Postmasters would be appointed under the merit system, without Senate confirmation.

More lobbyists would be required to register, criminal penalties would be imposed for violations, and supervision would be shifted to the comptroller general's office.

A Republican move to knock out the tighter lobbying supervision was defeated, 53-30.

The committee reform section of the bill empowers the majority of a committee to call meetings and report out legislation if the chairman refuses to do so.

School, Early Retirement Reduce Manpower Ratio

Increased school attendance and earlier retirement are the key factors for the growth in the number of American men of working age who are not in the labor force, the Labor Dept. reports.

An article in the April Monthly Labor Review focuses on the 4.5 million men—9 percent of the civilian population between 18 and 64—not in the labor force in 1966, noting that this group has increased from 6 percent of the population in 1956.

The sharpest and most persistent rise in non-participation in the labor force occurred in the younger and older age groups, the article said, with increased school attendance responsible for all of the increase in the 18-24 age group. Retirement was the main cause of the increase in the 55 to 64 age bracket.

Of the 4.5 million not in the labor force in 1966 about 2 million were in the 18-24 age bracket and 1.25 million were between 55 and 64.

Labor force participation rates for white men "are uniformly higher" than for Negro men, the article said. Out of 1.25 million men not in the labor force between the ages of 25 and 55, one-fifth were Negro.

Board Applies 'Met' Rule To 4 Insurance Firms

The National Labor Relations Board broke a year-long logjam of refusal-to-bargain cases in the insurance industry by applying its Metropolitan Insurance Co. rule to four other companies.

The Metropolitan ruling, handed down in February 1966 after supplementary hearings ordered by the Supreme Court, was that union representation elections may be held for agents in a single district office instead of statewide, the former practice.

Metropolitan accepted the 1966 ruling but the rest of the insurance industry has not yet followed suit voluntarily. The four firms just named in an order to bargain with the Insurance Workers may comply with the order, appeal it in a U.S. Circuit Court, or wait for the NLRB to seek an enforcement order in Federal District Court.

All five members of the board signed a decision reaffirming earlier findings that "all debit insurance district agents" at two Pittsburgh area offices of the Western & Southern Life Insurance Co. "separately constitute appropriate bargaining units" and that the company illegally refused to bargain with the union in these units—at McKeesport and Wilkinsburg, Pa.

Board panels of three members each then applied the same finding to the Richmond, Va., district office of the Life Insurance Co. of Virginia; the Newport News district office of the North America Assurance Society of Virginia, Inc., and the Equitable Life Insurance Co. offices in East Liverpool and Steubenville, O.

The union has been pressing the NLRB to apply its Metropolitan principle to these and three other pending cases for more than a year, Pres. William A. Gillen said.

For 17 years the NLRB followed a rule forbidding elections in any bargaining unit smaller than statewide. The union repeatedly challenged the rule as unfair, and in 1963 the board held that a single district office also might be an appropriate unit, provided that it was a "separate entity through which the employer conducts its business operations."

Court Challenge

Metropolitan challenged the new rule as applied to its district office at Woonsocket, R.I. Two appeals courts issued conflicting decisions, and the board then appealed the one adverse ruling to the Supreme Court. Meanwhile the NLRB failed to process any new union election petitions at Metropolitan and all "Met" organizing was halted for a full year, Gillen recalled.

The high court reversed the adverse decision by the 1st U.S. Circuit Court in Boston but remanded the case to the NLRB for more hearings and further explanation of its reasoning that a single unit office might be appropriate. Early in 1966 the board reaffirmed its Metropolitan rule on the ground that the Woonsocket office had considerable autonomy, and ordered the company to bargain. It did so, and the union has negotiated first contracts for many new members.

Charles Caldwell Joins Labor Dept. Staff

Charles Caldwell, veteran newspaperman and former information director for the Peace Corps and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, has been appointed an assistant information director in the Labor Dept. to serve as principal information officer for the Labor-Management Services Administration.

He also will handle information matters dealing with the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act, the Pension & Welfare Reporting Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, veterans' re-employment rights and the President's Missile Sites Labor Commission.

U.S. 'Initiative' Urged on Slave Labor Treaty

that it would not make use of any form of forced or compulsory labor as a means of political coercion or punishment for expressing certain views or as a means of discrimination. To date, 75 nations have ratified the convention. The Soviet Union has not ratified the pact.

Biemiller testified that it was the American labor movement which first initiated the inquiry into slave labor in 1947.

Two years later, over the objections of Russia and her satellites, the United Nations Economic & Social Council authorized an ILO study which revealed a systematic program of forced labor in Soviet-controlled countries and Red China. The ILO Convention on the Abolition of Forced Labor followed.

20% Hike Urged on Congress:

Meany Details Labor Support For Social Security Proposal

Meany stressed, however, that it is the elderly retired workers and widows struggling to get by on benefits of $20 a week or less who make up "the great majority of the 22 million Americans now dependent upon social security."

He cited statistics—laced with indignation.

He spoke of the 5 million elderly persons on the social security benefit rolls—35 percent of the total—who are living below the Social Security Administration's own definition of poverty.

"According to that definition," Meany noted, "a single worker isn't poor if he has an income of $1,500 a year. A couple isn't poor if they have $1,900 a year coming in. It seems to me that this is about as poor as you can get."

Even catching up to this poverty level would allow only 22 cents a meal for each person based on a Dept. of Agriculture "economy food plan," intended for "temporary or emergency use when funds are low."

"Imagine that," Meany told the committee, "22 cents." And since they came up with this figure, living costs have risen over 5 percent. So the social security poverty standard today isn't even enough for a 'temporary or emergency' period. Yet for millions, it is not temporary; it is permanent."

Labor is "most enthusiastic" about the President's proposed 59 percent increase for the 2.5 million persons now receiving minimum benefits of $44 a month, Meany said. These people "are the poorest of the poor."

He strongly supported the proposed three-step increase in the taxable wage base—to $10,800 by 1974. It would bring the system closer to the social insurance principle on which it started in 1935, he said, when the $3,000 ceiling covered virtually all wage-earners.

He assured the committee that AFL-CIO members are prepared to "pay their fair share toward a better social security system."

In the long run, however, further improvements that the AFL-CIO considers necessary should be paid for in part by general revenue rather than the "regressive" payroll tax.

"We are not asking for this now," Meany told the committee. "But we will be back."

Republicans have proposed an 8 percent increase in social security benefits, with an escalator covering future cost of living increases.

"Its inadequacy is appalling," Meany said of the GOP plan.

He said labor is not opposed to some form of escalator clause for social security benefits. But he stressed that mere adjustment of rates to living costs is not enough.

"Older Americans are entitled to do better than just keep pace with the cost of living in a society where the standard of living is steadily rising," he said.

Meany suggested that a preferable arrangement would be a "periodic adjustment at fairly frequent intervals of benefit levels to some appropriate measure of active workers' earnings."

The AFL-CIO president gave a strong endorsement to the Administration proposal to extend medicare coverage to disabled workers under 65. He asked also that doctors be barred from requiring medicare patients to pay their bills and then get reimbursement from the government program, declaring it has caused "hardship" to many retirees.

Dealing with another program covered by the bill, Meany supported the proposal to require states receiving matching federal grants for public assistance to raise the payments to welfare recipients to the level the states themselves have set as "the minimum for subsistence." He also asked that extension of aid to families with dependent children "be made mandatory, and that the so-called 'man-in-the-house' rule be immediately eliminated wherever it is in effect."

Child Care Backed

Meany praised proposals for medical care for needy children, including a national dental health program. But he strongly opposed an Administration plan to set an income ceiling on persons eligible for "medicaid," the federal grants to states for health services to the needy. The bill would allow aid only to persons with incomes less than 50 percent above the state's welfare level. Meany said he was "deeply opposed" because income levels for cash welfare in most states are "scandalously low."

He also expressed the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to the Administration proposal to tax a portion of social security and railroad retirement benefits.

Speaking of labor's long-range goals, Meany stressed that much more needs to be done beyond the specific proposals in the Administration bill.

All that should be done won't be accomplished this year, he acknowledged. But he closed with the reminder that goals representing mankind's "striving for a better world . . . are important because if we stop striving for them, if we settle for a comfortable version of things as they are, the American spirit will be dead indeed."

TESTIFYING before the House Ways & Means Committee, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany backed the proposed 20 percent increase in social security benefits as "a substantial down payment" toward the 50 percent rise the AFL-CIO favors. Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller is at left, Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman at right.

Major Draft Revisions Announced by Johnson

declare his intent to end all graduate school deferments, except for those studying to be doctors, dentists or ministers.

Both the drafting of younger men first and an end to student deferments had been urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting and by the 20-member National Advisory Commission on the Selective Service, which reported to the President Mar. 4.

Johnson's announcement of his intent to revise the draft system came in a message asking Congress to extend the draft law an additional four years. It otherwise would lapse June 30.

Under present law, the President could make the changes he seeks through executive order. However, with the President's intent now declared, Congress could impose its own views on the draft by writing them into the law.

The advisory commission, set up last July, also proposed consolidation of the present system of 4,100 neighborhood draft boards into 300 to 500 area boards with draft classification governed more rigidly than at present on the basis of nationwide standards. Johnson said he was hesitant to scrap the existing board system "lightly" and ordered further study of the issue.

Labor Members

The advisory panel was headed by Burke Marshall, former assistant attorney general, and included two AFL-CIO vice presidents—Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks.

One of the problems of selective service has been the difficulty of selecting the approximately 700,000 youths needed by the armed services each year from the 2.1 million reaching draft age plus additional millions in the draftable age group who have not been called or who have been given deferments.

The President's plan is that young men be processed for the draft soon after they reach the age of 18 and be subject to first priority call-up, along with those who have used up their deferments, at 19.

Since the number needed would still be less than the available manpower pool, the selection would be made by a nationwide random selection system. Deferments would be strictly limited to cases of extreme hardship.

Eligible men who passed age 19 without being called up would be placed in a lower priority each year thereafter, with little likelihood of their being drafted except in a major national crisis.

The President said the lottery system he proposed—to be called FAIR for "fair and impartial random" selection—would be set up before Jan. 1, 1969.

One effect of taking younger men first would be to minimize the effect of ending deferment for fathers.

Johnson also announced that steps are being taken to implement two other recommendations of the advisory commission—greater use of women volunteers by the military services and replacement of military by civilian employes in additional jobs.

While holding off a decision on student deferments, the President made it clear that in no event will college students be able "to pile deferment on deferment" until they are past draft age.

The President did not indicate when he would issue his executive orders or when they would take effect.

The continued need for a draft law was affirmed in the President's message, the advisory commission's report, the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement, and the report of an advisory panel set up by the House Armed Services Committee.

Labor Raps Proposals On U.S. Agency Rules

The AFL-CIO opposed a major revamping of the Administrative Procedures Act, which sets ground rules for administrative hearings and actions by federal agencies.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee that some of the proposed changes could lead to lengthy delays in labor board representation elections and Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage determinations.

Passed Last Year

The subcommittee is considering a sweeping revision of the act in a bill co-sponsored by Senators Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) and Edward V. Long (D-Mo.). A similar measure passed the Senate last year but died in the House.

Harris cautioned against substituting formal, quasi-judicial procedures in situations where speed and informality are needed. Citing examples, he said:

"The representation proceedings under the National Labor Relations Act cannot be considered in isolation from the purpose which these proceedings are designed to serve. That purpose is to facilitate the prompt determination whether employes wish to be represented by a union, and, if so, what union, as an alternative to strikes for recognition. This purpose can easily be frustrated by the imposition of formal and restrictive procedures. . . .

"Another example . . . is the prevailing wage pre-determinations which the Dept. of Labor makes under the Davis-Bacon Act and other statutes dealing with government financed or aided construction.

"Here, again, formal procedural requirements that do not take into account the exigencies under which wage determinations must be made could not only frustrate the beneficial purpose of the act, which is to assure that construction work carried on or aided by the government shall not undermine prevailing wage standards, but could also seriously delay vital construction projects."

Thorough study might point the need to some modifications of the present law, Harris commented. But he questioned whether advocates of the bill had made a convincing case for "broad and sweeping changes" which would lay down "a whole new set of ground rules."

Meany Calls for Probe Of Mississippi Slaying

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed labor's "sorrow and horror" over the murder of Wharlest Jackson, Natchez, Miss., union member and civil rights worker and called on Attorney Gen. Ramsey Clark to investigate the killing and prosecute those guilty.

Jackson was killed Feb. 27 when a bomb exploded in his car as he drove home from work at the Armstrong Rubber Co. plant. A member of Rubber Workers Local 303, Jackson had just begun a job formerly held by a white man, wire services reported.

Meany said in a message to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People that the AFL-CIO joins with its affiliate, the URW, in expressing its indignation and expects the Dept. of Justice to "investigate this atrocious act, arrest the guilty and prosecute them to the full extent of the law."

The AFL-CIO, he added, "will continue its fight for stronger federal legislation against crimes like this and we will not rest until discrimination and prejudice are driven from every place in America." A copy went to Clark.

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito sent a message of sympathy to the family declaring that "this unnecessary and unfortunate event should impress every God-fearing person with the evils of discrimination, hatred, bigotry and prejudice."

The union, Bommarito said, "will exert every possible effort to bring those responsible for this cowardly act to justice."

Natchez civic authorities assured the Negro community they will seek the killer of Jackson, who was active in the NAACP and other civil rights groups.

NAACP Dir. Roy Wilkins called on Congress to enact new laws to facilitate federal prosecution in civil rights slayings.

Social Security Rallies Stir Broad Grassroots Support

Non-Farm Jobs Hit Peak:

3.7% Jobless Rate Set for 3rd Month

By Robert B. Cooney

The national unemployment rate held at 3.7 percent in February for the third straight month, the Labor Dept. has reported.

As the department saw it, the February manpower situation was characterized "by continued high employment and low unemployment rates, but by declines in manufacturing employment and hours."

These were the highlights:

- Non-farm payroll jobs after adjustment for seasonal influences, rose by 125,000 to a record 65.5 million. The job rise came in the area of services, government and contract construction. Factory employment, seasonally adjusted, fell by 65,000 to 19.4 million.
- Construction employment showed a sizeable seasonally adjusted advance of 56,000 to a total of 3,357,000 as a result of the pickup in residential construction.
- Unemployment, at 3.2 million, was unchanged from January. The jobless rate of 3.7 percent was unimproved from January and December and was the same as February 1966.

The jobless rates remained low for married men—the key breadwinner group—at 1.6 percent and for adult men 20 and over at 2.2 percent. However, the jobless rate for Negroes worsened slightly to 7.1 percent, more than double the 3.3 percent jobless rate for whites.

- The number of non-farm workers on part-time for economic reasons—due to slack work, material shortages, etc.—rose by 100,000 to 2.0 million. Usually it declines slightly over the month, the report noted.

Arthur M. Ross, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, conceded to reporters that economic activity in the first quarter was

Labor Asks Wide Drive On Poverty

Organized labor called on the federal government to expand the war against poverty and honor its commitment to the nation's poor "even as we fulfill our commitments in Viet Nam."

The AFL-CIO at the same time gave its endorsement to a 1966 commission study that would establish a federally-supported effort to put the hard-core unemployed to work in much-needed public service programs.

In testimony before a Senate labor subcommittee examining the three-year-old war against poverty, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared that a good beginning has been made "but much remains to be done."

"Even as we fulfill commitments in Viet Nam and elsewhere overseas," Biemiller said, the resources allocated at home "are altogether inadequate in terms of the need and of our capabilities." He warned that incalculable harm would be done if the "forward thrust" of the poverty war is lost

AT OKLAHOMA CITY rally for labor-supported social security bill, Vice Pres. Meany Says 20% Hike 'Up to Us'

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson, Vice Pres. Humphrey and overflow crowds at rallies throughout the nation launched the AFL-CIO's drive to demonstrate massive public support for the Administration's social security bill.

"Too many citizens have been left behind by the progress they helped build," Johnson declared. "Our effort to guarantee dignity and a decent income to every worker still has a long way to go. . . . I am counting on you to help in this great effort."

Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appeared together in a special film shown at 14 weekend rallies sponsored by local central labor councils with strong support from senior citizen organizations. Humphrey headed the speaker list at the Oklahoma City rally and senators, congressmen, union leaders and Administration officials addressed mass meetings in other cities.

Tens of thousands of petitions were distributed at the rallies, which Meany stressed were "only the beginning" of the campaign. He urged those attending to:

"Write to your congressman and your senators. Visit them . . .

"Talk to your friends and neighbors—to your church and school groups, to your fellow club members. Get them to read the literature we have prepared and to write their congressmen and senators. Get everyone you can to sign your petition.

"That is how progress is made. That is how laws are passed. It is really up to us."

Humphrey touched on the same theme in a rousing speech to the enthusiastic Oklahoma City rally.

"The success of any legislation," the Vice President stressed, "begins

Represents 400,000 Members:

Professional Unions Form New Council

Seventeen AFL-CIO unions joined in setting up a new council designed to stimulate union activity among men and women in the professions, sciences and the arts—and to encourage cooperation among unions in these fields.

Delegates representing 400,000 union members pledged "to bring the fruits of collective bargaining" to workers in these fields. They promised to "exchange information and investigate means and methods for improving salaries, hours and working conditions."

Stressing the changes the space age has made in the pattern of the work force, delegates chose a name whose initials spell SPACE—the council of AFL-CIO unions for Scientific, Professional and Cultural Employes.

The founding convention elected Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians as president of the council, Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers as vice president, and Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes as treasurer.

Establishment of the council as part of the AFL-CIO structure was hailed by Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne in an address at the opening of the two-day convention.

He termed it "a tribute to the flexibility of outlook and form of the American trade union movement."

By 1975, Beirne said, half of all workers will be in white collar occupations. "For this new group of workers—for these so-called middle class people from the professional, scientific and cultural communities

NLRB Examiner Shapes Remedy To End 'Profit' in Labor Law Delay

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled that an employer who refused to come to the bargaining table for nearly 18 months while he "tested" the law should be required to pay his employes for wage and benefit gains they would have achieved during the testing period.

Examiner Owsley Vose recommended the unique remedy for members of the Auto Workers at the Elwood, Ind., plant of the Ex-Cell-O-Corp. because management refused to bargain after the union won an NLRB election in 1964 and was certified in 1965. Vose reaffirmed the validity of the election result and outlined a remedy to "take the profit out of refusing to bargain."

The examiner agreed with the union that long delays in such cases "place a premium on disobedience of the law." He ruled that the firm must bargain with the UAW and also compensate Elwood plant employes for the money value of the "minimum additional benefits" including wages which it is "reasonable to conclude that the union would have been able to attain through collective bargaining" except for management delays.

Additional hearings will be needed to compute the loss suffered by employes, Vose pointed out, because of the refusal of a company vice president to produce records of wage increases and fringe benefits granted Elwood employes since the union won bargaining rights. The examiner compared conditions other than wages at Elwood, as listed in a 1963 company handbook, with those at five other Ex-Cell-O plants where the UAW has

Council Meeting Kept Wires Buzzing

Press coverage of the recent AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting at Bal Harbour, Fla., almost doubled that from the mid-winter council meeting in 1966, according to a compilation by the Western Union office in Miami.

A total of 75,994 words moved over Western Union wires during the Feb. 20-28 period this year. The total filed by Western Union in 1966 was 41,270 words.

SENIOR CONCERT ORCHESTRA of New York Musicians Local 802 gave its first public performance at Hunter College in collaboration with the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Council. The 80-piece orchestra was conducted by David Mendoza. Its members are all over 65, a fourth of them over 80. The occasion was a tribute to retired union members in the New York area.

New Remedy Outlined For Bargaining Refusal

contracts. He found superior conditions prevailing at the other plants —in Bluffton, Fostoria and Lima, O., Detroit and Traverse City, Mich.

There is ample precedent, Vose said, for ruling that the board has the power to fashion different remedies for unfair practices. The question in the Ex-Cell-O case, he said, was whether the union was justified in seeking a remedy other than what it called a "slap on the wrist" order to cease and desist.

It is possible for any employer to delay the start of bargaining sessions for up to two years while he "pursues the legal remedies available to him" in the law, the examiner noted. In the Ex-Cell-O case, he observed, more than two years have elapsed since the NLRB's original certification was issued, and another year or more could elapse before a Court of Appeals issues a decision on review.

During this period the employes, "frustrated in their efforts to obtain a contract, and seeing that their employer by his own efforts can prevent the collective bargaining process from even getting started, lose interest in union representation," Vose wrote. When bargaining finally starts, he observed, union representatives are "bargaining from a position of weakness rather than the position they would have been in" had the employer promptly sat down for negotiations. He added:

"Employers who promptly comply with their . . . obligations are placed at an economic disadvantage and flouters of the national policy . . . are financially rewarded for their conduct."

Open to Others

Assuming that Ex-Cell-O's refusal to bargain was not a deliberate maneuver to stall bargaining but an attempt to get a review of what the company regards as an erroneous ruling, Vose observed that the course it followed is open to all employers. This, he pointed out, includes those "who are opposed to collective bargaining . . . and who calculate that the cost of litigating is more than offset by the savings resulting from stalling the commencement of bargaining for possibly two years or more."

During this period, he noted, "assuming that the Court of Appeals ultimately sustains the board's actions in the representation case, the national policy with regard to collective bargaining has been wholly frustrated, and the employes have been deprived of the fruits of the bargaining process." He added:

"These results . . . are completely antithetical to the purposes of the (Taft-Hartley) Act and call for a remedy which will help restore the situation to that which would have existed but for the unfair labor practices."

Vose recommended that company payment should be retroactive to Oct. 25, 1965, the date on which management first refused the union's request for a bargaining meeting.

Stevens Files Appeal Against NLRB Ruling

Greenville, S.C.—J. P. Stevens & Co., named in two National Labor Relations Board orders as a flagrant violator of federal labor law, has filed an appeal of the latest board order with the 4th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the company announced here.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock charged that the appeals have been filed for the purpose of "endless litigation and delay."

The NLRB, in a unanimous decision early in March, ordered the Stevens firm to restore 18 fired workers to their jobs with full backpay, and to take several steps to undo its "flagrantly unlawful conduct." The steps included giving the Textile Workers Union of America the names and addresses of all employes in its 27 North and South Carolina plants; reading the board's "cease and desist" order at employe meetings, and giving the union access to plant bulletin boards for a year.

Pollock recalled that Stevens & Co. has been found "guilty of the grossest violations of federal law" by three NLRB trial examiners and in the two rulings of the full board. He urged Pres. Johnson to issue a presidential order barring Stevens "and any other repeated violators" from receiving government orders until they comply with the law.

World Book Remains on Unfair List

The Union Label & Service Trades Dept., AFL-CIO, warned that World Book Encyclopedia is still being produced in part at the struck plant of the Kingsport, Tenn., Press despite a claim by the publisher to the contrary.

The department said through a spokesman that, while a portion of World Book is being printed at another plant, an officer of Field Enterprises Educational Corp., the publisher, acknowledged that a "substantial part of the work is still being done at Kingsport Press."

The statement was in answer to letters circulated by a regional office of World Book to unions and school administrators in the St. Louis area that the "R. Donnelly Co. of Crawfordsville, Ind., has recently built a new plant . . . where our World Book Encyclopedia is now being printed." The Donnelly firm, one of the nation's largest printers of telephone books and other products, has operated non-union shops for many years, the department said.

AFL-CIO unions and the Union Label Dept. have been conducting a vigorous "don't buy" campaign against Kingsport Press, where some 1,000 members of five affiliated unions have been on strike for five years. The strike is still on, and management still operates the Kingsport plant with strikebreakers.

Besides the World Book Encyclopedia, labor's unfair list includes the same company's Childcraft series; the Book of Knowledge and its annual supplement, distributed by Grolier, Inc., the Grossett Webster Dictionary of Grossett & Dunlap, Inc., and books by other publishers including textbooks offered for sale by 24 universities.

Jewish Forward Marks 70th Year

New York—The Jewish Daily Forward, the only labor-oriented daily newspaper in the United States, has just observed the 70th anniversary of its founding by a group of Socialist idealists in 1897.

Its institution was in effect a protest against the dogmatism and partisanship of the radicals of that day and the bitterness of their attacks on the former AFL.

The Forward was mainly the voice of Yiddish-speaking immigrants who helped develop labor unions in many areas, but particularly in the apparel trades. The publication gave not only space and sympathetic treatment to the struggles of workers fighting to build their unions, but donated its own funds and often mobilized the Jewish labor community in support of non-Jewish strikers.

Paul Fournier Dies; Distillery Union Officer

Montreal—Paul Fournier, Canadian director of the Distillery Workers since 1940 and a DWU vice president since 1946, died here Mar. 9 after a short illness. He was 56.

Fournier joined the DWU after serving seven years as chief Canadian organizer for the Hatters. The DWU credited a joint campaign by Fournier and union Pres. Mort Brandenburg, then DWU director of organization, with bringing 5,000 Canadian distillery workers into the union.

Non-Farm Jobs Hit Peak:

3.7% Jobless Rate Set for 3rd Month

"growing less rapidly" than in the same period a year ago.

Ross warned against overinterpreting recent economic indicators which showed declines and what some observers regarded as a "softening" of economic activity.

For example, he noted, the slight decline in the industrial production index in January reflected an edging down in the factory workweek but the more important factor of the employment level continued strong.

The Labor Dept. report said the factory workweek, which declined from 41.3 hours in November to 41.0 hours in January, fell to a seasonally adjusted total of 40.3 hours in February. The decline was attributed to inventory adjustments and bad weather in some areas.

The report said the average hourly earnings of factory production workers rose 1 cent to $2.78 in February. But the sharp drop in hours over the month caused average weekly earnings to decline by $1.54 to $111.48.

Total employment since a year ago grew by 1.8 million to 72.5 million, the report said. The job gains were made up of 600,000 adult men, 1.0 million adult women and 250,000 teenagers. Non-farm jobs gained by 2.0 million while agricultural employment continued its long-term decline, falling by about 200,000.

On the unemployment side of the picture, the jobless total of 3.2 million in February was unchanged from January. The unemployed were made up of 1.3 million adult men, 1.1 million adult women and about 750,000 teenagers.

Unemployed non-whites totaled 650,000 in February, making up one-fifth of the total jobless.

The Labor Dept. said that one effect of the jobless rate stabilizing within a 3.5 to 3.9 percent rate for the past 14 months has been to reduce long-term unemployment. From a year ago, the long-term jobless—those futilely seeking work for 15 weeks or longer—declined to 500,000, a drop of 170,000. The group of very long-term unemployed—those jobless 27 weeks or longer — dropped by 80,000 over the year.

ACWA Backs Contract Bar For Scofflaws

San Juan, P.R.—The executive board of the Clothing Workers voted a strong endorsement of the AFL-CIO's effort to bar government contracts to companies that discriminate against union members in violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

Calling for a presidential executive order comparable to the ban on contracts to firms guilty of racial discrimination, the ACWA board said present policies reward the law-breaker.

"By awarding contracts to such firms, government demeans itself and the law, and operates to the disadvantage of companies which do live up to the obligation of national labor policy," the board said.

In another resolution, the ACWA called for government limitations on the imports of all apparel.

The union cited a 40 percent rise in imports between 1964 and 1966 and warned that "failure of our government to act in time will irreparably damage the domestic apparel industry and increase unemployment."

Broadcast Union Moves To Block Raid Attempt

New York—The Broadcast Employes & Technicians countered an attempted raid on the union's New York and Hollywood, Calif., locals by filing unfair labor practice charges against the raiders, suspending negotiations with the American Broadcasting Co. and the National Broadcasting Co., and extending contracts with those two networks by five months.

NABET Vice Pres. James Harvey said the American Communications Association, which affiliated recently with the expelled Teamsters, distributed ACA signature cards just as contract negotiations with the networks were getting under way.

Contract talks were suspended March 7 when the network refused to make a wage offer in the face of the attempted raid. NABET then filed unfair practice charges against ABC, NBC and the ACA, which is headed by Joseph P. Selly.

The National Labor Relations Board office here rejected an ACA petition for an election as untimely filed. The petition was refiled Mar. 10 and awaits a ruling by the NLRB regional director, Harvey said.

NABET Pres. Eugene P. Klumpp has advised all U.S. and Canadian members of the union that the contract extension was resorted to in order to protect members from a "no contract" emergency. When negotiations are resumed, NABET will seek retroactivity of benefits to Mar. 31, the original expiration date of the existing contract, Klumpp said in a letter.

Klumpp reported pledges of support from AFL-CIO unions and federation Regional Dir. Michael Mann here. Among messages of support, he said, was one from Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, who said that NABET was being subjected to "the same kind of a raid" the Teamsters and the ACA had earlier attempted against CWA units.

"It is a recognized fact," Beirne said, "that ACA contracts, wherever signed, were poor contracts from the point of view of the working membership. ACA has gone downhill steadily on the basis of bad results piled on top of a poor reputation."

The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 for domination by corrupt interests. Pres. James R. Hoffa recently began serving an eight-year prison sentence on conviction of jury-tampering charges. The ACA was ousted from the former CIO in 1950 on grounds of following Communist Party policies and objectives instead of national CIO policies.

Jack Weinberger Dies; Ex-Hotel Union Leader

San Francisco—Jack Weinberger, who served the Hotel & Restaurant Employes for 50 years as a member of Waiters Local 30 and in recent years as secretary-treasurer of the international union, died here at 83 after a week's illness. He had retired in 1963.

Weinberger came here from Baltimore not long after the 1906 earthquake. His widow and a daughter survive.

Emergency Board Report:

Rail Shopcrafts Scan Settlement Proposal

Six railroad unions representing 137,000 shopcraft workers scheduled a meeting Mar. 21 to vote on acceptance or rejection of a Presidential Emergency Board recommendation designed to head off a strike.

Union general chairmen on more than 120 U.S. railroads and terminal companies will decide whether contract negotiations with the carriers should be resumed or whether to prepare for a strike of all shopworkers on Apr. 12.

A three-man fact finding board named by Pres. Johnson, which held hearings Feb. 1-9, has recommended that the parties agree to a 5 percent general increase for all shopcraft workers, retroactive to Jan. 1; a wage reopening next Dec. 31; a comprehensive job evaluation study to be concluded within four months, and correction of wage inequities out of a fund to be placed in escrow by the employers.

The 5 percent increase would average 15 cents an hour—an amount the emergency board said would keep shopcraft earnings "well abreast of the general increases of workers outside the railroad industry."

Board members also recommended that the parties agree to a two-year contract, that any wage increases to correct inequities following the job study be made retroactive to July 1, 1967, that three weeks' vacation be given after 10 years of service instead of the present 15, and that all other proposals in dispute be dropped.

The six unions—the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Firemen & Oilers—are negotiating through the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. They had asked at least a 7 percent wage hike; a cost-of-living escalator clause, and a slowdown in what they called an everwidening gap between shopcraft and other comparable wage rates.

Three members participated in the board's report — Chairman David Ginsburg, Washington lawyer; Dean Frank J. Dugan of Georgetown University's graduate law school, and Pres. John W. McConnell of the University of New Hampshire.

The board said that, though it dealt first with the wage question, it regards the issue of wage compression as more important.

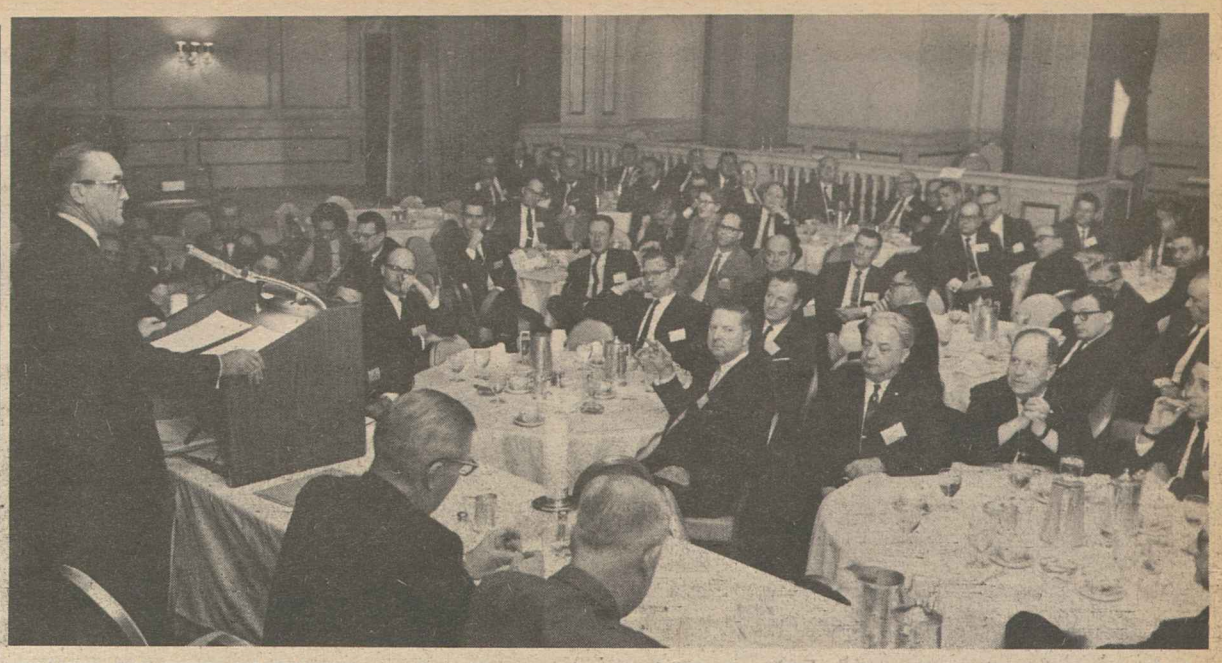
For 30 years, it reported, the unions have negotiated uniform cents-per-hour wage increases for all shopcraft workers and "the result has been to compress severely the wage differentials between skilled workers in railroad shops" and those in other industries.

Noting that it has been almost half a century since a systematic evaluation was made of the skilled crafts in the railroad industry, the board recommended a job study along these lines:

- The parties should begin negotiations within 60 days to determine the amount of money to be placed in escrow by the employers as a "down payment" to correct wage inequities.
- If the parties cannot agree on the amount of the fund, the secretary of labor should be authorized to name a board for final and binding arbitration, or an alternate procedure.
- The parties should agree on procedures for a job evaluation study. If they cannot agree within 60 days of the report, the labor secretary should be authorized to name a board to spell out appropriate procedures.
- If the job evaluation study fails to "establish acceptable wage differentials," the board declared, the parties should agree to final and binding arbitration through a board appointed by the secretary of labor.

Declaring that "no real bargaining actually had taken place" before its hearings opened, the board also recommended three measures to expedite the settlement of disputes under the Railway Labor Act:

A longer no-strike period after an emergency board report to allow additional time for negotiations; Presidential authority to extend the initial no-strike period for 30 days, and restraint by emergency boards in issuing specific recommendations.



'WAVE OF THE FUTURE' is what Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne termed the new Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional and Cultural Employes as he addressed a luncheon session at the council's founding convention in Washington.

Meany Hails Inter-America Summit Talks

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hailed next month's summit meeting of the presidents of the American states at Punta del Este and applauded Pres. Johnson for accepting Latin American initiative in promoting the sessions.

Meany's statement of strong support for further steps to assure "the economic, social and political advancement of the Americas" was conveyed to the President at a White House meeting, Mar. 16.

An AFL-CIO delegation, headed by Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Committee, read the message to the President. Meany is in Brussels at a meeting of the executive board of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Others in the delegation were Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge and Joseph D. Keenan; Lane Kirkland, Meany's executive assistant and Andrew McLellan, the AFL-CIO's inter-American representative.

Text of Meany's statement follows:

"The AFL-CIO hails the forthcoming meeting of the Presidents of the American States at Punta del Este, Uruguay. We applaud Pres. Johnson's acceptance of this Latin American initiative. The program for a summit meeting formulated by the Eleventh Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs at Buenos Aires, Argentina, holds the promise of opening a new era in inter-American relations.

"Favorable congressional action on the President's request for additional financial assistance to the Alliance for Progress is necessary. The AFL-CIO strongly supports this and every further step forward in the economic, social and political advancement of the Americas, and every practical effort to promote the economic integration of our sister republics.

"We urge free world cooperation in the development of the hemisphere, recognizing that economic advancement is vital to the strengthening of representative democracy and the achievement of the humanitarian goals for which all free nations strive."

Council Links Unions In Professions, Arts

—we're going to have to bring out a more attractive, thoroughly modern union."

At sessions presided over by Cogen, who served as temporary president for the founding convention, delegates adopted a constitution and resolution spelling out goals.

They voted to extend a friendly hand to legitimate professional associations "with the aim in mind that we may eventually bring them into the mainstream of the labor movement."

Another resolution cited the exclusion of many professionals from collective bargaining legislation and urged state and federal legislation to extend to them "full bargaining rights."

Delegates expressed concern at the inadequate coverage of labor's role and the history of the labor movement in schools and colleges—and the effect of this on young people entering the workforce. Communications and public relations were put down as major functions for the new council.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher challenged the delegates to take advantage of the "extreme flexibility" of the collective bargaining process to deal with the special problems of professionals.

Many of the answers, he suggested, can come from "teachers, musicians, engineers, artists and actors and others who have long since embraced and remained faithful to unionism."

A growing number of professionals, Kircher said, "are discovering that professionalism plus $1.09 will get a pound of sirloin at the supermarket on a sale day. A Ph.D. isn't worth an extra five TV stamps at the cashier's stand —and I think they are getting a little tired of seeing union laborers buy the steak while they buy the hamburger."

Participating in the founding convention were Actors Equity, the American Guild of Musical Artists, the Barbers, Broadcast Employes, Communications Workers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Insurance Workers, Musicians, Office & Professional Employes, Operating Engineers, Retail Clerks, Seafarers, Stage Employes, State, County & Municipal Employes, Teachers and Technical Engineers.

A number of other unions were represented by observers.

Establishment of the council was authorized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last summer and the constitution adopted by the new organization provides affiliation either for whatever portion of a union's membership is in the field covered by the council, with a 1 cent a month per capita tax.

The executive board, governing body between biennial conventions, is made up of the three general officers and one representative from each affiliated union. An executive secretary will be named by the board.

A statement adopted by the council stressed the change in the status of professionals from "independent artisans" to a subordinate role in a large establishment with "wages, hours and working conditions set by unilateral action" of the employer.

Union Hits State Attack On Wage Law Coverage

The State, County & Municipal Employes joined the AFL-CIO in attacking the State of Maryland's effort to exempt itself from paying the federal minimum wage and overtime rates to public employes in schools, hospitals, and similar institutions owned by a state or subdivision.

Estimated expenditures for educational institutions will reach $48.8 billion in the current school year, a union brief filed in federal district court in Baltimore by counsel Henry Kaiser and Ronald Rosenberg pointed out, with only $10.5 billion expended by private schools and colleges.

Hospital expenditures in 1965 were $12.9 billion, of which $7.4 billion was spent by private institutions, the brief continued.

"The effects of these gigantic enterprises on the national economy are substantial and well within the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce."

The brief noted that more than 100,000 State-County members are "directly and materially affected" by the 1966 wage-hour law amendments, which brought specified public employes under protection. What is "ultimately involved," it said, is the right of some 1.4 million public employes to a similar "modest protection."

Maryland (and 23 other states which joined in challenging the constitutionality of the 1966 amendments) cannot properly claim "sovereignty" as a defense, the brief declared, because it was long ago decided that "the sovereign power of the states is necessarily diminished to the extent of the grants of power to the federal government in the constitution."

Congress had ample evidence "that the states have been unwilling to provide adequate minimum wage protection" and moved to correct the situation under its commerce power, the brief continued.

"No amount of inapplicable . . . abstractions regarding state sovereignty can convert this case from anything but the familiar attempt of employers to resist the obligation to raise the wages of their employes to those modest minimums Congress has required."

Allied Industrial Union Names COPE Director

Milwaukee—Edward C. Adams has been named COPE director of the Allied Industrial Workers and assistant editor of the union's monthly newspaper. He replaces Gordon W. Brehm, now a mediator for the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board. Adams formerly was on the staffs of the Fire Fighters, the State, County & Municipal Employes and the unaffiliated Mine Workers.

Shipyard Electricians Heed T-H Court Order

San Francisco—Electricians in 11 West Coast shipyards returned to work in compliance with an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction halting a four-month strike for an improved contract. Some of the 1,300 IBEW members, however, declined to leave higher-paying jobs acquired since the strike started last Nov. 4.

U.S. District Court Judge Albert C. Wollenberg signed an order requested by Pres. Johnson through the Justice Dept. The order, compelling an 80-day return to work, was granted on the ground that the strike had affected a "substantial part" of the ship repair industry and "imperiled the national safety."

Johnson acted on the basis of an emergency board report on the strike issues and an affidavit by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara that the strike was delaying shipping needed for the Viet Nam sea lift.

The IBEW said that union members had complied with the order though they felt it merely delayed settlement of the strike issues for 80 days. After the injunction expires, it predicted, "we'll be right back where we started." The union strongly disputed the government's contention that the strike had a significant effect on the nation's military needs.

The effort to write a new contract began a year ago. The IBEW asks wages and benefits based on "electrician skills and circumstances." The Pacific Coast Shipbuilders' Association, representing employers, wants a uniform wage result for all crafts.

A Critical Battle

THE NATIONWIDE CAMPAIGN touched off by the AFL-CIO to generate support for a stronger social security system is another chapter in organized labor's dedication to the welfare of all Americans.

The trade union movement has taken the leadership in every fight to improve and expand the social security system so that it adequately meets the needs of all citizens—old, middle-aged or young, in disability, retirement or death.

It has furnished the leadership and the resources in these battles because the trade union movement is a broadly based movement concerned with the needs of all Americans, workers and non-workers, union members and non-union members.

This year a decisive battle looms to increase social security benefits for the 23 million now on the rolls and the millions who will become eligible in future years. It is a critical battle in the struggle to wipe out poverty, to bring dignity and a decent standard of living to the disabled, the widowed, the orphaned children and the aged.

It is critical also to the security, now and in the future, of every American, regardless of age or status.

The AFL-CIO is determined that this battle will be won. The nation's welfare and the public interest demand no less.

The Bond Loophole

ONE OF THE sharpest attacks ever to be made by a high public official on tax-exempt bonds has been made by Stanley S. Surrey, assistant secretary of the treasury. In a speech before the Federal Bar Association on some aspects of tax loopholes, one of his prime targets was the rapidly growing practice of local government issuance of tax-exempt industrial development bonds.

Surrey charged that this device is being used more and more "by financially strong corporations that are fully able to obtain funds through normal channels."

"Their turning, however, to these industrial development bonds," he declared, "makes them accomplices with the local issuing agencies in an arrangement that distorts the tax-exemption privilege and forces the federal tax system improperly to support their financing. Indeed, the position of accomplice is often forced upon the local agency under the threat of locating the plant elsewhere."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on Pres. Johnson to issue an executive order to bar government contracts from going to notoriously anti-labor and law-breaking corporations. It also has called on the President to crack down on the industrial bond financing situation. This practice, which largely began in the South, has now spread to no less than 37 states, many of which are acting to defend themselves against the states that are deliberately seeking runaway shops.

The fact that so many of the southern states which are leaders in the industrial bond racket have been rewarded over the past five years with more and more defense contracts gives added weight to the demand that these practices be stopped.

'Just Not Good Enough'—Meany:

Adequate Benefits for All Ages Goal of Social Security Plan

Following are highlights of the speech prepared by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for the New York social security rally:

WHEN WE TALK about social security, we are talking about the older Americans—those who have earned the right to live out their lives in dignity and independence, free from the fear of poverty.

But we are also talking about younger Americans. We are talking about the young worker who suffers an accident, or is struck down by a disease, so severely that he is totally unable to work. Social security is for him, too, and for his dependents.

Or take the young or middle-aged worker who dies. This does happen, you know, despite all the advances in medical science. Breadwinners still die of illness, or as the result of an accident.

Here again, social security comes to the rescue. It pays monthly benefits to the widow and the young children, until they are 18—or 22, if they are still in school.

There is no other insurance policy that is as good as social security—and I don't care how you figure it, whether you throw in the employer contributions and all the rest. You just can't buy that kind of protection for the money.

There is one big shortcoming in the social security system today. It is just not good enough to meet the needs of those who depend upon it.

It cannot possibly be good enough when it leaves five million pensioners below the poverty level—and I am talking about a poverty line of $1,500 a year for a single worker.

You know what the President has proposed. It adds up to 20 percent, but we ought to know what this means.

The biggest increases will go on the minimums—almost 60 percent.

That is badly-needed. We favor that.

For most people drawing social security payments, the increase will be 15 percent. Now that's not enough to meet the need. However, it is the most—in our opinion as well as the President's—that can reasonably be achieved from the Congress this year.

It is a down payment on our long-term objective—a 50 percent increase in benefits, all across the board.

The Administration bill pays for itself. It calls for a very small increase—one-tenth of 1 percent—in the tax rate, starting in 1969. It also calls for successive expansions in the tax base, the amount of earnings from which social security taxes are deducted.

The biggest effect on wage-earners is that they will pay social security taxes for a greater number of weeks than they do now. They will be buying much more than their money's worth.

The point is, in order to pay higher benefits, social security needs higher income.

All of us have been deeply concerned about the low minimum benefits. But we also need to be concerned about low maximum benefits. As wages and salaries go up, social security retirement benefits provide less protection to better-paid workers.

So the maximums, as well as the minimums, need to be raised. A higher wage base will help. But eventually, in order to achieve the kind of benefits that are needed, and in order to spread the costs of social security in a fairer way, the social security fund should be supported in part by contributions from the general revenues of the United States.

We don't expect anything of the kind this year. We are not pressing for it. But as I told the Ways & Means Committee, "We will be back."

NOW LET ME MAKE a few comments on medicare. The President's bill offers some badly-needed improvements.

To start with, it would extend the benefits of medicare to those who are receiving disability payments.

The totally disabled, by definition, are faced with big medical costs. They are faced with these costs at a time when they are least able to meet them. All the arguments that persuaded Congress to pass medicare for the aged also apply, with equal or greater force, to the totally disabled.

The President's program is essentially our program for 1967.

But I am sure the President would agree that the adoption of this bill, even with the amendments we have suggested, would be a beginning rather than an end.

This great country of ours—the richest and most powerful nation in the history of mankind—has lagged behind in assuring its citizens of full social welfare. We spend a far smaller share of our resources toward this end than other western democracies.

We can do better than that, and we must.

Morgan Says:

'Teacher Knows Best' Policy Obscures Education's Failings

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THERE WERE some fascinating tidbits in the news today (Mar. 10.) The acting state commissioner of education of New Jersey, one Joseph E. Clayton, has upheld the expulsion of a high school freshman for refusing to get a haircut. A New Englander named John U. Monro is resigning one of the most prestigious positions in academic life, the deanship of Harvard College, to become director of freshman studies at Miles College, a small, struggling Negro institution in Birmingham, Ala. Ronald Reagan, the governor of California, whose system of higher education has been called by the Los Angeles Times the "state's greatest resource," expounded a philosophy on student discipline to a news conference in Washington which might be summed up as follows: spare the hot rod and treat the undergraduate as you would a spoiled child.

Morgan

There is food for thought in all these developments but two of them, I'm afraid, have already given me an acute case of mental indigestion.

Last November, 15-year-old Francis Pelletreau was kicked out of New Milford, N.J., high school because, the local school board ruled, his Beatle-length locks violated its edict that "hair should be neatly trimmed and . . . in keeping with the general style of the times." That's a contradiction in terms right there. If the school board would brush its own hair, if any, out of its eyes it would see that the tonsorial style of the times is, to put it conservatively, Edwardian, or Late Cave Man, certainly not the crew cut that New Milford's patrician neighbor, Princeton, once helped make fashionable.

What I want to know is, what does the hirsute growth on a boy's scalp, or the way it's harvested, have to do with the equipment inside his head? It wouldn't take much of an extension of the ruling of Commissioner Clayton, who is described as having an "ordinary old haircut," to have forced the late, great Albert Einstein, once New Jersey's most distinguished resident, to see a barber, or to have caused George Washington to flip his wig before he crossed the Delaware and surprised the British at Trenton. Happily, the American Civil Liberties Union is appealing young Pelletreau's case, charging, on the basis of a 1925 Supreme Court decision, that it is unconstitutional for a state to use its power to "standardize its children."

Ronald Reagan, unhappily, shows signs of wanting to standardize a far larger swath of the population. Discussing his towering row over the issue of education in California with the Washington reporters, the governor repeated his familiar campaign injunction that "either university students abide by the rules or they pack up and get out." Then recalling an incident involving the Berkeley campus of the University of California, world capital of undergraduate sin and anarchy according to some observers, Reagan revealed more of his philosophy about how to keep order in the classroom. University officials should not negotiate with a student committee, he said. "To do that is to give away the authority of the administration."

This is the "teacher knows best" school of thought. It has merit in the kindergarten years but its relativity is in inverse proportion to the age of the pupil. Obviously, education cannot flourish in constant and utter chaos; certain rules and regulations are necessary at every class level. What Gov. Reagan's reasoning ignores, simultaneously underlining his own lack of comprehension of the educational world, is the thoughtfulness and sophistication of the country's college population. There are rebels, beatniks and downright kooks. Eighteen-year-olds on the whole, however, are not children. Many students are of voting age, are married and have children. They are less interested in blind conformity than in challenging smug assumptions.

It would be an eye-opener for many public officials, freshman governors included, to hear the sober assessments of some of these students of the difference between promise and fulfillment in the American system and why it isn't ticking.

DEAN JOHN MUNRO of Harvard College is one of those rare, sensitive citizens who hear the system missing a beat. He taught English for three summer sessions at Miles College in Birmingham, long enough to realize there were Negro students whose potential was being lost because their instruction was inferior. He decided that moving Cambridge to Birmingham was necessary to fulfill his own commitment.

The New York Times quotes Dean Munro as saying "the educational institutions of this nation have a job to fulfill the educational needs of our young people, because that is what this country is all about, but by and large they are not doing it."

Nor will they do it by regimenting high school haircuts or regimenting college campuses. But who will teach the Gov. Reagans and the New Milford school boards that education is not supposed to be a punitive exercise but a provocative adventure? The Dean Munros will—but are there enough of them?

Expanded Program Urged:

Nation Held Technically Able To Improve Health Care for All

A GREAT MANY Americans — particularly the poor — aren't getting the high quality medical and health care the nation is "technically competent" to provide, an AFL-CIO spokesman said in a network radio interview.

As a result, the health of the nation as a whole lags behind that of many other countries, Richard Shoemaker, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, charged.

The situation, he said, is getting worse. He pointed out that since 1950, the United States has dropped from sixth in rank among the countries of the world in infant mortality rates to fourteenth. Infant mortality, he said, is the most commonly used measure of comparative national health.

"It doesn't make much difference how good our medical care is if it is not reaching people," Shoemaker said, as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

That trend could be reversed if the technology that "now exists" were available on a much wider scale to people of all ages, he observed. He cited automated diagnostic procedures, sometimes called "multiphasic diagnostic screening," as one example of how chronic disease could be detected earlier, thereby increasing the chances of successful treatment and cutting its cost.

SUCH A PROGRAM is in operation now at Kaiser Foundation facilities in California on an experimental basis in cooperation with the U.S. Public Health Service, he noted. Using electronic equipment, such as "auto-analyzers" which can conduct 12 blood tests simultaneously and make perhaps 500 determinations an hour on some 40 patients, the cost of comprehensive physical examinations is reduced from about $250 to $25, he reported.

Proposals now before Congress would establish similar programs in centers around the country, Shoemaker said. The AFL-CIO has urged passage of such legislation, he said, adding that it would greatly reduce the cost of chronic illness, which is now "pretty close to $60 billion a year."

Shoemaker was questioned by Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post and Jerome Brazda, editor of the Washington Report on the Medical Sciences.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A SENATE JUDICIARY subcommittee headed by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) has been conducting hearings on a bill to prohibit the sale of drugs and eyeglasses by physicians who previously had prescribed the glasses and drugs for the patients they served.

The bill arose from the discovery that an increasing number of physicians had acquired ownership or a substantial interest in pharmacies (this came to the surface during hearings on the late Sen. Kefauver's 1962 amendments to the drug laws).

It later became known that some physicians also had developed an interest in drug repackaging houses—firms that buy drugs under their generic or chemical names, relabel or repackage them, then sell them to the public under brand names at considerably higher prices.

A question arose also about a practice by some ophthalmologists of both examining a patient's eyes and prescribing glasses and then dispensing the glasses they have prescribed.

Hart's bill is based on the perfectly apparent potential conflict of interest—the possibility that a physician of less than total personal integrity might be tempted to write prescriptions that were not really needed by a patient or turn a second-round profit by routing the patient to the pharmacy in which he has a financial interest.

There were hearings in 1964 and a Senate subcommittee report in 1965, and additional hearings on the eyeglass business. Hart introduced one bill to prohibit doctors from making a "profit" from selling products they had prescribed. This year he switched the approach simply to prohibit all such sales.

The reaction of the organized groups representing physicians has been reasonably predictable; they are against the Hart bill or any perceivable variant.

Dr. James Z. Appel, who has just finished a term as president of the American Medical Association, said the Hart measure would destroy a patient's "freedom of choice" in buying drugs and prescription devices where he pleases.

Dr. Edwin P. Jordan, executive director of the American Association of Medical Clinics, felt that the bill was based on a premise that physicians are "unmitigated scoundrels."

Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), the minority leader, opposed the bill in subcommittee, suggesting that any abuses that have arisen should be left for the states and the medical groups to correct.

STILL, there was testimony of some interest on the other side.

Earl W. Kintner, Washington counsel for the National Association of Retail Druggists, estimated that the number of physician-owned pharmacies has doubled in about five years to 3,000—about 8 percent of the association's membership.

A faculty member of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy & Science, Maven J. Myers, testified that in one city—unnamed—a group of 14 physicians who owned four repackaging houses wrote prescriptions for penicillin products at a rate two and a half times the national average, and eight times the rate among physicians who did not own drug stores.

Appel conceded for the AMA that in 1954 the association considered ownership of pharmacies by physicians as "unethical," although in 1955 it changed its mind.

Dr. Joseph M. Dixon, incoming president of the American Association of Ophthalmology, opposed the bill but conceded that restrictions were desirable on the receipt of "rebates" by doctors who apparently steer their patients to favored pharmacies or eyeglass fitters.

A spokesman for the Illinois Pharmaceutical Association charged that physicians in one small city made virtual "captives" of their patients by passing prescriptions through the wall to the pharmacy they owned.

The obvious public interest is to protect patients from overprescribing and overcharging practices by physicians with a direct financial interest in the filling of their own prescriptions. It is difficult to see how the problem can be met without special legislation.

THE UNITED STATES is "technically competent" to provide high quality medical care, yet the health of the nation as a whole lags behind that of many other countries. AFL-CIO Assistant Social Security Dir. Richard Shoemaker (center), said on Labor News Conference. Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post and Jerome Brazda, editor of Washington Report on the Medical Sciences, questioned him on the Mutual Radio Network public affairs feature.

GIRL SCOUT color guard opens New York's social security rally to warm applause from the big crowd. Leaders of civic, religious, civil rights and senior citizen organizations joined with labor in calling for a major boost in social security benefits.

SEATTLE RALLY in the city's Civic Center was one of 14 held in cities throughout the nation by AFL-CIO central bodies. This shows part of the audience which heard Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.) speak for the Administration bill.

Social Security Rallies—Coast to Coast

IMPORTANCE of social security to young and old is symbolized by this couple and their grandchild attending the St. Louis rally, sponsored by the city's AFL-CIO labor council.

A DELIGHT at Los Angeles rally was entertainment by veteran stars. From left: Benny Lessey in a dance routine, Fifi D'Orsay belting out a song, and Percy Hilton, still spry at 72.

CHARTERED BUSES brought senior citizen groups to major rally in Boston. The crowd was so great that a second ballroom was quickly obtained and speakers shuttled back and forth.

AT DAYTONA BEACH, site of one of two Florida rallies, girls from local colleges staffed literature tables at the entrance. Former Florida Gov. LeRoy Collins, the principal speaker, termed the rally evidence of labor's concern "with the social progress of all citizens."

Petition Drive Launched:

Grassroots Rallies Mobilize Social Security Supporters

right here at the grass roots when people like yourselves, many miles away, start the groundswell that eventually touches Capitol Hill in Washington."

Enthusiasm was the keynote of all of the meetings—flowing back and forth between speakers and audiences, demonstrated by standing room only crowds in most cities.

In Boston, center of the New England area rally, a second hotel ballroom bigger than the one originally scheduled was quickly rented and speakers shuttled back and forth between the two halls—with standees in each. Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, was the keynote speaker and Rep. Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., spoke for congressional supporters of the bill.

The National Maritime Union hall in New York was filled to capacity 20 minutes before the start of the meeting and the crowds kept coming. The applause began when a color guard of Girl Scouts from two Greenwich Village troops squeezed through the aisles for the opening ceremony and continued through the brief talks by a galaxy of speakers — including heads of senior citizen councils, Bayard Rustin from the civil rights movement, leading Protestant, Catholic and Jewish spokesmen and other community representatives.

Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.), a member of the House Ways & Means Committee which is currently considering the legislation, was given an ovation punctuated by cheers and shouts of approval as he pledged "full support" to the Administration's bill "as a bare minimum" to meet the need for improved social security. Besides helping the elderly, Gilbert pointed out, the President's proposals would, if enacted, be worth $200,000 in insurance to a 35-year-old man with a wife and two children.

Meany had hoped to speak in person at the New York rally. But the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions executive board meeting in Brussels prevented his appearance and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller read Meany's address (excerpts, Page 4) and spoke of the hard fight in Congress for the President's program.

Meany called for the same type of rank-and-file labor effort that led to the enactment of medicare. He stressed that labor regards the pending bill as "a down payment" on a needed 50 percent increase in social security payments, with government contributions added to the social security tax paid by workers and employers.

In Los Angeles—another standing room only rally—Hollywood stars of yesteryear entertained to the delight of the crowd and Fifi D'Orsay shared applause with speakers such as Rep. Philip Burton (D-Calif.).

Up the coast, at Seattle, rally sponsors lugged in 200 extra chairs but many still had to stand to hear Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.) speak intently of the urgent need to improve social security, "the only reliable protection for most Americans in their old age."

At Denver, Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball not only spoke; he threw the meeting open to questions from the floor.

At Milwaukee, the overflow crowd cleaned out every available literature kit and petition and gave a big hand to Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), the principal speaker.

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) was the featured speaker at the Indianapolis rally, and Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and Indiana Congressmen William G. Bray (R), Andrew Jacobs, Jr. (D) and Richard L. Roudebush (R) also were among those to greet the standing-room-only audience.

The Cincinnati audience heard from the man regarded as the nation's leading expert on the social security system—Wilbur J. Cohen, under secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

They were standing in the aisles at Cleveland to hear Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) and Machinists Sec.-Treas. Matthew DeMore, who returned to his home town to help labor's drive for the 20 percent social security raise.

In St. Louis, Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), a leader of the liberal Democratic bloc in Congress, gave the principal address.

There were 2,000 in Oklahoma City to hear Vice Pres. Humphrey and they were rewarded with what observers described as 50 minutes of HHH at his best.

"We have the capacity, in this rich country, to promise every citizen an old age of dignity and respect and security," the Vice President said.

"When social security was enacted under Pres. Franklin Roosevelt, this nation was far from rich. The best we could do was to protect our fathers and mothers, and their families, against disaster.

"But today the needs of our people are greater than yesterday —and they will be still greater tomorrow. And so is our capacity to meet those needs."

Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall came to New Orleans to spur labor's campaign and widespread local television coverage brought highlights of his talk to a bigger audience.

2 Florida Overflows

Florida, with its many retired workers, was the scene of two overflow rallies. Former Gov. LeRoy Collins, who is also a former under secretary of commerce, keynoted the Daytona Beach rally and had warm praise for labor's leadership in the campaign. At St. Petersburg, after Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) took sick and was unable to appear, a retired Steelworkers representative, Charles Cowl, stepped into the breach and set the tone for the rally.

Still ahead, on the rally schedule, is a Chicago meeting set for Apr. 9, with Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) and AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis as main speakers.

Resolutions adopted at the coast-to-coast meetings called on Congress "to take prompt, positive action to attack the deficiencies that exist in the social security system, so that older Americans, widows and children, and the disabled can live out their retirement years in dignity and self-respect rather than in poverty and despair."

'We Have Battles to Fight And Victories to Win...'

Excerpts from Pres. Johnson's filmed address to AFL-CIO social security rallies:

I have recommended to Congress social security legislation which will bring . . .

• A 20 percent overall increase in social security payments.

• An increase of 59 percent for the 2.5 million citizens now receiving minimum benefits.

• An increase of at least 15 percent for the remaining 20.5 million beneficiaries.

• A monthly payment of at least $150 for couples and $100 for individuals with 25 years of coverage.

• A series of amendments to broaden and improve the protection of social security.

There are those who say that our great social battles have all been won—that this is a time for us to rest on our laurels.

To them I say: as long as any American is left behind by progress; as long as liberty and dignity are denied to any man —we have battles to fight and victories to win.

I am counting on you to help.

Congress Urged to Bar Job Bias Based on Age

Failure to use the capabilities of older workers because of discrimination is costing America billions of dollars annually and is undermining the personal dignity and confidence of millions of citizens, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Andrew J. Biemiller, the federation's director of legislation, urged enactment of a bill to prohibit discrimination in employment because of age as a means of opening up job opportunities that are now closed to millions of elderly Americans.

Biemiller told a Senate Labor subcommittee that present employer practices have closed one-fourth of all job openings to workers over 45 and fully half of the job openings are closed to Americans past 55 years of age.

The need for corrective legislation is "virtually unchallenged," he said, "and urgently calls for correction."

Part of the employment problem of the older worker comes because of employer attitudes toward union-won seniority, pension plans, promotion-from-within policies and early retirement, Biemiller said, although these attitudes "overall have little justification in fact in present-day industry and business."

There is also no factual support from a medical standpoint for restrictive age limits, he declared, yet employers too often think of the older worker as a less efficient and more costly worker.

Support Qualified

Organized labor, Biemiller told the subcommittee, has given its qualified support to the Administration's bill as a "significant beginning" toward the objectives legislated previously to outlaw discrimination because of color and sex.

However, the bill should be expanded, he said, to rule out any exemption to small firms, which result in large numbers of employes being outside the protection of the law and, as now written, would sanction discrimination on the basis of the size of the work force.

Biemiller also challenged the bill's provision that would permit involuntary retirement of employes under 65 and he asked that the bill be broadened from its 45-65 limits to include much younger workers who suffer job discrimination, such as airline hostesses.

A further safeguard needed in the act, he cautioned, is protection of bona fide non-discriminatory seniority systems, which are the heart of thousands of collective bargaining agreements.

Particular support was given by Biemiller to the section that would direct the secretary of labor to carry out a program of education and information aimed at correcting employer attitudes toward older workers. "Making employers and other persons understand the capacities and potentialities of workers" is one of the biggest means of eliminating age discrimination in employment, he declared.

Millions Found Unable To Subsist on Benefits

More than 2 million women do not even have 70 cents a day for food despite their social security old age benefits, Mollie Orshansky of the Division of Research & Statistics of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare reported on a recent radio broadcast.

She was interviewed on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the ABC network.

Miss Orshansky said that in the period 1959 to 1965, "when we were able to reduce the number of persons in poverty from nearly 39 million to some 32¾ million. . . . the number of women living alone in poverty has increased."

She noted that the Social Security Administration relates its statistics to two levels, the low-poverty line that would allow 70 cents a day for food, and the low-income level that would allow 90 to 95 cent a day. She called the latter more realistic.

The expert on poverty reported also that the latest statistics show that average social security old-age benefits paid single persons, male and female, and married couples are both under the low-poverty and low-income levels.

"A person collecting benefits on his own wage record was getting an average of $90 a month at the end of 1966," she said. "And an aged couple was getting about $147 a month, if both were over 65. Some persons like to get their benefits at age 62 and they get less."

"A person living alone would need a little over $1,500 (a year) and that would mean he would need at least $125 a month to get by at the poverty level and a third more at the low-income level," Miss Orshansky said.

The couple's poverty level, $165 a month, contrasts with the $147 they get in social security average old age pensions.

Miss Orshansky noted that the minimum benefit a single retired person gets today is $44 a month and the minimum for a couple is $66 a month. The situation is worse with single retired women, she added.

"One fourth of all women who are now retiring for the first time at age 65 or older are getting no more than the minimum benefit," she said. "This means that even today many of our workers cannot yet look forward to a retirement which, as I like to say, is graced with the dignity of self-support."

Pres. Johnson has asked Congress to increase social security old age benefits an average of 20 percent, and to raise the wage base on which benefits are figured from the current $6,600 a year to $7,800 by 1970.

Ship Unions Assail Use of Alien Crews

New York — Three AFL-CIO unions have protested to Pres. Johnson the use of foreign nationals on U.S. flag ships carrying cargoes to Viet Nam.

The National Maritime Union, the Marine Engineers and the Masters, Mates & Pilots joined in a telegram warning that unless the manning of U. S. ships by foreign nationals is halted, "we will have no choice but to advise our members to sail no ships."

Presidents of the three unions said foreign crew members have been used both on "government-operated ships on orders of the secretary of defense" and on "privately-operated ships on orders of the secretary of state."

They stressed that "U. S. seamen have at all times been available to man these ships and we so informed these agencies."

Air Line Union Sets Deadline For Walkout

Chicago—The Air Line Employes set Mar. 19 as the date of a walkout against National Airlines unless agreement is reached on contract terms before that deadline.

Passenger service and clerical employes at National voted by a margin of more than 10 to 1 in a nationwide referendum to authorize a strike. The union said that in negotiations beginning last April, National management refused to offer wages, fringe benefits and working conditions comparable to those of other major trunk airlines—American, Continental, Delta, Eastern, Trans World and United.

Numerous negotiating meetings were held plus a number of conferences with three different federal mediators assigned by the National Mediation Board, ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert said. All were unsuccessful, he reported, and the union, having fully complied with the mediating procedure required by law, is free to strike on or after Mar. 19.

Herbert said that National has been one of the most successful and profitable of the U.S. trunk airlines flying the "lucrative" New York-Miami run and the "equally lucrative" Florida to California route.

A strike, if it occurs, will be the third in 10 years by ALEA members against National. Others were in 1957 and 1964, the ALEA head said.

Another union also reported a stalemate in negotiations with the same airline after eight months of negotiating. The Air Line Dispatchers said five mediation sessions have produced no real movement toward a settlement, according to ALDA Vice Pres. John Steele, Miami.

Hails Results So Far:

LBJ Asks $2 Billion For Poverty Effort

The anti-poverty program launched in March 1964 has produced "immediate and beneficial results" and at the same time excited controversy, Pres. Johnson told Congress in asking additional authorization of $2 billion for the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The controversy, the President said, was "inevitable" because what was being attempted was "a fundamental change in the way government responds to the needs of the poor."

"America could not wait for a decade of studies which might not even show precisely what should be attempted," he told Congress in a special message.

"New programs had to begin in our cities and rural communities, in small towns and in migrant labor camps. America had to pull the drowning man out of the water and talk about it later."

The funds the President requested for the OEO, which is headed by Sargent Shriver, would represent an increase of $460 million over authorizations for the current fiscal year ending June 30.

A substantial part of the additional money would go, however, to the Dept. of Labor and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Slum Program

The Labor Dept. would be allocated $135 million for the specific purpose of training and finding jobs for up to 100,000 slum residents in selected cities. (Story this page.)

HEW, which has been closely tied in to the pre-school special educational training embodied in the Head Start program, would continue it with new authorizations of $472 million, including $110 million for "follow-through" projects for youngsters already benefited by pre-school remedial activities.

"We must not lose the precious momentum children gain from Head Start by returning them to substandard schools," the President told Congress. "We must provide the follow-through necessary to vitalize the first years of their grade school experience."

The President gave strong support to a continued Job Corps, which he said had helped 34,000 young people to become productive — and tax-paying — citizens and asked new authorizations of $295 million "to educate, train and renew the hopes of some 50,000 young men and women."

He added a request for $31 million for the VISTA program, which now enrolls, 4,000 Volunteers in Service to America "working in the hollows of Appalachia, on Indian reservations, in migrant camps and city slums."

Mistakes Made

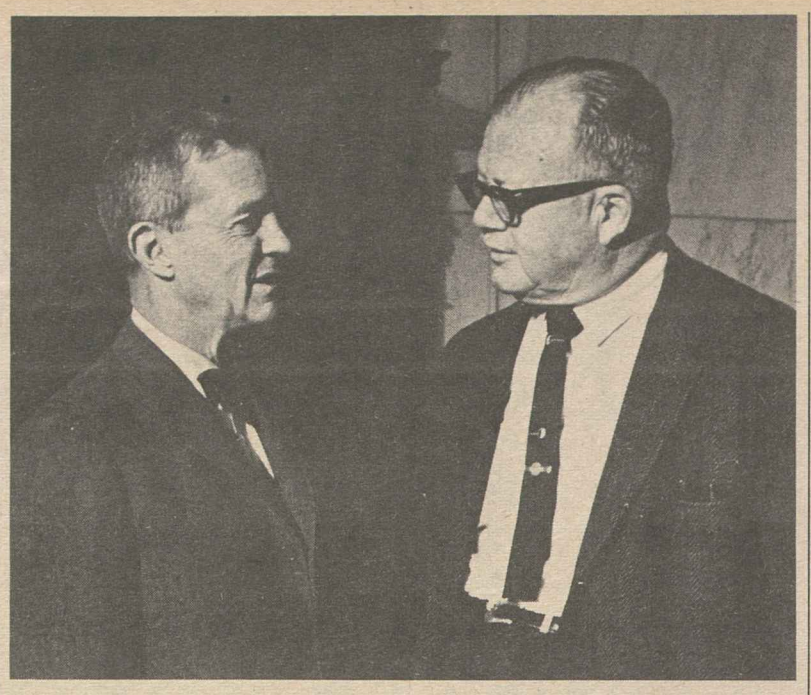
Johnson, acknowledging "confusion and mistakes" in the first two years of the anti-poverty drive, promised tightened administration and a renewed effort to bring community action agencies into the program, asked a strengthened role for the states, recommended an assistant OEO director with special authority "to coordinate and strengthen programs affecting the rural poor."

He proposed various other amendments to the Economic Opportunity Act including a recommendation that provisions "prohibiting partisan political activities be retained and strengthened wherever possible."

He also renewed earlier recommendations for neighborhood health centers, for congressional support through appropriations of the model cities and rent-supplement authorizations passed last year, for authority and funds to expand city-area transportation systems, for special aids to the children of migrant farm workers.

Federal funds and services, he told Congress in spelling out the philosophy of his anti-poverty programs, "cannot permanently free a man from the trap of poverty if he does not want to be free." He must choose to use for himself the "ladders" society can provide.

"Let it be said that in our time we pursued a strategy so that each man had a chance to be himself."



LABOR'S COMMITMENT to programs to wipe out poverty was stressed by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller at hearings held by a Senate subcommittee, headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), left.

Labor Urges Step-Up In Drive to End Need

and "the reasonable expectations of the poor are frustrated."

Biemiller praised the achievement of the Neighborhood Youth Corps, the Job Corps and the Community Action Programs and urged their expansion as "the highroad out of poverty for millions of Americans."

He urged that the present 90 percent funding by the federal government be continued because of the inability of areas where the poor are most highly concentrated to increase their level of participation. He also asked an immediate supplemental appropriation to restore vital programs that have been cut back.

Deeply Committed

By way of a report, Biemiller told the committee that the AFL-CIO is "deeply committed" to making the anti-poverty program a success. The federation has encouraged affiliates to enter into state and local programs, he said, and highly successful labor-initiated programs are under way in West Virginia, Maine, California, Wisconsin and the 10-state Appalachian region. He also noted that more than 3,000 union officials are active in Community Action Programs.

One of labor's functions has been to monitor programs at every level to determine if they are fulfilling their intended purpose, he observed.

Biemiller suggested that consideration be given to revisions in the Job Corps program "in terms of the realities of today's job market." He urged the utilization of nationally recognized private groups, "including trade unions with years of experience in manpower training for various skills." Such changes, he said, would improve the quality of training and the young men would have further assurance of more advanced training and a greater likelihood of good-paying jobs.

He predicted that the ultimate success of all anti-poverty programs would be the degree by which they are meshed with other federal programs, "particularly those which seek to provide jobs at decent pay for the millions of working poor."

He noted that most of the anti-poverty programs are aimed primarily at education, counseling and job training while more than half of the poor families have a member who has a job.

"These are the working poor," he declared, "and their impoverishment is due mainly to low wages, underemployment or unemployment."

A substantial inroad in this problem could be made, he said, through a federal program that would attack America's "huge backlog of public service needs" in parks, playgrounds, hospitals, libraries, nursing homes, highways, public protection activities, conservation and other public and private non-profit undertakings.

This program was first advanced by the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress in its report to the President. The initial program, on a five-year basis, would be funded at $2 billion and ultimately provide 500,000 jobs.

Biemiller declared that the program would add to total employment and would not displace any workers. It would provide services that are badly needed now but for which most state and local governments lack funds.

The AFL-CIO spokesman expressed confidence that the committee's examination and evalution of the anti-poverty program would show that it can be expanded intelligently and effectively. "It is our judgment that the funds committed for programs to date are inadequate, and are far less than the American people are willing to invest in achieving victory in this war."

House Clears Reinstatement Of Tax Credit

The House voted speedy approval of Pres. Johnson's request for restoration of the 7 percent investment tax credit—and added a retroactive provision giving companies which have new equipment on order a $500 million windfall on top of the more than $1 billion tax saving proposed by the Administration.

The Ways & Means Committee set aside temporarily its consideration of the social security bill to approve the tax credit measure unanimously. It voted to make it effective for all equipment delivered after Mar. 9—the date of the President's message. Johnson had asked only that it be restored for equipment ordered after that date.

One week to the day after the President's request, the legislation as approved, 386-2, and sent to the Senate.

On the other side of the Capitol, meanwhile, the Senate ratified — without amendment or restriction— the consular treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting said the establishment of consulates in the two nations would serve a "useful purpose" and provide additional protection to Americans abroad.

The treaty, requiring a two-thirds vote for ratification, was approved by a 66-28 margin.

The controversial investment tax credit was first enacted in 1962. It was proposed as a move to reinvigorate a sluggish economy by encouraging business and industry to invest in new equipment.

It was suspended last year at Pres. Johnson's request as an anti-inflation move.

Crash Program Opens To Place Urban Jobless

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has unveiled an aggressive program to reach into big city ghettos and help from 25,000 to 40,000 hardcore jobless become employable within six months.

Eight cities are in the initial target group: Cleveland, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Detroit, New York City, Boston, St. Louis and Los Angeles.

Wirtz told a press conference that an intensive survey of areas of suspected high unemployment disclosed "a pretty startling, discouraging picture."

These areas have an unemployment rate about triple the 3.7 percent jobless rate for the nation as a whole, he said.

The traditional unemployment reports, he added, undercount or miss completely many people in these areas who remain jobless for a variety of largely personal reasons.

Fund Shifts Planned

To crack this problem, Wirtz said the Labor Dept. plans to take $75 million to $90 million from its present manpower and youth corps program and concentrate the funds on those areas most in need. Pres. Johnson has asked Congress for funds to continue the program next year.

Teams of specialists from federal agencies will work with and through community action groups to help solve the problems of the hardcore unemployed on an individual basis, he said.

In cooperation with employers and unions, Wirtz explained, it is hoped that opportunities can be created for up to 40,000 persons—mainly youth. Employers will be asked "to take a chance," he said, where a person might have a police record or a garnishment record.

Wirtz said concrete programs can be launched in a matter of weeks in the first target group of eight cities. Extensive preliminary discussions have been held in these other cities: Atlanta, Houston, Newark, N.J., New Orleans, Oakland, Philadephia, San Antonio and San Francisco.

A third future group includes Jacksonville, Fla., Buffalo, Phoenix, Ariz., Baltimore, Birmingham, Ala., and four rural areas—the Mississippi delta, eastern Kentucky, northern Minnesota and northern Michigan.

Legislative Gains Cited By West Virginia Labor

Charleston, W. Va.—"Significant" improvements in taxation, human rights legislation and workers' compensation were passed by the West Virginia legislature in the session just ended, State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley said in an assessment.

Pointing to increases in both unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation benefits, Stanley said the session must be rated as one of "the most productive ever held."

Jobless insurance benefits were jumped from a maximum of $35 to $43—an "immediate increase" of $8 a week—and the system was funded by higher taxes on employers so that benefits hereafter will run at 40 percent of the average earnings of all covered workers.

The minimum benefit under the workmen's compensation system was lifted from $22 a week to $24 and the maximum from $42 to $47.

State revenue was boosted by an estimated $20.7 million through increases in corporation net profit taxes, business and occupation levies and transportation and privilege taxes.

The changes, Stanley said, marked the legislature's "growing realization" that working people have shouldered "more than their share" of the tax burden in the past and a decision "to draw revenue from those more able to pay."

A new bill on civil rights failed to include provisions prohibiting discrimination in housing, he said, but otherwise made state law in the rights field "workable and enforceable" by giving subpena powers to the State Human Rights Commission.

A bill was passed giving the state director of natural resources "complete power," except in the safety field, to regulate strip mining. Backed by the State AFL-CIO, the bill authorizes prohibition of strip mining near roads, dwellings and public property and is the "toughest" in the nation, Stanley said.

Legislation was also passed to authorize fines of up to $1,000 a day against business enterprises committing air pollution injurious to public "health and safety."

Labor Asks Full Funds For Schools

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to vote the full amount of money it authorized last year in federal aid to America's schools.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller warned that any lesser amount "will severely damage state and local programs now under way or just getting out of the planning stages."

Biemiller also gave the AFL-CIO's "enthusiastic" endorsement to expansion of the National Teacher Corps.

He told the House Education & Labor Committee that the experimental program had demonstrated its value in reaching children "in slum schools and poverty-stricken rural areas."

It should be incorporated into the Elementary & Secondary School Education Act as Pres. Johnson has asked, Biemiller said, and given "adequate financing." He declared that the Teacher Corps — made up of teams of young teacher interns and experienced teachers — has brought to slum schools "the same spirit" that has marked the Peace Corps.

The program, he said, "has made these inner city schools a teaching challenge, rather than an ordeal to be avoided." Corps members have approached their work with "a spirit of challenge and adventure." In most areas, "this spirit has proved so contagious as to infect the teachers around them with new hope and determination."

Low Budget

While no new authorizing legislation is needed to continue the major programs of federal aid to education, Biemiller expressed concern that the budget request for the coming fiscal year is far below the amount Congress has authorized for these programs.

He urged the committee to express to the House Appropriations Committee its support of federal school aid in the full amount authorized.

The federal aid program, he stressed, "is helping children from low income families toward the excellence in education they must have if they are to break the poverty cycle. It has placed books in previously empty school libraries, financed innovative educational centers."

To "stand still" on the educational front, Biemiller warned, would "destroy the hopes of those seeking to solve the complex prob-

Hours Cut, Price Hikes Seen Cause

By Robert B. Cooney

The purchasing power of factory workers fell again in February and stood 2 percent lower than in February 1966, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The decline in worker take-home pay and buying power between January and February was blamed on a decline in the factory workweek as general price levels were steadying.

CPI Rising

"The price bulge is definitely tapering off," said Arthur M. Ross, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in reporting that the Consumer Price Index edged up by one-tenth of 1 percent in February.

The CPI has risen by only three-tenths of 1 percent in the past 4 months as food price declines have largely offset strong increases in consumer service costs. Service costs have gone up 1.5 percent in this period.

The February CPI stands at 114.8. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $11.48.

Compared to a year ago, the CPI is up by 2.9 percent. Sixty percent of this rise was traced to a 5.2 percent jump in consumer service costs. Medical care services are up by 9 percent and household services by 6.3 percent.

The factory worker lost ground over the year because the decline in the average workweek from 41.3 hours down to 40.1 hours cut his take-home pay and the large rise in the cost of living reduced the purchasing power of these earnings.

The Labor Dept. reported that the spendable weekly earnings or "after-tax pay" of the factory pro-

At Social Security Hearings:

Senior Citizens Stress Need To Ease Plight of Aged Poor

America's elderly—organized 2 million strong in the National Council of Senior Citizens—appealed to the House Ways & Means Committee for social security improvements to ease "the desperate plight . . . of older Americans forced to exist on inadequate incomes."

NCSC Pres. John W. Edelman, recuperating from a serious illness, led off the testimony on behalf of the President's social security proposals. He was followed by other officers and staff members of the national council, which has more than 2,000 affiliated clubs of retirees.

The men and women receiving social security benefits "have worked all their lives to build a prosperous America but, now in their old age, are shut out from the prosperity they helped create," the council spokesmen told the committee.

The senior citizen witnesses cited statistics from government reports and documents. But they cited also letters coming into their headquarters from people like the Cleveland woman who last month wrote Edelman:

"I am 72, an American citizen, a widow for 28 years and I have worked for 46 years.

"Two and a half years ago, I fell and broke my right shoulder and elbow. That left me crippled in my arm.

"I get $83.70 a month in social security but I have to pay $50 a month in rent and for gas and light. It's mightly hard to exist after paying rent and gas and light."

Yet, the senior spokesmen pointed out, she is better off than the one in four women on the social security rolls who receive only the minimum benefit of $44 a month.

Nearly 2 million social security beneficiaries "have had to surrender their pride and dignity to keep body and soul together" by going on relief, the council witnesses noted. Many more "are too proud to ask for help . . . and often hide from their friends and neighbors because they are so bitterly ashamed of their poverty."

Appearing with Edelman, a former legislative representative of the Textile Workers Union of America, were his assistant, James Cuff O'Brien; William R. Hutton, executive director of the council, and Walter Newburgher, East Coast vice president and president of the Congress of Senior Citizens of Greater New York.

The council said the President's social security proposals have its "solid backing" although they don't

'Whole Unionism' Keys IUE Social Action Parley

By David L. Perlman

A union's job isn't done at the end of a work shift, Pres. Paul Jennings told delegates to a three-day social action conference of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

He set as the conference theme the concept of "whole unionism" and called on the 200 participants to probe the "gut problems" affecting the lives of members and not shy away from considering controversial issues.

"What good is it to negotiate the best possible contracts," Jennings asked, "when after work a union member returns to a black or white ghetto? Or is forced to send his children to an inferior school? Or stands helplessly as his friends or relatives lack decent employment opportunities? Or faces the prospects of a bleak retirement?"

Some 60 speakers, including Vice Pres. Humphrey and officials and staff experts from government agencies, the labor movement and civil rights organizations, were featured at forums and workshops which ran from early morning until late in the evening.

But some of the most effective speaking came from the floor microphones — during frequent question and answer sessions.

"This is the problem we have in my city," a delegate would begin. "What can we do about it? Who do we see? How do we get action?"

Sessions dealt with job training,

AFL-CIO Unit Pioneers In Youth Corps Training

Oakland, Calif.—The Alameda County AFL-CIO will pioneer a new type of Neighborhood Youth Corps project to imbue 410 school dropouts from Oakland poverty areas with good work habits and basic job skills.

The central body will administer the 52-week program under a grant of $1,409,040 which was approved by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

The county's three representatives in Congress—Jeffrey Cohelan, George P. Miller and Don Edwards, all Democrats — said the grant is the first allocation made to activate the NYC's experimental and developmental program.

The estimated cost will be $1,579,800, with the central body financing the difference through donated staff time, transportation and meeting hall facilities.

The council was the first AFL-CIO central body in the country to operate its own anti-poverty program, starting in 1965 with the aid of a grant from the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity. When it was completed, additional funds

Railway Labor Sets Objectives On Legislation

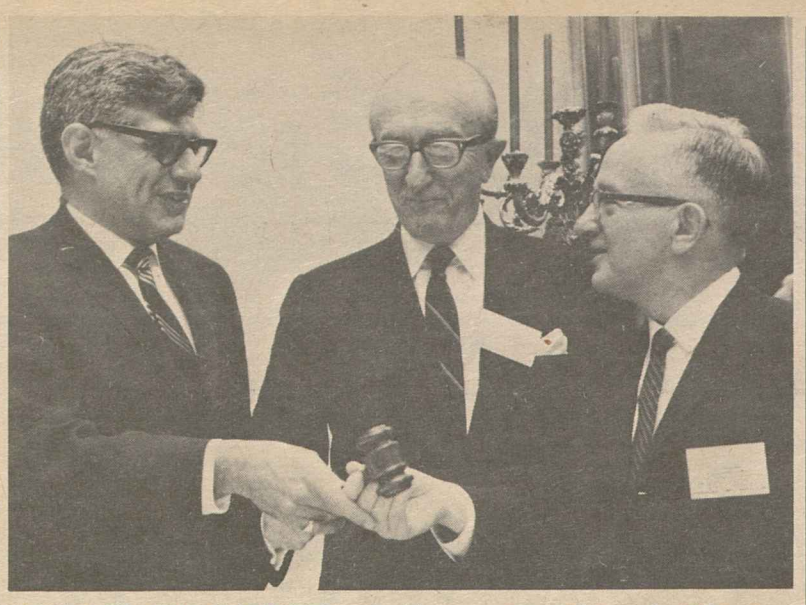
The Railway Labor Executives' Association called on Congress to enact laws giving the new Dept. of Transportation broad regulatory authority over railroad safety, stiffening the law under which rail managements have abandoned hundreds of passenger runs in recent years, and improving railroad retirement and unemployment insurance programs.

The RLEA said it was speaking for 700,000 railroad employes in 22 unions and the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. It said the employe organizations are in favor also of improvements in urban mass transit, a moratorium on rail mergers, a revitalized maritime policy, situs picketing legislation and repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act permitting states to prohibit union shop contracts.

The program was sent to each member of Congress in pamphlet form.

The association also sent Congress a research report on the rail industry's experience with several kinds of anti-strike measures. Most such measures — injunctions, compulsory arbitration, and emergency board procedures — have worked to the detriment of employes, said the report, prepared by RLEA Research Dir. Michael Marsh.

The report suggested that Congress consider improvements in federal mediation and fact-finding procedures, such as the creation of a federal Mediation Corps with standing like that of the Foreign Service or the Public Health Service.



NEW AFL-CIO COUNCIL of unions representing scientific, professional and cultural employes will be headed by Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians, shown accepting the symbolic gavel. At left is Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, who will serve as treasurer. At right, Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers, vice president of the council.

New Pay Offer Averts National Airlines Strike

Chicago—A three-year contract providing wages increases averaging 8 to 10 percent each year was won by the Air Line Employes from National Airlines three hours before a scheduled walkout of 2,800 passenger service and clerical employes.

ALEA negotiators recommended unanimously that members approve the agreement in a mail ballot with a return date no later than Apr. 3.

ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert said management valued the wage boost at 28.6 percent—5 percent of gross pay retroactive to last May 1, and the balance at six-month intervals. Station agents now at a top wage of $521 a month will go to $700 by Nov. 1, 1968, the company said. Other benefits include an eighth paid holiday; vacations of three weeks after eight years, four after 15; full company payment for health and accident insurance for employes and up to 75 percent of the cost for dependents.

The union began negotiations with National management a year ago and, after failing to reach agreement by Sept. 15, asked for the services of the National Mediation Board, as the Railway Labor Act requires. Meetings were held at the call of three separate mediators without reaching agreement, and the union finally set Mar. 19 as a settlement deadline.

ALEA had been seeking wage scales on a par with those of other major carriers, and improvements in uniform allowances, sick leave, shift differentials, group insurance and retirement benefits.

The union is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. Its members provide passenger and clerical service at three dozen National locations. Major passenger stations include New York, Washington, Miami, New Orleans, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

National is the "most profitable of all U.S. trunk airlines," the union reported.

Warns Against Complacency:

Congress Unit Cites Signs of Slowdown

The Joint Economic Committee of Congress warned against "complacent" acceptance of a slowdown in the economy's growth rate and criticized the President's Council of Economic Advisers for apparently abandoning full employment goals.

Instead of the 4 percent jobless figure "presumed" by the council, the 1967 goal should be to bring unemployment down to 3.5 percent and thereafter to 3 percent, the congressional committee said.

The joint committee, made up of 10 senators and 10 congressmen, disagreed on a number of points in evaluating the state of the economy and the annual report by the Council of Economic Advisers.

Democrats and Republicans were in accord, however, in advocating a "wait-and-see" approach to the Administration's request for a mid-year 6 percent surtax, based on anticipation of a substantial pickup in the economy later this year.

"There is considerable possibility" that the upturn may not come about, the committee said, "in which case a tax increase would be unwarranted."

The committee made a bow in the direction of the budget-cutting wing of Congress by recommending a $5 to $6 billion reduction in federal spending. But it did not spell out where it thought cuts should be made and warned against curtailing "all too vulnerable human resources programs."

Sharply dissenting from the budget-cutting recommendation, Representatives Richard Bolling (D-Mo.) and Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) stressed that if the economy is "soft" there is all the more reason not to cut federal spending.

"Furthermore," they declared, "we cannot think that any such large reductions . . . in the President's budget could be achieved without an attack on the parts of the budget which are most socially desirable, and where it would be tragic to make reductions."

The committee's majority report also called for a more sophisticated form of wage-price guidelines, including special studies of key industries by boards made up of labor, management and consumer representatives.

Republican members of the joint committee issued separate minority views calling for "new directions" in economic policies, with greater reliance on "the energy and creativity of private enterprise."

Handbag Strike Yields Major Gains for 450

Newburgh, N.Y.—A strike-ending agreement for 450 employes of Dubette, Inc., a handbag operation here, was ratified by members of Local 29, Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers.

Pres. Norman Zukowsky of the international union, who helped found Local 29, called the settlement the "best ever" in the three decades of local existence. Achieved after two weeks of picketing, the agreement gives union members a wage hike of 10 cents an hour, retroactive to Jan. 31; an additional 5 percent raise for piece-rate operations; an upward adjustment in minimum rates, and guaranteed piece-rate operations, plus other improvements.

The union had hoped that the Dubette agreement would point the way toward an early settlement of the simultaneously-called strike against Regal Handbag Co. here. But that company's president refused to bargain and rejected mediation efforts by federal and state agencies and Mayor Joseph X. Mullin of Newburgh, Local 29 officers told the meeting.

The strike against Regal and four of its contracting affiliates has kept 400 union members on the picket line since Feb. 1.

Zukowsky said Regal management's "negative" attitude and its public declarations that the firm would close up shop were the basis for a union charge of refusal to bargain filed with the National Labor Relations Board.

"It is not too late," Zukowsky said, "to achieve a settlement that makes sense both for our members and for management. If there is a compelling reason why Regal cannot go along with our proposals, that can be readily established by a look at the books."

Uniformity Sought

Union proposals were "carefully formulated," he explained, to get contract uniformity for Regal employes without affecting the position of the Newburgh handbag industry.

Meanwhile, he said, the strikers have maintained firm ranks and good spirits despite bitter weather and shutdown rumors. The union has set up a soup kitchen and pays strike benefits of $35 a week, with an emergency fund available to help in hardship cases.

The Newburgh labor movement is strongly supporting the strike, Zukowsky said.

Bargaining Seminar Set For May 3-12

The 1967 AFL-CIO Collective Bargaining Seminar will be held May 3-12, at the Kellogg Center of Michigan State University, East Lansing, Mich., AFL-CIO Assistant Education Dir. Otto Pragan has announced.

The seminar is planned to meet the specific needs of full-time union representatives and staff members in the area of collective bargaining and is designed to explore economic factors in negotiations in an era of continuous technological change.

The $50 fee includes registration, tuition, materials and three group meals, but not other meals or housing, which is available at the Kellogg Center. Further information can be had by writing Pragan at AFL-CIO headquarters, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006, or the director of the Labor Program Service of MSU's School of Labor & Industrial Relations, East Lansing, Mich. 48823.

New Film Offered On Social Security

A special 10-minute film featuring Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in behalf of stronger social security is now available for general public showing.

Prints are available to affiliated unions, state and city central bodies and local unions on a free rental basis.

The film was first shown at recent rallies held in major cities across the nation to demonstrate support for a 20 percent increase in benefits. It is suitable for showing to union meetings, PTA's, civic associations and fraternal groups as a means to enlist broader support for the legislation now before Congress.

Prints may be obtained by writing to Dir. Walter G. Davis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C.

Farm Workers' Union Seeking Public Support

Chicago—"We need help, but we expect to do the job ourselves," Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee told 450 persons attending the John A. Ryan Forum here.

The job, Chavez explained, is organizing farm workers, especially migrant farm laborers, and shaping a solid union. He called the victories in the Delano, Calif., grape strike "spadework" for the task ahead.

Chavez said the migrant farm labor movement needs help from the general public to win two things that can turn the tide for a segment of society that received an old deal while the rest of the nation enjoyed the New Deal of Franklin Roosevelt:

- Protection of the National Labor Relations Act with the right to petition for Labor Board representation elections.
- Strict enforcement of the federal law limiting the amount of free public water that can be used for private profit. The limit is 160 acres irrigated for a farmer and an extra 160 acres for his wife. Chavez said the big growers in California have made a mockery of the law.

The John A. Ryan Forum is a lecture and discussion series sponsored by the Catholic Council on Working Life and the Catholic Adult Education Center. A number of unions cooperate in promoting the program, which is a memorial to the late Msgr. John A. Ryan, a labor supporter and a leader in the fight for social justice.

After his "Report on the Migrant Labor Movement," Chavez was questioned by a panel that included Dr. Deton J. Brooks, chairman of the Chicago Committee on Urban Opportunity; Don Bruckner, correspondent for the Los Angeles Times; and the Rev. Robert A. Reicher, chaplain of the Catholic Council on Working Life and treasurer of the Illinois Migrant Council. The moderator was Msgr. William J. Quinn, assistant executive secretary of the Bishop's Committee for the Spanish Speaking.

Chavez reviewed the history of organizing farm workers and cited the long list of failures. He said the job must be done by farm workers themselves. "We started out," he said, "by working on problems of the migrant worker at the community level. We formed an insurance company because that was the only way we could get insurance.

"We started a credit union and then built a community service center to hold the people together. We decided the best way was to organize the whole community and then build the union."

The organization, he said, is leaning on the AFL-CIO for help with research and educational programs and winning the legislation needed to bring farm workers under the protection of federal labor laws.

"The rest we will do," he declared. "We need money and we could use volunteers in Delano, but we must do most of what has to be done by ourselves. Everyone in labor can help by supporting our boycotts."

When questioned about the threat of automation in the fields, Chavez said, "We are not against automation. In many cases we have welcomed automation because it has eliminated some work that was not fit for human beings. When new machines are brought in, we want the growers to take some responsibility for the people.

"We are happy to help improve production. There are many people around the world going hungry. If more production here can help feed them, we would be proud to help."

British Strike Activity Down Sharply in 1966

London—Last year's total of 1,944 strikes—421 fewer than in 1965—was the lowest in Great Britain since 1953, the government said.

Social Action Conference:

IUE Parley Keyed To 'Whole Unionism'

housing, youth, education, political action, equal opportunity for Negroes and women.

At an evening dinner program, the Vice President imbued the delegates with his own buoyant enthusiasm, challenging and scorning those who want to "pause" when there is so much to be done to meet America's problems.

"Take whole unionism very seriously," Humphrey said. "I want the unions of America to get involved. If there's a problem in your town, get busy on it. It can be corrected."

He warned that programs begun in the 89th Congress could be scuttled if the viewpoint prevails in this Congress that "it's not popular or politically wise to legislate for the people."

'We'll Make Mistakes'

In trying "to reach people who up to now have been unemployable," Humphrey said, "we'll make mistakes. You'll read about them." But, he stressed, tens of thousands of young people are being salvaged. "This is no time to pause. This is the time to look ahead."

Jennings cited to the conference the examples set by IUE members who have involved themselves and their locals in "whole unionism."

He spoke of a Rochester, N. Y., member who "is knocking on doors" to recruit applicants for a program "which has already trained 150 Negroes in job skills they never believed they could acquire."

He cited a group of members in Holland, Mich., as "active in bringing decent housing, jobs, education and recreational facilities to impoverished Spanish-Americans."

Jennings praised IUE leadership in the Arizona Consumers Council "which organizes programs to protect our paychecks at the checkout counter."

A local union officer "is spearheading a very successful effort to place the youth of Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant ghetto in jobs at the local's 31 plants," he noted.

Jennings cited as an example of following up "legislative action with social action" AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's call for central labor councils to police enforcement of the minimum wage for unorganized as well as organized workers, and he called on IUE members to cooperate actively.

"How can a union ignore problems involving the poison in the air we breathe, the impurities in our water supply, the difficulties we face getting to and from work?" Jennings asked.

The answer, he suggested, lies in "social action, political action, legislative action and trade union action — that's what we mean by whole unionism."

SOCIAL ACTION CONFERENCE of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers is keynoted by IUE Pres. Paul Jennings. Backdrop expresses theme of the three-day session in Washington: "to promote whole unionism."

Bargaining Objectives Set for Copper Industry

Salt Lake City—Major improvements in wages, income security and pensions were spelled out as goals in coming copper negotiations by the first collective bargaining conference called by the Steelworkers and the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers since their affiliation.

In addition, elimination of wage and benefit inequities built up during years of division in the ranks of labor will be sought under the mandate laid down by more than 400 delegates from 220 locals.

The two unions recently agreed to merge, with Mine-Mill locals scheduled to receive USWA charters on June 30.

USWA Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony and Mine-Mill Pres. A. C. Skinner announced the program at a joint press conference.

The delegates represented more than 45,000 employes of major producers who are covered by contracts that expire June 30. Negotiations are expected to begin May 1.

The conference got under way after a welcoming speech in which Gov. Calvin L. Rampton (D) urged the delegates to "fight just as hard as you can for the wages and working conditions of your members." He predicted that a "just settlement" can be reached without a work stoppage.

The delegates voted to seek a substantial wage increase after hearing USWA Research Dir. Otis Brubaker report that most nonferrous metals companies are in their best financial shape ever, that their long-range prospects are good and that they have not been sharing with their employes the prosperity growing out of an annual 5 to 6 percent increase in productivity.

Among other proposals approved are:

- Cost-of-living escalator clauses "to protect 'real' wages and living standards."
- An increase in pensions to $6 per month for each year of service plus other retirement improvements.
- A ban on contracting-out of all work within the scope of the bargaining unit.
- A uniform supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) program to provide a "reasonable" guaranteed income level.
- Payment of $150 per year of service upon discharge or permanent layoff and a minimum of $150 per year of service in case of death, retirement or permanent disability.
- A prohibition against layoffs because of technological change, automation or improved operating methods, or for any reason other than a cut in operating schedules or the permanent shutdown of a plant or major part thereof.
- Strengthened anti-discrimination provisos aimed at ending bias in hiring and promotions.

Skinner and Molony said that employers whose agreements expire this year will be asked to join in industrywide bargaining so that uniform wages, benefits and contract expiration dates can be reached. Such an approach, they said, would provide security for the companies as well as their employes.

New COPE Leaflets Spur Dollar Drive

Two new pamphlets promoting the COPE dollar drive are now available for free distribution.

They are COPE Publication No. 172C, "Wanta Lick Some Problems?" and No. 173C, "5 Reasons Why You Should Not Give a Buck to COPE (and 1 Reason Why You Should)." They must be ordered by publication number through COPE, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Social Security Petition Drive Called 'Vital'

Letters, visits and petitions to congressmen and senators in support of Pres. Johnson's social security bill are "vitally important," the AFL-CIO said in a Legislative Action Bulletin.

The Easter recess, when most congressmen will be in their home districts, is an opportunity for visits by union delegations, the bulletin noted. But it stressed the importance of demonstrating through letters and petitions "strong widespread support for the President's social security bill — and opposition to anything less."

The bulletin, prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, said congressmen not on the House Ways & Means Committee should be asked to express support of the Administration bill to committee members, since whatever legislation is approved by the committee will be brought to the House floor under a no-amendment rule.

Enclosed with the bulletin was a sample of the petition union members are circulating in support of higher social security benefits. The legislative newsletter advised:

"Circulate these petitions at union meetings, homes for elderly people, church meetings, and any other meeting places where you know people will be concerned about social security improvements. Remember that the Administration social security bill will help widows and will protect the families of working people in addition to raising pensions for retired people.

"If you need more petition sheets, just ask us. We will send you as many as you need."

High Joblessness Holds in 9 Areas

The Labor Dept. has reported that its regular survey of the nation's 150 major manpower centers showed only nine with substantial unemployment in February, unchanged from January.

A year ago, there were 18 such areas—that is, with 6 percent or more jobless.

In a listing of smaller areas with substantial unemployment, six midwestern areas were removed: Crookston, Minn.; Dexter and Milan, Mo.; Ada and Anadarko, Okla. and Ashland, Wis. Three smaller areas were added to the list: Anchorage, Alaska; Rome, Ga. and Manteo, N.C.

UAW Skilled Trades Outline Wage Goals

Atlantic City—Delegates representing 200,000 skilled tradesmen in Auto Worker local unions put "substantial" wage increases, salary status, a guaranteed annual income, and wage parity for Canadian workers among their major goals in contract bargaining this year.

The UAW's 12th international skilled trades conference, comprising 920 voting delegates and 348 fraternal delegates, called for a substantial wage inequity increase for skilled workers in auto factories. Delegates further urged that the subcontracting of work outside the bargaining unit be made a strikeable issue in future contracts. The conference also drafted other proposals for forwarding to the UAW executive board and the union's special collective bargaining convention scheduled for Detroit, Apr. 20-22.

Similar bargaining demands previously were drawn up at separate conferences of the office, technical and professional employes and of farm equipment workers. Delegates from production worker locals will meet soon to spell out their suggestions for changes in contracts which expire Sept. 6 at General Motors, Ford and Chrysler plants in the U.S., Sept. 16 at American Motors and Nov. 15 in "Big Three" plants in Canada.

The skilled tradesmen voted full support of a UAW policy statement setting "substantial wage and salary increases and a higher annual improvement factor for all UAW members" as a top priority demand in 1967 negotiations. There must be no tampering, delegates stressed, with contract cost-of-living clauses.

'Full Equity' Asked

They asked commitment of the "full resources" of the union in winning "full wage equity" for all members. They urged the UAW, in seeking sizeable inequity raises for the skilled trades, to use the standard of "equal pay for equal work being performed by workers outside the bargaining unit as the measure of our objective."

The skilled tradesmen pledged to join with other UAW members at the April convention "in a spirit of unity and solidarity to formulate a bargaining program" providing better pensions, insurance, holidays, vacations, paid absence allowances and other benefits in which all members have a common interest.

Despite "some slackening in sales," the auto industry "enjoyed its second best production and profits year" in 1966, the delegates noted. They observed that dividends paid to stockholders have risen at rates far outstripping the pace of worker wage growth while companies "failed to share the fruits of increased productivity with consumers."

Card Check Recognition Ruling Stands

The Supreme Court refused to review, and thus let stand, a lower court ruling that the National Labor Relations Board had properly ordered a Terre Haute, Ind., employer to bargain with the Retail Clerks on the basis of signed authorization cards.

RCIA Local 550 lost an election at the store of Conren, Inc., but later got signed cards from a majority of employes and asked the employer to bargain on the basis of the cards. The management refused to bargain and started a campaign to undermine the union's majority, according to a charge filed with the NLRB.

The board upheld the charge and the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Chicago, enforced the order to bargain after rejecting Conren's claim that the union had not waited a year after the first election before seeking bargaining rights again. An appeals court majority decided it could not interfere with the union's right to take either one of two routes to representation—an election or a cardcheck.

Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart was recorded as in favor of admitting the case for review.

Rothman Joins Headquarters Staff

Julius F. Rothman, coordinator of the AFL-CIO Community Services liaison staff of the United Community Funds & Councils of America, has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

A graduate of Syracuse University, Rothman is a member of the Textile Workers Union of America and has been active in the labor movement since 1946. He is a member of the National Association of Social Workers and the Labor Dept.'s Advisory Committee on Sheltered Workshops; a director of the National Social Welfare Assembly and a trustee of the National Institutes on Rehabilitation & Health Services.

Warning Signs

THE NO-CHANGE THEME that marked the February unemployment figures seems to indicate that the economy is sailing along smoothly through the winter months. But the Labor Dept.'s report is cause for concern also that there may be some rough seas ahead.

While the unemployment rate remained steady in February in the face of a drop in industrial production and declines in other leading indicators of economic activity, there was a marked drop in manufacturing employment, a counter-seasonal trend in part-time work for economic reasons and a sharp decline in the average factory workweek.

Taken together with other indications of a slowing down of activity, there is reason for worry that the economy is perhaps becoming more sluggish than anticipated by the Administration in its earlier forecast.

MANUFACTURING employment dropped by 65,000 in February with what the Labor Dept. called "small but widespread declines" in both the durable and non-durable goods industries.

The number of non-farm workers on part-time work for economic reasons usually declines slightly between January and February. But last month it increased by 100,000 to 2 million.

The factory workweek, which moved up to 41.3 hours in the spring of 1966 and remained at that level through the fall, has been declining steadily since November 1966. Last month it dropped seven-tenths of an hour to 40.3, a very sharp decline for this particular index of activity over a one-month period.

The drop in hours is reflected by a similar drop in average weekly earnings for factory workers, a decline of $1.54 over the month to $111.48. This happened while average hourly earnings increased slightly.

The dropoff in weekly earnings combined with the erosion of buying power by the continuing increase in living costs results in a sizable dent in consumer purchasing power, a major prop for healthy economic growth.

THE PORTENT of economic troubles in the Labor Dept. report is sustained by reports of other government agencies indicating a flattening out or slowing of retail sales, a continuing problem with inventories on merchants' shelves and the drop in industrial production for two successive months.

The Administration had warned in its own economic analysis that the first six months of 1967 would find a certain sluggishness in the economy. It has moved to bolster the badly sagging construction industry and has taken other steps to stimulate economic activity.

The problem of the moment is to keep a close watch on the economy and move quickly to shore up the weak spots as and when they develop, using the full potential of both fiscal and monetary policy.

The past six-year period of economic growth has demonstrated that government policies can be used effectively to keep the nation moving ahead while maintaining stability.

The key is to move early enough and quickly enough to head off trouble before it flares into a major economic headache.

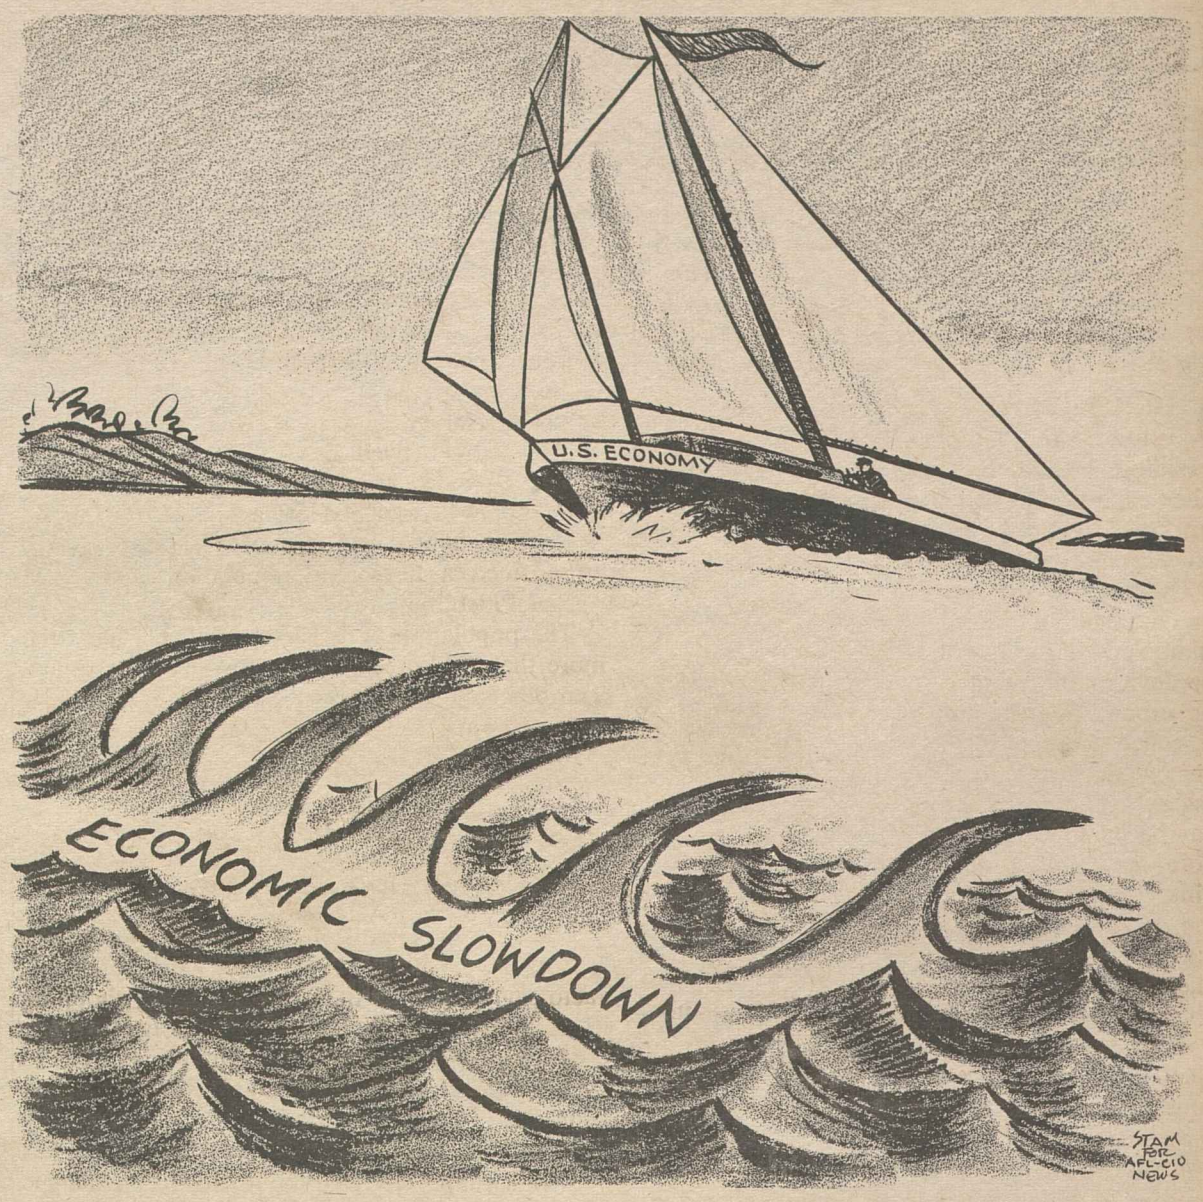
Steer Clear



Wirtz Looks at the Press:

Deluge of Trivia, Half-Truths Seen Drowning Genuine News

The following is excerpted from remarks by Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz to the Overseas Press Club in New York City.

IF THE IDEA of democracy should ever be invalidated it would be because it came about that more and more people knew less and less that was true about more and more that was important. . . . This is the direction of things today; the responsibility for this lies significantly, though by no means entirely, with the mentors of the mass media.

Indeed, the "expanded view" is that in consequence of our sometimes equal, sometimes separate misdemeanors, a considerable part of what the public reads and sees and hears about the conduct of its public affairs is such a diluted and artificially colored version of fact and truth that if it were a mouthwash the Federal Trade Commission would divide three-to-two on whether to let it on the market.

Perhaps that is the answer: A Pure Speech and Press law recognizing the consumer's equal need for protection against what gets into his stomach through his mouth and what gets into his head through his eyes and ears.

It isn't a matter of truths and lies. There are, to be sure, always a handful of correspondents, columnists—and politicians—hungry enough to eat on their own knowingly false words, cold enough to use whole cloth, shameless enough to say or print what they know isn't true.

The problem is rather with the truth that lies—when it is turned against itself by someone's passing off part of it as the whole; by putting in words that deliberately mislead the reader but leave the writer ample alibi; by adding an adverb; by some trick juxtaposition of words and facts; by leading a story with some little sick fact that infects everything that follows.

When the coverage of a major address by some public official seeking earnestly to find the common wisdom about how to achieve peace for the world is led by an account of 50 student hecklers, with pictures of the pickets in an adjoining front page column, and the speaker's point appearing on the carry-over page—it becomes fair to ask whether the news editor and the makeup man are putting circulation and civilization in the right balance.

When, among a generation of youth working harder at its books than any before it and announcing its ideals of service by over-subscribing the Peace Corps, only its maverick draft card burners, drug addicts, and lovers of four-letter words are publicized in the press—it is a fair question whether that press is more interested in its own future or that of the human race.

WHOSE SIDE is the press on in the civil rights revolution? Any self-righteous answer about neutrality on the side of truth leaves the question of what ethic there is—except selling more papers—for giving daily front page advertising to any white supremist or non-white racist who coins an ugly phrase or whose dementia drives him to murder—while there is only occasional notice on the inside pages of the rest of a nation's throwing off the shackles of centuries' bondage of bigotry.

When the worsening of any condition (a strike, for example; or an increase in the cost of living) is almost automatically front page news, but its significant improvement gets little or no attention—it is a fair question why the press takes trouble as its special client, except that it pays so well.

Successful personal communication depends, in general, on the confidence in each other from which it starts, and improves with familiarity. That can't be relied on here. It would probably be better if we didn't even know each other by first name—at least during working hours.

Another footnote: Growing up wanting to be a newspaperman, I thought of "a scoop" as one of the magnificent professional achievements. Now I find it usually comes from "a leak"—something that has a market price: making the leaker look good, either on this story or the next one. You pay it. We accept it. Usually nobody is hurt. Sometimes the casualties are colleagues, competitors, occasionally the truth, always the integrity of the relationship.

Even "briefings" and "back-grounders" and "off-the-record sessions" leave me uneasy. Their value is unarguable. So is their danger. Their intimacy is soft, and this relationship needs to be tough and uncompromising.

So I speak for what I guess is only an obvious ethic: That the press must be critical of government; but that neither the press nor the government is entitled to the pursuit of self-regarding interest; and that neither is entitled to administer the truth on any except the truth's own terms.

Morgan Says:

Inner City Crisis Grows Worse As White-Negro Gap Widens

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THE UNITED STATES presided over the invention of the atomic bomb and it is now presiding, negligently, over the preparation of another explosion which it must prevent if American cities are to be saved from sociological destruction.

Morgan

To compare the wartime devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki with the devastation threatening urban America may be called an inappropriate and downright reckless exaggeration. There may be parallels that are more apt. But I don't think it is an exaggeration to say that unless drastic measures are taken soon against the violent deterioration of the nation's metropolitan areas, the damage to the country will have to be equated in terms that will cause historians to conclude that it might as well have been subjected to a nuclear attack.

A volcanic series of race riots need not erupt in order to make that dour projection prophetic. The "inner city" is already dying and the mortal wound is more likely to be inflicted by careless neglect of the crisis than by another Watts. The problem is to awaken ourselves to the problem so that we may apply constructive intelligence in dealing with it, while there is still a little time. What is killing the city? A lot of things. Traffic jams. Air pollution. Waterways poisoned with sewage. Noise. Et cetera. Scientific planning can solve some if not all of these afflictions. The cost will be painfully high but it will be painfully higher the longer reforms are delayed.

What the scientists have not invented, however, is a way to deal with the most insidious defect of all, the problem within the problem—the segregated slum. There is a solution but its very simplicity only dramatizes the terrible complications which beset it.

The solution is for people to live in neighborhoods instead of in enemy encampments. But this involves sacrificing the prejudices nurtured in ignorance and fear. And these dubious luxuries, so long clutched in the strongbox of emotion, are not easily given up. Yet if we study the situation a little more closely, what alternative is there?

In a speech in Washington before the Federal Bar Association, Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, said that "quite simply, the action we take (or fail to take on these facts) in the immediate future . . . may well determine the fate of the republic."

Today in America more people live in slums than live on farms. This reflects, in part, an "explosive increase of the Negro population in northern, central and western cities (which) represents one of the most dramatic social changes in urban history . . . In 1910 . . . 73 percent of all Negroes lived in rural areas. Today 73 percent of all Negroes live in cities. In just one decade New York City lost a middle class white population almost the size of Washington . . . and gained a non-white population almost the size of Pittsburgh."

The population of Washington, D.C., has been more than 50 percent Negro for nearly 10 years. Ten other major cities will shortly join that category. Newark, N.J., and Gary, Ind., already have. Gary has one of the most menacing morasses of unsolved racial problems in the country.

NO OTHER ethnic group, Young reported, has ever made up so large a proportion of the population as does the Negro today—11 percent. But the urban Negro has become trapped in the ghetto as middle-class whites continue to flee to the de facto segregation of the suburbs, taking shopping centers, better schools, industry and tax revenue with them. The inner city is rapidly becoming a kind of ghost town, increasingly inhabited, you might say, by black ghosts.

A brilliant, responsible citizen, Young and his staff and supporters have built the Urban League into one of the most effective agencies in the land in breaching barriers against Negroes in the areas of jobs and housing.

Ironically, like Roy Wilkins and the NAACP, both Young and the league have had their leadership at least temporarily discredited among the increasingly impatient Negro population as the white power structure failed to keep pace with the civil rights revolution and as young "activists" like Stokely Carmichael have drawn more and more headline attention. Never any real threat in itself, the terrible damage that the "black power" shibboleth has done, as New York Times Columnist Russell Baker so caustically notes, was to make bigotry respectable again.

But if the crisis of the city is to be solved, black and white Americans alike must open their minds to the urgent reasonableness of men like Whitney Young as they argue that massive, varied but coordinated efforts must be made in the ghetto to redeem or replace housing, make schools excellent and social services adequate, no matter what the composition of the population.

The gap between the white and non-white population, Young warns, is not narrowing. It is widening. It will take responsible leadership on both sides to close it. The responsibility, in this case, is heavier with the haves than with the have-nots.

Lack Labor Law Protection:

Farm Workers Seen Forced Into 'Jungle War' to Win Rights

FAILURE TO GIVE farm workers an "orderly procedure" for choosing a collective bargaining agent has thrust them into "jungle warfare days," an AFL-CIO spokesman has charged.

Calling for extension of the National Labor Relations Act to farm labor, William L. Kircher said farm workers now have to "picket and strike and do all of the things that the policy of this nation is dedicated to eliminating" to achieve what other workers can get through "normal, peaceful procedures."

Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, made the statement on Labor News Conference, a Mutual radio network program.

The AFL-CIO is also pressing for other legal safeguards for farm labor, Kircher said, including "adequate coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, unemployment compensation, industrial compensation, health and safety laws, child labor laws and other federal legislation from which the rest of the workers in the nation have benefited."

While "there might have been a question a quarter of a century or so ago" whether the farm industry came within the framework of interstate commerce, there is no longer any doubt, he said.

MAJOR OPPOSITION to protection of farm workers comes from the powerful political pressures of the farm bloc and other portions of the power structure [that] have never looked too kindly upon the extension of first class citizenship to farm labor," he said.

Kircher declared the AFL-CIO is "encouraged today to note that there is substantial interest in the extension of federal legislation, particularly in the field of labor relations policy, to farm workers—interest among groups other than the organized labor movement."

Reporters questioning Kircher on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced weekly public affairs feature, were William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, and Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

TWO MONTHS AND A HALF after the 90th Congress came to town, the Senate managed to pass a supplemental money bill largely providing funds for the war in Viet Nam. The Senate changed the language of the House-approved measure so that now it must go back to the House for concurrence. Congress then hied itself off for an 11-day Easter recess.

The pattern is entirely familiar at the opening of a new Congress. Things move slowly—especially appropriations bills. But slowness of the pace causes some concern about the sense of realism—or delusion—the Senate showed when it passed the Monroney reorganization bill providing for a full month of vacation for Congress in August.

Generally speaking, Congress doesn't get around to acting on the final appropriation bills until August. It is always possible for the departments to be authorized, by simple resolution, to continue spending beyond the June 30 end of the fiscal year at the same levels actually appropriated for in the previous year but this is at best a half-satisfactory system.

The machinery, in short, is still clanking and groaning, and it is very doubtful that other provisions of the Monroney bill—increased staff personnel for the members, increased staffs for the committees—will make the Senate a truly efficient body.

THE INSTITUTE FOR AMERICAN DEMOCRACY has documented the launching of a new major propaganda effort by the John Birch Society to persuade the public that the Johnson Administration sent American troops to Viet Nam with the deliberate purpose of making them fight at a "terrific disadvantage," that Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson—all three—have been "visibly and actively" on the side of Communist aggressors, that Communist influences headed by Col. Edward House "were controlling Woodrow Wilson whether Wilson was conscious of it or not," that Franklin D. Roosevelt was "fully aware" that he was "completely surrounded" by Communist influences in the White House, that "Moscow and Washington are, and for many years have been, but two hands of one body controlled by one brain."

The basic Birch Society material consists of two publications by Robert Welch—one a "position paper" called The Truth in Time, the other a copyrighted booklet entitled The Truth About Viet Nam. Along with these precious works, petitions to Congress are being circulated implying that "traitors" have been engaging in "specious excuses" and "deceptive doubletalk" to fob off their "criminal folly (or worse)."

Neither the "position paper" nor the petitions bear any imprint indicating that they are John Birch Society documents. Patriotic citizens, including Birch Society members, are simply urged to help the drive "become the most massive plea by petition ever directed at the American Congress."

THERE IS SICK STUFF such as a charge that "bipartisan treason [is] rampant everywhere" and a rhetorical question in the Birch Society Bulletin asking whether the death of American GIs constitutes "deliberate, conscious and coldblooded murder on the part of the Johnson Administration."

Well, the President of the United States is no traitor and neither were Presidents Kennedy and Eisenhower before him. Neither was Harry S. Truman nor Franklin D. Roosevelt, and neither was Woodrow Wilson, nor was the latter "controlled" by Communists.

For that matter, neither was President William Howard Taft, who preceded Wilson, nor Theodore Roosevelt, who preceded Taft, nor William McKinley, who preceded the first Roosevelt. The country did not grow and flourish on "bipartisan treason," and only extraordinarily confused people could harbor the nightmarish delusion that "treason" is the explanation for the anxieties and tensions that are the common lot of man—in this country and others. The nation flourished because we have been led by decent and honorable public servants, each in his time doing his best to meet the responsibilities of his time.

Unmet Backlog Cited:

Drive Urged to Close Public Facilities Gap

The nation's unmet backlog of public facilities and public services, the result of years of neglect, can be met only by substantially increased planning and expenditures by government at the federal, state and local levels, an AFL-CIO spokesman has declared.

The demand has grown as the population increasingly shifted from the nation's rural areas to the cities and suburbs, Marvin Friedman, economist in the Dept. of Research, writes in "The Public Facilities Gap" in the current issue of the American Federationist.

In addition, Friedman continues, the people have striven to attain "greater aspirations," thus lengthening the gap between need and availability in such areas as "paved streets and highways; bridges and tunnels; storm sewers and sanitary sewers; schools, colleges and libraries; hospitals and clinics; police and fire protection; public utilities; parks, playgrounds and recreation centers; airports; museum and theaters; clean air and clean water; public transportation."

Rely on Government

Most of these services and facilities, Friedman points out, are those for which people rely on government. He continues:

"For many years, when the depression and World War II caused shortages of money, manpower or materials, these public needs went neglected. And programs since the end of the war have hardly reduced the backlog. Of the nation's public schools, for example, 14 percent were built before 1920, while 15 percent of the libraries date from the turn of the century."

A "reluctance to spend enough money to meet these needs" has been the basic problem but not the only one, he notes, citing a lack of sufficiently-detailed information upon which to base long-range estimates of needs.

This gap has been partly closed by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, which sponsored a study, "State and Local Public Facility Needs and Financing," that represented the findings of experts in many fields.

Friedman praises the report as "comprehensive, covering needs in about 40 different kinds of public facilities," but points out that it is admittedly conservative and that the estimates of needs may be on the low side.

"Even at that," he observes, "the experts believe that state and local governments will have to step up their public facility capital outlays considerably if they are to meet these needs. In 1956, these expenditures came to $20 billion. By 1975, they will have to total more than $40 billion. And, over the entire 10 years, the experts estimate that state and local governments will be required to spend a grand total of $328 billion to finance public needs."

Each $1 billion spent on public facility construction, Friedman says on the basis of Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates, means 100,000 jobs for one year on the construction site and in the production and distribution of equipment and materials, "plus somewhere between 50,000 to 100,000 more jobs as a result of increased sales to consumers."

He summarizes the Joint Economic Committee's findings in a number of specific areas, including water supply, storm sewers, sanitary sewers, public education at all levels, health facilities and transportation.

"The study has provided numbers in the aggregate," he says. "What is sorely needed now are the details—state by state, community by community. The federal government should lose no time in urging these other governmental units to come up with the specific projects, based on their anticipated needs over the next decade.

Grants-in-Aid

"The federal government can then plan ahead in terms of its grants-in-aid programs. During the current year, federal grants for public facilities approximate $4.9 billion. In the years ahead, this figure will obviously have to increase considerably in view of the expected growth in public facility needs."

Friedman recalls that the 1965 AFL-CIO convention urged the federal government "to develop, coordinate and maintain a national inventory of [public] needs . . . based on present backlogs and future population growth."

Each year, he concludes, there is more pressure for additional facilities to catch up with the backlog and to provide for growth. The needs can be met, he maintains, "only by a planned national effort, with vigorous federal leadership and financial aid."

Labor Scores 'Give-Away' Lures In Plan to Develop Oil Shale Lands

Strong opposition has been expressed by the AFL-CIO to proposals by Sec. of the Interior Stewart Udall for immediate development of the rich oil shale reserves in the West as possibly opening the door to "monopolistic exploitation" benefiting a few giant companies.

The federation's attitude was made clear in a letter from Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), chairman of the Committee on Interior & Insular Affairs.

Biemiller pointed out that oil shale under more than 5 million acres in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming is valued at anywhere between $300 billion to $2.5 trillion and that "revenues to the federal government from an orderly leasing program at the proper time and under appropriate safeguards will be enormous."

"The importance of our shale oil reserves for this country's future energy requirements can scarcely be exaggerated," Biemiller said. "We believe these resources should be delevoped in such a way as to bring the broadest possible benefits to the public welfare, to strengthen the economy, to insure constructive competition, to prevent private monopoly over major natural resources and to protect the affected environment."

The AFL-CIO supported Udall in his recommendation for a 10-year study of the problems involved in development of the oil shale. But it opposed proposals by the secretary "which would lead toward commercial leasing of shale oil lands before the major problems of public interest protection, technology and conservation are solved."

Specifically, the federation objected to the exchange of private oil lands for public oil-shale-bearing lands for development purposes and to the opening up of federal oil shale lands to test development by private interests.

Biemiller pointed out "that there is nothing to stop the giants of the oil industry from developing extraction and processing methods for the oil shale lands that they own privately already. There is no need to lure these companies into action with give-away, open-door opportunities to lease or acquire federally owned oil shale lands."

He said that the AFL-CIO is not opposed to development of America's oil shale resources, but only "on full and complete protection of the public interest with such restrictions and controls as may be necessary to prevent monopolistic exploitation which benefits a few giant oil companies. These goals cannot be achieved—and, indeed, will be defeated—if the major responsibility for shale oil development is turned over to private industry."

Biemiller also cautioned the Dept. of the Interior and the Atomic Energy Commission with regard to proposals for breaking up oil shale deposits through underground atomic explosions.

"We believe the greatest possible safeguards must be adopted to prevent excessive release of radiation into the environment above and below ground and to prevent unanticipated, dangerous underground environmental affects," he said.

U.S. Asks Court Uphold Union Picket Line Fine

U.S. Solicitor Gen. Thurgood Marshall urged the Supreme Court to uphold the right of a union to fine members who cross its picket line during a lawful strike.

Marshall appeared on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board, which has upheld the right of two Auto Workers locals to fine members who worked during a strike at Allis-Chalmers plants and to sue in state courts to collect the fines.

The penalized members, represented by a company attorney, argued that the fines violated the Taft-Hartley Act by "coercing" workers and by going beyond the law's requirement that a union shop requires only that a worker pay dues and initiation fee in order to keep his job.

Marshall made the point, in oral argument before the court, that the workers involved had voluntarily accepted full union membership, with both rights and responsibilities. The union, he said, has not tried to get the penalized members fired or to interfere with their employment status.

"Union solidarity," the solicitor general argued, is basic to effective unionism and the members "submitted to majority rule" when they agreed to become full union members and not just pay dues to the union which bargains for them.

Also participating in the oral argument before the court was a UAW attorney, John Silard, who said Congress never intended to prohibit normal union discipline in a strike situation.

The NLRB ruling in behalf of the UAW was initially upheld by a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The full circuit court reconsidered the decision, however, and ruled against the labor board position.

SEABEE TROPHY was presented to Pres. S. Frank Raftery (right) of the Painters by Capt. Blake Van Leer, assistant commander for military readiness of the Navy Facilities Engineering Command, after he had agreed to head an AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. campaign for $150,000 to help the Seabees mark their 25th anniversary. Raftery was a chief boatswain master-at-arms with the Seabees during World War II.

LBJ Tells Congress:

Labor-Commerce Merger Study Set

Pres. Johnson has sent his proposed merger of the Dept. of Labor and the Dept. of Commerce to his Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy for additional study.

The President emphasized in a message to Congress that he still believed a merged department would be a "vital force" in the prosperity and progress of a growing nation.

His proposal of a merger, he said, involved much more than a unification of existing structures and functions but "the establishment of a single institution to unify the management of government programs which affect the economic health of the nation."

Nevertheless, he acknowledged, many citizens have expressed the opinion that elimination of the separate departments might "inhibit the free flow of communication between government and the communities of business and labor."

He added:

"Separate departments with their well-established channels of communication, many believe, continue to offer the best assurance that business and labor leaders will be able to present to the federal government their views on matters vitally affecting their interests."

"I respect the considerations which lie behind these views . . .," he said.

The President never spelled out the details of the proposed merger since proposing it in his State of the Union message to Congress.

In his message dropping the proposal for the time being he made it clear that he still thinks of the new agency as a "powerful instrument for carrying out national policies affecting industry and labor."

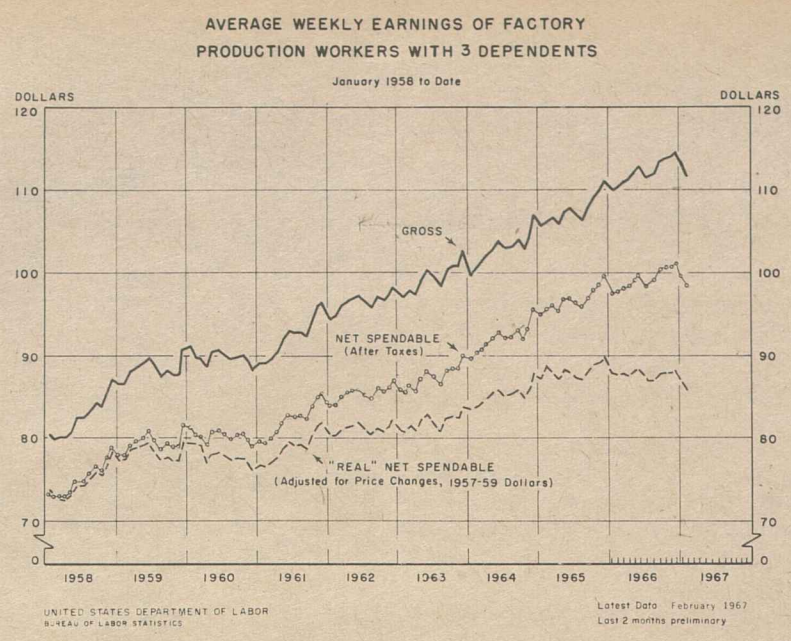
The need of labor and industry for separate channels for approaching the government has changed greatly since the Labor Dept. was founded in 1913, he said. "Neither of these groups today depends on a special department to make its voice heard."

He charged the Labor-Management Committee "to consider the proposal in all its aspects, and particularly to develop means to assure that a free flow of communications will be maintained between the government and the business and labor communities both through the new department and other channels."

The proposal, he added, is the most important the advisory committee has been called upon to handle during its six years of existence.

"I remain convinced," he said, "that the establishment of a new department would in no way diminish the legitimate voice of business and labor in the councils of the nation.

"That is why I believe that further active development of my proposal is necessary before it can be submitted to Congress."



BUYING POWER of factory worker earnings leveled off during 1966 and now has plunged to late-1964 levels, as the bottom line in this chart shows. The jump in the cost of living last year and the recent decline in the workweek combined to cause the setback.

Buying Power Drops Despite CPI Leveling

duction worker with three dependents was $98.54 in February. This was a drop of $1.22 from January. This weekly take-home pay was up by 70 cents from a year earlier, the report said, but it noted the increase was due to an 11-cents an hour rise in earnings. At the same time, the average workweek fell by 1.2 hours.

In terms of real earnings or buying power, the Labor Dept. reported a decline over the month of $1.13 to $85.84 for the worker with three dependents.

In January, this worker's real earnings totaled $86.97; in December 1966, $88.13 and, in February a year ago, $87.63.

"From a year ago," the Labor Dept. report noted, "the drop in real net spendable earnings amounted to about $1.75 or 2 percent."

In an earlier report on the employment situation for February, the Labor Dept. had disclosed widespread reductions in the workweek. These ranged throughout the durable and soft goods industries in the manufacturing sector and were sizable even after adjustment for seasonal factors.

At the same time, the food price declines which offset the upward pressure in consumer service costs were counter-seasonal in February. As Ross pointed out, services make up a big component in the CPI and therefore it should be expected to raise to a certain extent.

Adjustment in the escalator clauses in union contracts will bring wage increases to about 50,000 workers on the basis of the February CPI, the report said.

The wage rise will be 2 cents an hour for 40,000 grocery workers in southern California, based on the annual adjustment of the Los Angeles-Long Beach index. About 9,500 aerospace workers will get 1 cent an hour, based on quarterly adjustment of the national CPI.

Age Bias Ban Urged by 'Old' Stewardesses

Airline stewardesses joined in urging Congress to pass a strong ban on age discrimination in employment—one which would apply to airlines that ground stewardesses in their early thirties as well as to employers who consider workers "too old" at 45.

Representatives of stewardesses affiliated with both the Air Line Pilots and the Transport Workers presented similar arguments in testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee.

Coleen Boland, president of TWU Local 550, said some airlines ground stewardesses at 32 or 35 because they no longer fit the "flying bunny club" image. Noting that some airlines are considering mini-skirts for their stewardesses, she suggested that the industry's next step in selling "sex in the sky" might be "topless or bottomless outfits."

Iris Peterson, testifying for the stewards and stewardess division of the Pilots, stressed that ability to deal with emergencies and to give courteous and competent service should be the job requirement, not "sex appeal."

She cited the double standard of some airlines which require their stewardesses to retire at 32 or 35 but have no maximum age for male flight attendants doing similar work.

The two unions urged that the Administration bill to bar discrimination against workers over 45 be broadened to include younger groups as well.

Union Wins Recognition At Restaurant Chain

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Horn & Hardart Co., unorganized in this area for nearly 75 years, has agreed to recognize the Hotel & Restaurant Employes as bargaining agent for 2,500 workers in the company's automats, cafeterias and service restaurants. The unit also includes Horn & Hardart employes at two federal government establishments—Frankford Arsenal and the Internal Revenue Service.

Recognition was achieved after a card check by the American Arbitration Association proved that a majority of employes favored representation by the union. The local called the result a "great milestone" in its history.

Efforts to organize the chain date back 20 years, when union attempts met with strong resistance. For years, Horn & Hardart was on the union's Do Not Patronize list. But delegates to the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention, due to assemble here Apr. 4, will get leaflets informing them that Horn & Hardart restaurants are now union houses.

Recognition of Hotel & Restaurant Employes concluded a coordinated drive by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization which earlier resulted in recognition of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers as bargaining representative for the company's 700 bakery workers and the Retail Clerks for 225 store sales employes.

The restaurant workers, employed at 40 units of the chain in Philadelphia, Camden and Trenton, N.J., and Wilmington, Del., will be the largest single unit of restaurant workers in the area, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig reported.

The newly organized workers have elected a negotiating committee and talks will begin soon, said Edward Rovner, campaign coordinator for the union, and Organizing Dir. Charles Poulson.

Representatives of all the affected unions met in the AFL-CIO regional office to work out joint programs. Handbilling was done with the aid of members of the Textile Workers Union of America; Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; the RCIA and the ABC.

Reports on the drive at meetings of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Council and the Delaware AFL-CIO fanned the interest of delegates who helped in some phases of the campaign, Craig said.

Humphrey Launches Youth Job Drive

Vice Pres. Humphrey, chairman of the new President's Council on Youth Opportunity, opened a national drive to find summer jobs for 2 million youngsters, including large numbers of poor, non-whites.

He joined in a press conference with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and other top government officials in calling on private employers to give kids a chance at work experience, "not wait until there has been some act of violence which precipitates community action."

The new council, which includes eight Cabinet members, was established by Pres. Johnson through an executive order.

The President said he will also name a Citizens Advisory Board on Youth Opportunity to recommend programs to open up opportunities for disadvantaged youth.

Labor Urges Full Funds for Aid to Schools

lems in our present school systems."

He also gave the AFL-CIO's support to two new programs sought by the Administration—aid in meeting the educational needs of handicapped children and planning funds to help states make the best use of available federal school assistance.

The proposed regional centers to diagnose the schooling problems of the handicapped would tackle a problem which is "frustrating" in many communities, particularly for children with multiple handicaps.

In another area, Biemiller suggested an extension of the program of grants to school districts serving large numbers of federal civilian or military families. He urged that this impacted aid program be extended "for a sufficient number of years to enable communities to make long range plans."

Schnitzler Sees Shift In Management Attitude

St. Louis—A "welcome change" has become apparent in the official attitude of American management toward unions, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told a jointly-sponsored labor-management conference here.

"The word 'responsibility,' until fairly recently, was a one-way word—a verbal missile aimed at the labor movement," he remarked.

But only two weeks ago, he pointed out, "the National Association of Manufacturers and the AFL-CIO were co-sponsors of a luncheon celebrating the 25 millionth vote cast in National Labor Relations Board elections."

"In discussing labor-management responsibility today," the word "responsibility" can be treated as a "three-way word, an expression of our obligations to the people we represent, to each other and to the society in which we live."

Schnitzler spoke at a conference jointly sponsored by Region XV of the AFL-CIO, the St. Louis Labor Council and the Industrial Relations Club of Greater St. Louis.

At the two-day sessions, keyed to industrial expansion of the St. Louis area and the role of labor and management, other speakers included Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers, General Counsel Arnold Ordman of the NLRB and D. Reid Ross, executive vice president of the Regional Industrial Development Corp.

Schnitzler said that in capsuled form the responsibility of management and labor could be expressed this way:

"We in the labor movement have an obligation to win for our members the highest possible standard of living, the maximum degree of economic security and a full measure of individual justice on the job.

"You in management have an obligation to safeguard the present prosperity and the future prospects of the enterprise, so that those who have invested in it can be assured of a steady and adequate return."

"These two obligations (are) bound to bump into each other now and then," he observed.

"There are some ground rules that can help."

The first, he said, "right up at the head of the list, is a full, ungrudging, unqualified recognition by employers that workers not only have the right to organize but that collective bargaining is a good thing for everyone—the bosses as well as the workers.

"The second is a full, ungrudging, unqualified recognition by workers, through their union, that the enterprise they work for has to make a profit in order to survive."

It is in this spirt, he added, that labor and management together can meet their "third obligation"—to the community.

The commitment of the government to the well-being of the people "has had widespread collaboration by members of the business community," the AFL-CIO spokesman commented. If labor and management accept each other in good faith, he suggested, "responsibility will be a fact of life."

Organizing Leaflet 'Invites' Members

"You May Be Eligible" is a new AFL-CIO organizing pamphlet, available for distribution.

It's an invitation to membership "in one of the world's most unique organizations"—a union.

The price is 3 cents a copy for 100 to 500, 2 cents for 500 to 1,000 and 1.5 cents for each copy over 1,000. Orders should be sent to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, 815 16th Street, NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

GI Bill, Pensions:

House Passes Boost In Veterans' Benefits

The House voted unanimous approval of a $236 million-a-year boost in veterans educational benefits and pensions—incorporating some, but not all, of a group of labor-backed proposals.

Most of the added funds would go towards raising living allowances for veterans studying under the GI Bill of Rights. Unmarried veterans would have their allowance raised from $100 to $130 and veterans with dependents would receive an additional $25 a month, to a new ceiling of $175.

The House also approved a provision allowing veterans to complete high school or college preparatory courses without having the time counted against their eligibility for college allowances.

A Senate subcommittee is winding up hearings on similar legislation, including labor-supported proposals for on-the-job, on-the-farm and apprenticeship training allowances.

Committee activity in both House and Senate picked up, with major bills starting to move into the legislative pipeline. Most were earmarked for action after the Easter recess. The House is scheduled to reconvene Apr. 3, and the shorter Senate vacation ends Mar. 29.

Appalachia Bill

First major bill on the Senate agenda will be legislation to extend the Appalachia redevelopment program. It has Administration and AFL-CIO support and broad bipartisan endorsement.

The Senate will also be tackling the House-passed bill to reinstate the 7 percent investment tax credit for employers purchasing new equipment.

The House bill gave corporations a $600 million tax windfall by permitting the credit for all equipment delivered after Mar. 9 and allowing a fast tax write-off on industrial and commercial buildings completed thereafter.

It was amended in the Senate Finance Committee in line with Pres. Johnson's request that the tax credit apply only to equipment ordered and construction begun after that date.

In other congressional developments:

- The House Agriculture Committee approved a one-year, $195 million extension of the federal food stamp program which helps poor families buy groceries, but added a requirement that states pay 20 percent of the program's cost, starting in 1969.
- Civil rights supporters in the Senate, with Administration backing, introduced separate bills embodying sections of the President's civil rights program. Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) has not scheduled hearings on the overall bill, and supporters hoped to get at least some key portions of the measure to the Senate floor for enactment this year. Subcommittee hearings were started on antidiscrimination in jury selection.
- The House voted 234-118 approval of a resolution endorsing more U.S. aid to Latin America. Senate action is expected after the Easter recess. Pres. Johnson requested such congressional action before his meeting with Latin American chiefs of state in April.
- The House Education & Labor Committee began marking up the elementary and secondary school aid bill and the Ways & Means Committee neared the close of public hearings on the social security bill.

SOCIAL SECURITY DRIVE was aided by members of New York's Golden Ring Council who came to Washington to testify before the House Ways & Means Committee and meet with congressmen and senators. Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers addresses the group at a luncheon at the Capitol.

Senior Citizens Cite Plight of Aged Poor meet all the need for improvement in the program.

In the future, the witnesses said, social security taxes will have to be supplemented by general revenue funds "as a matter of justice and equity."

The council called for strengthening of medicare and a method of billing for doctors' services to relieve the elderly of the burden of paying bills and waiting for medicare reimbursement.

Insistence by most doctors on direct billing of patients—at the urging of the American Medical Association and its state affiliates—has caused severe hardship, the council reported. In addition, statistics on rising fees charged by doctors and letters from senior citizens "show evidence of what can only be described as severe gouging by many doctors," the council said.

The organization also called for expansion of "medicaid"—the federal-state program of medical aid to the needy.

It is not the aged alone who are seeking improved social security, the council said. Its statement cited the standing-room-only public rallies sponsored by the AFL-CIO in cities throughout the nation.

"Young people are behind the President's social security proposals," the council affirmed.

The statement noted that many nursing homes are challenging the right of the government to set minimum standards for extended care facilities used under the medicare program.

The standards are essential, the council said, "because the health—indeed the lives—of many people are involved."

Youth Corps Grant Given Central Body

were obtained for a regular NYC project which expired last September.

In the new project, the central body will employ skilled union craftsmen to supervise and instruct the young men and women in several areas, including clerical work, landscaping, remodeling and other construction projects, and the clearing of heavily-wooded city and regional park areas for the development of picnic and recreational uses.

The work is done mainly for non-profit charitable and public agencies. Those who perform satisfactorily in the work experience phase will be given additional training in marketable job skills, such as welding, auto mechanics, carpentry, the operation of office machines, and office procedures.

Each young man or woman accepted for training will be paid from $1.35 to $1.60 an hour for 32 hours a week.

The project will have two co-directors—J. W. Gaines of Building Service Employes Local 390 and Robert Heffley of Carpenters Local 36.

Mediation Panel Enters N. Y. Newspaper Talks

New York—A panel of mediators headed by Theodore W. Kheel entered newspaper negotiations here to help four publishers and 10 unions draft new contracts covering 17,000 employes before midnight Mar. 30.

"There is so much to do and so little time to do it," said Kheel after announcing that all unions and publishers have agreed to meet jointly to bargain on common issues, without prejudicing their legal right to bargain separately—a point that had bogged down contract talks for some time.

As the joint talks began, Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Local 6 reported that negotiators are "further apart" than in previous years. It will "take a miracle to avoid a strike but I believe in miracles," said Powers, adding "we will strike only if we have to."

Other unions involved are the Newspaper Guild, Mailers, Stereotypers, Photo Engravers, Paper Handlers, Machinists, Printing Pressmen, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the unaffiliated Deliverers.

5 Dailies Involved

All the unions except the Printing Pressmen are members of the Newspaper Trade Union Council. Publishers of the World Journal Tribune, Daily News, Times, Long Island Press and Long Island Star-Journal—the latter two owned by Samuel I. Newhouse — are represented by the Publishers Association of New York City. The New York Post bargains separately with the unions.

The negotiations involve wages and working conditions of 13,000 full-time employes and some 4,000 part-time or casual workers. Their unions have asked substantial improvements in current contracts, but none reported receiving any offer from publishers as the talks entered the mediation period.

Two unions—the printers and engravers—have asked their internationals for strike sanction. There have been four newspaper strikes here in recent years.

Besides Kheel, an attorney and arbitrator, the mediation panel includes Vincent D. McDonnell of the State Mediation Board; Regional Dir. Frank H. Brown of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and Morris Tarshis, labor adviser for Mayor John V. Lindsay (R).

Rail Retirement Board Issues Guide to Benefits

A revised booklet, Form IB-2 "Benefits for Railroad Workers & Their Families," describing changes resulting from 1966 amendments to the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Compensation Acts, has been made available by the Railroad Retirement Board.

Individuals may obtain single copies on request at any of the board's field offices or from its Information Service, 844 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill. 60611. It also is for sale at 10 cents a copy by the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Job Bias Unit Asked to Revise Report Forms

The AFL-CIO has urged the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to streamline forms it proposes to require of all unions and apprentice program sponsors.

The forms are intended to obtain information on minority group participation which might indicate areas of discrimination by employers, unions or joint apprenticeship committees.

Dir. Donald Slaiman, of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept., asked at the informal hearing that the commission take another look at the questionnaires its staff had drawn up to avoid asking "unnecessary and burdensome questions of thousands of local unions."

Slaiman was joined in requesting simplification of the reporting procedure by Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel.

Dirksen Spurs New Attack On 1 Man, 1 Vote Principle

New Ruling Hits Firings By Stevens

A trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board ruled that three more employes of J. P. Stevens & Co. were fired on flimsy grounds in a continuing union-busting campaign by the big textile chain.

The finding, by Examiner Thomas A. Ricci, was the fourth in a row upholding charges filed by the Textile Workers Union of America and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. alleging illegal actions to stop union organizing.

Ricci recommended that the Stevens firm—a U.S. government contractor—be ordered to reinstate three union supporters fired last August, with backpay for lost time.

He advised also that management be required to post notices of its willingness to comply with the law in all the chain's North and South Carolina plants, send a notice to all Carolina employes, and give the union access to its bulletin boards for a year and the names and addresses of all employes in the Carolina plants.

"This is an extraordinary case," Ricci said in reviewing the charges. "The unfair labor practices found up to this writing have been 'massive and deliberate.' An unbroken pattern runs through them."

Campaign Charged

On one of the three discharges at issue, the examiner said the "widespread and flagrant nature" of management's "disregard, even contempt, of employe rights" under the law dictates a finding that the worker was "chosen for discharge in furtherance of the overall companywide campaign to weed out every last supporter of the union."

In recent cases involving Stevens, the NLRB has upheld trial examiners' findings that 93 union supporters were unlawfully fired from early 1963 to early 1965. Findings for later periods of 1965 and 1966 await board review.

In the two cases already passed on, the NLRB ruled that management squelched all union sentiment by firing TWUA supporters on various pretexts.

In a third case, Examiner Boyd Leedom, former NLRB chairman in Republican days, concluded that most law violations at Stevens plants "must stem from the decision of one man or a very few men at the top of the management structure." A signal "from the top" would correct such decisions, said Leedom in finding management guilty of wrongfully firing 13 union sympathizers.

Elevator Wage Pact Ends Strike

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Elevator Constructors ended their first nationwide strike in 45 years with a new five-year agreement preserving all former benefits while gaining a new wage formula for nearly 15,000 members.

The agreement was reached with the National Elevator Mfg. Industry, Inc., representing 300 firms that install and maintain elevators. It features a wage formula keyed to the average rates of the four highest-rated building trades crafts.

The old formula, which the employers wanted to scrap, was based on wages of the five top-paid crafts.

The strike lasted 48 days. It was caused, the union said, by management's attempt to "turn the clock back" on job security provisions. "We didn't give up a thing," Sec.-Treas. Thomas E. Fitzgerald said following the settlement.

Agreement came after two weeks of almost continuous meetings called by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in Washington.

Besides wages, the union's other gains include an additional day of paid vacation every year to a top of three weeks and retroactivity of benefits to Jan. 1, 1967, expiration date of the old contract, Fitzgerald said.

The union started its first strike since 1921 on Feb. 3 and picketed the locations of member NEMI firms in major cities until settlement was reached. Members of IUEC Local 1, New York, supported the strikers but remained at work be-

FIRST ANNIVERSARY of the historic farm workers' pilgrimage from Delano, Calif., to Sacramento was observed in Delano over the Easter weekend on a tract acquired by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee for its headquarters. Wirtz, Haggerty to Testify:

House Hearings Set On Site Picketing

House hearings on the on-site picketing bill—one of labor's major legislative goals—are scheduled to start Apr. 3, the day Congress returns from its Easter Week recess.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz will be the opening witness for the bill. He will be followed the next day by C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) is sponsor of the bill, which would permit construction unions to picket at multi-employer sites without running afoul of secondary boycott prohibitions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Thompson is also chairman of the Labor subcommittee which is holding hearings.

A resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month reiterated labor's "full and complete support" of the legislation, declaring it "would simply restore to the building trades unions the same rights enjoyed by other unions in a labor dispute."

Correction of the Taft-Hartley inequity had been endorsed by Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. Last year a similar bill was approved by the House Labor Committee and cleared for floor action by the Rules Committee. It was withdrawn from the calendar, however, after the then-chairman of the Labor Committee, Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) announced that he would not call it up.

On the Senate's post-Easter agenda is an anticipated floor battle over tax financing of presidential election campaigns.

Gore Seeks Repeal

Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) has served notice that he will seek to repeal—through an amendment to the pending investment tax credit bill—last year's law allowing taxpayers to indicate whether they wish $1 of their federal tax payments to go towards financing of major party presidential campaigns. The AFL-CIO has supported the principle of federal campaign financing and the new system is scheduled to go into effect next year.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) sponsored the presidential campaign fund plan.

'Backdoor' Bid Seeks Convention

A "backdoor" approach to amending the U.S. Constitution is the latest threat to one man, one vote apportionment of state legislatures.

Pushing the effort is Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, who thinks at least one house of a legislature ought to represent thinly settled rural counties instead of people living in cities and suburbs.

Nearly all legislatures have now been reapportioned to meet the Supreme Court's one man, one vote standards, and Dirksen was defeated two years in a row when the Senate refused to go along with his proposed constitutional amendment.

Dirksen now says there's a good chance his amendment will yet be submitted to the states for ratification, although not by Congress.

He claims 32 of a required 34 legislatures have petitioned Congress to convene a constitutional convention for the purpose of initiating his amendment. If two more states act, he says, Congress will have to comply.

The Constitution provides this method of proposing an amendment, but it has never been used in the nation's history and there are thorny, unresolved questions dealing with the obligation of Congress to act on the state petitions and the ground rules for such a convention.

An even thornier constitutional question is the validity of the 32 state resolutions claimed by Dirksen.

Cancer Society Backed in Drive

A half-million deaths from cancer in the ranks of the AFL-CIO alone could be avoided with early diagnosis and proper treatment, Pres. George Meany declared in pledging labor's support to the American Cancer Society's 1967 educational and fund-raising crusade.

Meany quoted medical experts as estimating that about 3.25 million of the AFL-CIO's 13.5 million members will get cancer and that at present rates, 1,083,000 will be cured. But they also point out, he said, "that one out of two, instead of one out of three, could be saved with existing medical knowledge." That means "542,000 needless deaths," he observed.

All AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to join in and support Cancer Control Month, proclaimed for April by Pres. Johnson.

'Shock, Outrage' Follows Slaying Of Union Organizer in Louisiana

Lafayette, La.—The slaying of an unarmed union organizer by a company guard at a nearby oil rig has "shocked and outraged" the labor community and has instilled new determination into an organizing campaign, the Laborers union here declared.

Victim of a blast from a 12-gauge shotgun fired by a guard was Cecyl P. Babineaux, 33, business manager of Oil Field Workers Local 1152. Guard M. Joseph Hanks was "precommitted" to the St. Landry parish grand jury, which has been taking evidence in the case.

The Laborers protested, however, that pending grand jury action, Hanks remains free.

The shooting took place on a public highway near Cankton, 12 miles northeast of Lafayette. The Laborers District Council of Western Louisiana decried the slaying and demanded an end to the practice of permitting private firms to hire deputy sheriffs and college students as armed guards on oil drilling rigs.

Louisiana newspaper accounts of the shooting identified Hanks as a deputy for St. Landry Sheriff D. J. "Cat" Doucet. The latter denied Hanks is a deputy, but admitted he had commissioned him to carry a gun. Other private guards have been similarly commissioned, Deputy Sheriff Frank Guidroz told reporters.

Found Mentally Ill

The union charged that Hanks was commissioned to carry a gun despite the fact that on Jan. 31, 1966, he was found mentally ill and was committed to Central Louisiana State Hospital on a petition filed with a state court by his wife and a state district attorney. He was released several months later and hired as a guard, according to the union.

Babineaux's local has been conducting a drive to organize oil field workers since January. The local said Babineaux held a meeting for prospective members the night of the shooting and then headed for Cankton and the drilling rig operated by the Pernie Bailey Drilling Co., Houston, to talk to workers at a shift change. With him were about 20 members and Organizer George Dufore.

Wilson Pacts Follow Pace Set at Armour

Chicago—The Packinghouse Workers and the Meat Cutters reached agreement with Wilson & Co. on new contracts six months before the expiration of the old agreements.

The new pacts, with substantial benefits for 6,500 employes in 15 Wilson plants, follows the lines of the pace-setting agreements reached recently with Armour & Co. for 12,000 employes, the unions said. Negotiations on similar pacts have begun with Swift & Co.

Wilson workers are represented by the UPWA in plants at Albert Lea, Minn.; Cedar Rapids, Ia.; Omaha, Neb.; Kansas City, Kan.; Los Angeles, Oklahoma City; Ogden, Utah; Atlanta, Ga., and Chicago. The Meat Cutters have members at Denver, Cherokee, Ia., and four Eastern branch locations.

The Wilson agreement calls for wage increases of 12 cents an hour now; additional increases at yearly intervals, and improvements in pensions, health and welfare, holiday, vacation and separation pay benefits. The total "package" parallels the Armour agreement, which totaled 66 cents an hour in benefits.

The contracts are for a four-year term ending Aug. 31, 1970. Benefits include a basic pension payment of $5 a month times years of service, in place of the old $3.25 rate; improvements in life insurance and mental illness coverage, and advance notice to union members of intended plant closings.

Labor Committee to Aid Fete to Jewish Forward

New York—Support of the 70th anniversary celebration of the Jewish Daily Forward was pledged by more than 150 union leaders at a luncheon given by the publication in honor of the labor movement.

"Now that organized labor is strong and well-financed," said Honorary Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who also is honorary chairman of the anniversary committee, "we will not forget our mentor and friend, the Forward, which needs us today as we needed the Forward 30 and 40 years ago."

Dubinsky recalled the help the Forward has given the labor movement during its lifetime, stressing the crucial role it played in organizing the Jewish workers during the first three decades of the 20th Century.

The formal observance of the Forward's 70th anniversary will be held May 14 in Philharmonic Hall.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, another luncheon speaker, emphasized the Forward's dedication to democratic principles and honest unionism.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg cited its contribution to American life, both political and social, and to Yiddish-speaking immigrants.

Pres. Alex Rose of the Hatters & Millinery Workers recalled the Forward's educational role and its influence in developing idealistic union leaders among Jewish workers.

Chairman of the luncheon was Adolph Held, chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee and general manager of the publication.

Early Struggle

The Forward first appeared on Apr. 22, 1897, as a champion of democratic socialism, social justice and trade unionism. It gave major support to Samuel Gompers in his struggle to build the former AFL, and helped collect funds and organize support for struggling unions in coal, steel and textiles.

But perhaps its greatest contribution was in the unionization of the millions of Yiddish-speaking workers in the needle trades, where at the turn of the century the average wage was $5 a week, and men, women and children alike were exploited ruthlessly in sweatshops.

Slaying Brings Demand For Curbs on 'Deputies'

As Babineaux approached the rig, the guard warned him not to come nearer, fired a warning shot over his head, and then fired the fatal shot, according to eyewitnesses.

Hanks was quoted as saying he fired the shot because Babineaux had "reached into his pocket." The dead man was found to have been unarmed, without even a penknife.

The night before the slaying, investigators for the Southern Research Co., Shreveport guard firm, swore to warrants charging Babineaux and Dufore with "criminal trespass." The two men furnished bond of $1,000 each and were released.

New Orleans Regional Manager T. T. Odom said in a report to Laborers' Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi that the organizing drive is being continued "against tremendous odds." Armed guards are being employed by drilling firms "anywhere the local union shows any organizing interest," Odom wrote.

Strong Support

The union is getting "strong support" from the labor community in the area and members are "determined to carry on in order that Babineaux shall not have died in vain," he reported.

It is evident, Odom charged, that the "adamant attitude of the oil field contractors" against union organizing "is being supported and dictated by the major oil firms."

Babineaux was born in Lafayette and lived here all his life. He leaves his widow and four children, aged 3 months to 6 years.

He was a graduate of Cathedral High School and served with the Marines in the Korean War. He was buried near here after funeral services in St. Anthony Catholic Church.

New Contract Ends 48-Day ElevatorStrike cause the local has a separate contract, in effect until June of 1969.

Union members provided emergency service to the public, and to defense establishments in many cities, the IUEC said, despite the association's refusal to cooperate in setting up an emergency service plan.

While the strike against NEMI continued, union representatives signed interim agreements with nearly 270 "independents" and a few of the major firms.

Fitzgerald expressed the IUEC's appreciation for support by the labor movement across the nation, and the steadfastness of union members and their families in what was for most their first strike. Young members, he said, stood "shoulder to shoulder" with veteran unionists.

The strike was led by union Pres. R. Wayne Williams, who succeeded to that office less than a year ago.

Film Salesmen Negotiate Cooler Cars

New York—Film salesmen servicing the southern states will be furnished with air conditioned autos when their present cars are replaced under a new contract between seven distributors and the Colosseum of Motion Picture Salesmen, an affiliate of the Theatrical Stage Employes.

The clause applies to salesmen working out of film exchanges in Washington, St. Louis, Kansas City, Oklahoma City, Dallas, New Orleans, Memphis, Charlotte, N.C., Atlanta and Jacksonville, and to those working in the states of Kentucky, New Mexico and Arizona.

The two-year contract provides for wage increases of $6 a week retroactive to last Dec. 1 and $4 on Dec. 1, 1967; a rise in the minimum starting rate from $105 to $115 a week; a $1.25 per day hike in the hotel and meal allowance; a third week of vacation after 10 years and higher employer contributions to the IATSE National Pension Fund.

Salesmen covered by the agreement are employed by M-G-M, Paramount, 20th Century Fox, Warner Brothers, United Artists, Universal and Columbia, IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh said.

Salaries, Fees at Issue:

Newscasters Strike In Network Dispute

New York—Television and radio networks reached deep into their cans of old program tapes, while their newscasters, announcers, and performers walked picket lines in a dramatic display of trade union solidarity.

The network people, including highly-paid stars, had already reached tentative settlement of basic conditions in their own contracts. But they held off signing agreements and donned picket signs in support of newscasters and announcers on network-owned stations in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago.

First Strike

It was the first network strike in the 30-year history of AFTRA, the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists.

It started in the rainy pre-dawn of Mar. 29th, when the first pickets appeared outside the NBC studios here where the Today show was to have been taped. On the picket line were the two newscasters of the program, Hugh Downs and Frank Blair. Inside, network executives hastily filled in for part of the show and from the tape can came a rerun of the program seen last July 4.

Similar episodes took place throughout the day at ABC, CBS and Mutual as programs using live talent from soap operas to the "Tonight" show failed to go on the air. The AFL-CIO withdrew the Edward P. Morgan program, which it sponsors on ABC, for the duration of the strike.

The bread-and-butter issues were complex, but important and meaningful to more than 300 newscasters and staff announcers directly affected.

Basic wages were in dispute, but the chief controversy was over the sharing of "talent fees" paid to newscasters on commercially-sponsored programs.

This is a fee the sponsor of the program pays above the station or network's regular charge for the air time.

AFTRA wants the same division of fees it has negotiated for newscasters employed directly by the networks. Under this formula, the talent fee is divided 50-50 between the network and the newscaster until the amount of fees equals the newscaster's basic salary. Thereafter he gets the entire amount.

While the networks have agreed to this for their own employes, they have insisted that employes of their directly-owned stations settle for 13 percent of the fees for the first half of a three-year contract; 25 percent thereafter.

A major issue for staff announcers involves increased automation of network-owned FM stations.

There are other unresolved issues, including payments for programs of longer than two-hours duration, such as political conventions coverage, and satellite programs.

The strike does not directly affect performers on independent stations and on network stations in cities without separate contracts. Many AFTRA members in these cities have been taking turns on picket lines in front of network offices and studios in their off-hours from working on their own programs.

4th NLRB Examiner Blasts Stevens Firm

Executive Council, at its February meeting, announced it would urge Pres. Johnson to issue an executive order barring government contracts to companies that persist in illegal anti-union conduct. Stevens is such a company, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The latest examiner's finding was that Stevens' supervisors fired three veteran employes last year, allegedly for incompetence but actually to discourage union support. Ricci called for the rehiring of:

- James Griggs, discharged after 12 years of service at the company's Dunean plant in Greenville, S. C., allegedly for placing the wrong gear on a machine. No one ever had been disciplined for such an error and management proof was flimsy, Ricci reported. Griggs was a "particular irritant to the company" because he had switched from being an instigator of the firm's anti-union drive to being an "outspoken recruiter" of union supporters, the examiner found.
- Mrs. Ollie Vernadore, who worked as a weaver at Plant 3 in Rock Hill, S. C., from 1951 without once being criticized for the quality of her work until August 1966. She was then fired because an error of mixed colors appeared in the cloth from one of her 25 looms. No one else ever had been fired for that reason in her time at Rock Hill, she testified.

Mrs. Vernadore was the last of her family to be fired by Stevens, the examiner said. The same supervisor who fired her had previously discharged her husband and his brother—wrongfully, according to Ricci.

- Norman A. Shearin, a finishing inspector in a Stevens plant near Roanoke Rapids, N. C., who was fired last Aug. 16 because grease spots were found on tablecloths produced in his section. The examiner said there was no "convincing evidence" that the fault was Shearin's and the supervisor who fired him had shown previous anti-union tendencies.

Shearin testified that he never knew of any other inspector dismissed for such a reason. He had been a union observer at an NLRB election in 1965 and signed a union pamphlet urging Stevens workers to continue their organizing efforts, the report noted.

Stevens management has denied the four examiners' findings of unlawful conduct and has asked the U.S. Court of Appeals to set aside two board orders against it.

300 Get Aid Under Auto Trade Pact

About 300 employes of the Lyon Division of the Rockwell-Standard Corp in Adrian, Mich., have been ruled eligible for benefits under the Automotive Products Trade Act of 1965 because the bulk of the firm's operations is being transferred to Windsor, Ont.

The certification was made by the Automotive Agreement Adjustment Assistance Board on the basis of a petition by the Machinists in which the Metal Polishers cooperated. The plant has been making auto wheel covers and hubcaps.

Under the act, which eliminates tariffs on motor vehicles and parts between the United States and Canada, workers who lose their jobs as a result are eligible for readjustment allowances of $70 weekly for up to 52 weeks, counseling and training, and relocation allowances.

N. Y. Deadline Nears:

Newspaper Parleys Seek to End Impasse

New York—Negotiators for 10 unions and five daily newspapers, aided by a panel of four mediators, pressed their search for solutions to a contract bargaining impasse here.

With the contracts expiring at midnight Mar. 30, one union indicated it would bargain past the deadline, while another indicated it would apply the "no contract, no work" approach.

"we'll continue negotiating past the strike deadline" in the hope that the deadlock can be broken. Besides higher wages, the local is seeking improvements in pension plans at two of the papers—the Times and Daily News — though pensions are not a strikeable issue. Also unsettled are such items as a cost-of-living clause, automation safeguards, and length of contract.

The Publishers Association of New York City, representing the Times, Daily News, World Journal Tribune, Long Island Press and Long Island Star-Journal, waited until Mar. 27—three months after negotiations started—to make the publishers' first wage proposal to any union, negotiators reported.

The offer—to raise wages 4 percent each year of a proposed three-year contract—was made to Typographical Local 6 and rejected as "insufficient" to meet the needs of the printers.

Three unions, the Printers and the Mailers—both affiliates of the ITU—and the unaffiliated Deliverers, have received authorization from members to strike if necessary. The ITU locals have asked approval of their international to do so.

Deliverers Pres. Joseph Baer said shortly before the deadline that his union had not received a satisfactory contract offer and that traditionally his members do not work without a contract. Two years ago, however, Baer's local voted to extend its agreement while talks continued.

Walkout 'Likely'

Other unions involved are the Newspaper Guild, Stereotypers, Photo Engravers, Paper Handlers, Machinists, Printing Pressmen, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The Newspaper Trades Council, representing all unions except the Pressmen, said contract talks had "bogged down" and that a walkout is "as likely as not." Speaking for the council, Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy of the Guild added:

"The decision to reach agreement without a strike depends now on how fast the publishers will . . . make up for time lost by stalling in the past." Major issues, Murphy said, "could have been resolved a month ago" had publishers not "stalled" in coming to terms.

If a strike occurs on one or more of the dailies, it would be the fourth newspaper walkout here in less than five years.

Local 6 leaders announced

Ship Unions Win Assurance On Crew Use

A work stoppage against all United States-flag shipping planned as a protest against the use of foreign crews on American vessels was called off by three AFL-CIO affiliates after a three-hour meeting with Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds.

Reynolds announced that federal agencies had pledged that no government cargoes will be carried in the future on vessels with only provisional U.S. registry.

The work stoppage threat was made by the National Maritime Union, the Marine Engineers and the Masters, Mates & Pilots after two freighters transferred from Nationalist Chinese to provisional U.S. registry were allowed to carry cargoes for U.S. forces in Viet Nam with Chinese crews.

At the meeting with Reynolds, NMU Pres. Joseph N. Curran, MEBA Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon and MMP Pres. Lloyd W. Sheldon maintained the practice was an illegal one that deprived American seamen of jobs to which they were entitled under U.S. law.

Gains for 9 Unions End 5-Month Toledo Strike

Toledo, O.—A five-union strike against the Toledo Blade and Times ended after nearly five months of suspended publication with a mixed package of wage increases, reduced hours and pension program improvements ratified by nine unions.

The strike began Oct. 24 when the Typographical Union walked out after months of fruitless bargaining. The next day the Newspaper Guild struck and publication was suspended. The Stereotypers voted to strike on Oct. 31; the Pressmen followed suit Feb. 28 and the Paper Handlers on Mar. 2.

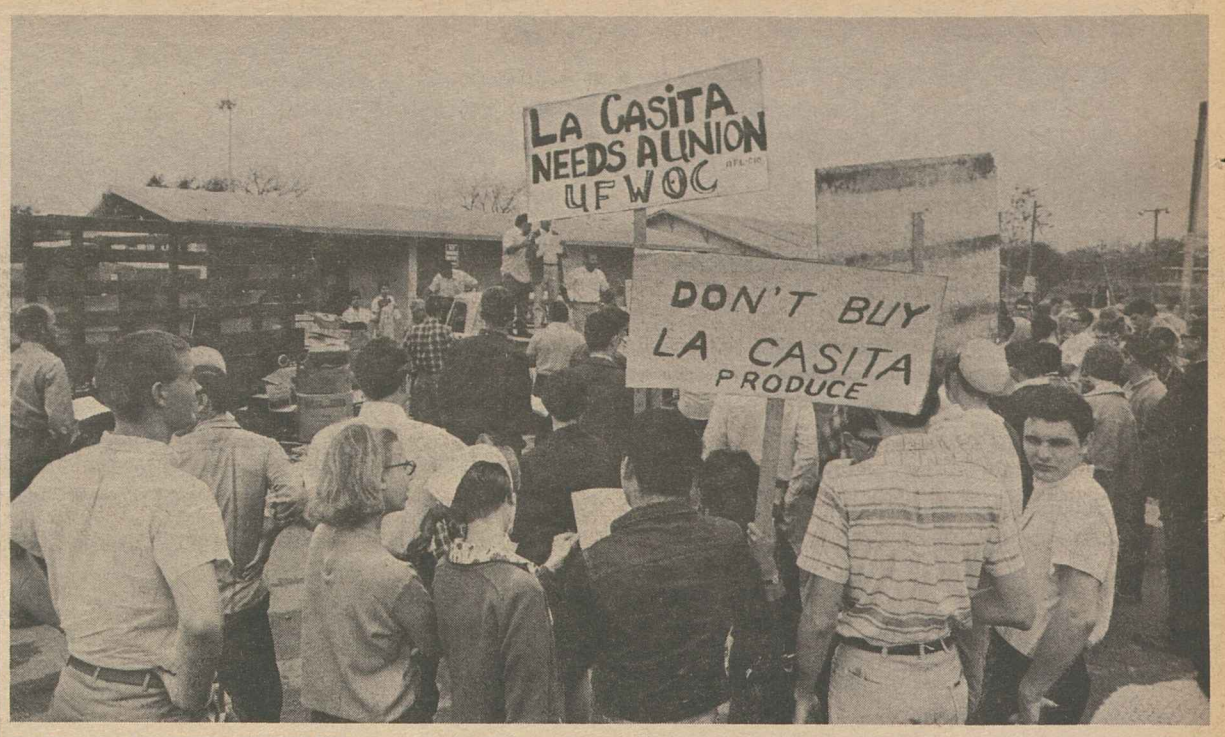
The striking craft unions and four others which observed picket lines throughout the dispute—the Lithographers & Photoengravers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters and Mailers—settled for wage increases totaling $21 over two years. Of this, $11 was effective immediately, with $4 due Nov. 1 and the remaining $6 on Mar. 22, 1968.

In addition, the workweek for the Pressmen and the Stereotypers was cut to 37.5 hours on the first shift, 36¼ on the second and 35 hours on the night shift.

The ANG got general increases averaging $20 to $24 over two years. Top minimums for reporters and display salesmen jumped $32 in three steps to $190 a week. Those for circulation district managers were increased $58.50 in three steps to the same level—the first time parity has been achieved. Outside classified salesmen were boosted a total of $44.70 to a new top minimum of $180 a week.

The pension issue, one of the factors precipitating the strike, was settled by company agreement to contribute $5.50 per employe a week to a pension fund. The agreement also calls for transfer of $3,024,000 from the company's unilateral pension fund to the new program, which will have joint union-management administration.

The settlement included an employer agreement to drop all proceedings against the unions. The unions agreed to cease publication of the Record, a striker-sponsored newspaper which was built up to a circulation of more than 80,000.



CARAVAN FOR JUSTICE, to which 250 college students and some of their teachers devoted their Easter weekend, collected food, medicine and money for striking members of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee on a 400-mile trip through South Texas. The route retraced that of last summer's farm workers' protest march to the capitol in Austin. The photo above was taken in San Antonio of the group en route from Austin to Rio Grande City, the center of the strike.

Students Form Easter Caravan To Aid Farm Strikers in Texas

Rio Grande City, Tex.—Some 250 college students disdained the resort beaches over the Easter weekend to form a "Caravan for Justice" collecting money, food and medicine for the striking farm workers of South Texas.

The caravan, made up of 53 vehicles and students from 11 Texas universities and colleges as well as seven youngsters from Notre Dame, retraced the 400 miles that the farm workers' protest march took last summer.

The students, along with a number of their teachers, collected $2,300 and two tons of food and medicine for members of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee here.

The caravan served a two-fold purpose: To collect aid for the strikers and to dramatize a boycott against the union's principal organizing target, a corporation farm, La Casita.

In San Antonio, Henry Munoz, equal opportunities director of the Texas AFL-CIO, told the caravan travelers:

"You young people can never be repaid for what you are doing today."

Rallies en Route

Along the caravan's route, rallies were held in support of the union's strike. In Edinburg, Mayor Al Ramirez welcomed the students, saying he hoped the farm workers "will somehow get the same benefits as workers in other factories."

In La Joya, children of the striking farm workers met the caravan and an Easter egg hunt was held in the city park.

At Rio Grande City, the center of the strike activities where numerous arrests of strikers and sympathizers have taken place, the students noted a change in attitude of officials and citizens.

A rally was held on the courthouse steps, and then the strikers and the students paraded 15 blocks to the union's headquarters where they sang freedom songs such as "The Union Makes Us Strong" and "We Shall Have a Union," the latter to the tune of "We Shall Overcome." All this was done without interference from law enforcement officers.

Erasmo Andrade, chairman of the statewide Valley Farm Workers Assistance Committee, said: "We were amazed. For the first time, the townspeople in Rio Grande City seemed friendly. Maybe things are changing down there."

Meanwhile, in Austin, the state capital, the battle continued for a state minimum wage law that would include farm workers.

The farm workers' march from Rio Grande City to Austin last summer drew attention to their plight and encouraged support of state minimum wage legislation. Some 1,000 persons turned out for a Senate hearing on the proposed wage bill, but the hearing was postponed at the last minute.

The bill's supporters then held a rally on the capitol steps at which Pres. H. S. Hank Brown, of the Texas AFL-CIO, said, "Texas has more poverty-stricken people than any state in the union. A minimum wage law would go a long way towards ending this deplorable condition. And we're going to march and demonstrate until Texas has a wage law."

The proposed state minimum wage bill has been sent to subcommittee by the House Labor Committee and a hearing has been rescheduled in the Senate Labor Committee.

Delano Workers Mark Year Since Pilgrimage

Delano, Calif.—The historic pilgrimage of California farm workers from Delano to the state capital in Sacramento was re-enacted in miniature on its first anniversary with an Easter weekend of activities in which hundreds of strikers and their friends from the labor movement participated.

The observance began with a parade from Delano's Filipino Hall, where early efforts to unionize badly exploited agricultural workers were centered, to a 40-acre tract east of the city which the rapidly-growing AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee acquired for the construction of a headquarters building, a service center and a co-op store.

The land was dedicated by Rev. Juan Alabart, pastor of Our Lady of Guadelupe Church in Delano, and the Rev. Wayne C. Hartmire, director of the California Migrant Ministry.

The 1,000 marchers and hundreds who joined them at the site heard greetings from leaders of various unions, an address by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, and reports by UFWOC officers on the progress of the organizing campaign, the strikes and the boycotts over the previous year.

Other Gains

Satisfaction was voiced over accomplishments in Schenley Corp. contracts and at the pace of organization in DiGiorgio Corp. operations. DiGiorgio bargaining also has been completed and unresolved issues have been submitted to arbitrators whose findings are due soon.

Larry Itliong, assistant director of the UFWOC, acted as master of ceremonies for the celebration.

In the evening there was a gala presentation of singing and national dancing by Filipino and Mexican-American members of the union. In addition Richard Liebes of the Building Service Employes and Mrs. Liebes gave an exhibition of Israeli folk dancing.

On Easter Sunday, a Protestant sunrise service was conducted on the site of the union's projected headquarters, followed by a Catholic field mass.

Later in the day a program of games and contests was staged for the children of the UFWOC members.

Stone-Glass Body Names Executive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The seven-union AFL-CIO Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee has named Pres. Howard P. Chester of the Window Glass Cutters League as its executive secretary, Lee W. Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers and committee chairman, announced here.

Chester will take over his new duties in June, opening an office in Washington at the same time.

A native of Mt. Vernon, O., he entered the window glass industry in 1937 and has been president of his union for the past six years.

The committee represents some 250,000 AFL-CIO members who share mutual interests. Besides the Glass Cutters and Bottle Blowers, the unions concerned are the Flint Glass Workers; Potters; Brick & Clay Workers; Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, and the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

Dirksen's New Challenge

SEN. EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN'S unremitting campaign to subvert the principle of "one man, one vote" has moved from the nuisance stage to a clear and direct challenge to the proposition of fair representation.

If Dirksen and his conservative allies have their way the U.S. would have its first constitutional convention since 1787 for the purpose of amending the Constitution to destroy the "one man, one vote" principle laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The New York Times reported that the campaign has resulted in a "plot to amend the federal Constitution without anyone in Washington finding out." Dirksen's ploy is to invoke the never-used section of the Constitution that provides that "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states (Congress) shall call a convention for proposing amendments."

In the past three years the very conservative Council of State Governments and the American Farm Bureau Federation have led the way in securing passage of varying types of resolutions and memorials from 32 state legislatures calling for a convention to upset the fair representation rule of the court.

The court has ruled that both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned according to population. The Dirksen proposal—twice defeated in the U.S. Senate—would allow one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population.

The Dirksen plan would in effect water down the value of one person's vote as against another's and reinstitute in the country a system of rotten boroughs that gives effective control of a legislature to rural and non-urban areas.

The resolutions and memorials adopted by the 32 state legislatures are open to strong challenge, the critical point being that they were adopted by legislatures that were malapportioned at the time of passage.

The quiet, state-by-state campaign has finally awakened the forces for fair representation to the dangers of the Dirksen move. In several legislatures still in session this year the battle has been joined to prevent new resolutions; in others campaigns are in progress to repeal resolutions adopted a year or two ago.

There are a number of grave questions concerning the never-before-used technique for amending the Constitution and constitutional experts are carefully examining the situation.

But the present danger is that Dirksen will once again introduce in the U.S. Senate his plan to amend the Constitution by the normally used route of adoption of an amendment by Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the state legislatures.

His proposal has twice gone down to defeat because of a determined battle by liberal-labor forces. The margins have not been great in either vote so that the possibility of passage on a third try by Dirksen is not remote.

The principle of "one man, one vote" is basic to the operation of a democratic system of government. A long struggle preceded the historic rulings of the court that have resulted in reapportioned legislatures capable of dealing with the problems of the Sixties on an equitable basis.

There can be no turning backward. The Dirksen "plot" has been exposed; now every effort must be made to defeat once and for all time this threat to our system of government.

Full Benefit of Union Contract Requires Knowledge of Terms

The following is excerpted from an editorial, "It Pays to Know Your Union Contract," in the March issue of Retail Clerks Advocate, official monthly publication of the Retail Clerks Intl. Union.

A UNION AGREEMENT is one of the most precious accomplishments of our evolving democracy. It brings an orderly government of laws into the workplace, replacing the unbridled authority of a boss. Union members who become familiar with the arduous and heroic struggles of wage earners to establish the liberating institution of collective bargaining thereby deepen their understanding of this heritage.

The freedom to organize and negotiate collective bargaining agreements was not always recognized by law. In colonial times and for several decades after the American Revolution, respected judges looked upon working people who combined to demand higher wages as criminal conspirators. It took both vision and courage for union pioneers to brave the wrath of authority in the struggle to establish their right to unite for mutual economic benefits. It was not until 1842 that the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that combinations of working people were lawful.

Further, to appreciate the value a union contract has for a worker, one must understand the changes in living and working conditions that have occurred in this century. Within the span of a few lifetimes, the populations of America and Canada have been transformed from nations of farmers and rural dwellers into urbanized economies in which the overwhelming majority of citizens work for someone else—and most usually a corporation. Almost everyone is dependent for his livelihood, and even for his very existence, on the conditions of employment which he may obtain from his employer.

The growth of the trade union movement is a logical response to the needs of wage earners and salaried employes. It is their best way of bringing into their lives some degree of order and security. Collective action brings freedom from the anarchy and uncertainty which results when workers compete against one another to sell their services at the lowest price to an employer.

With this background, it can be understood that the collective bargaining agreement between the employer and the union is a valuable property to the union member. Like other agreements establishing property rights, it is a legal document enforceable in the courts. It sets forth the employe's wage rate, describes the fringe benefits to which he is entitled, establishes his daily and weekly hours of work. In short, it codifies the many beneficial conditions of employment which have been gained through organization and which have been improved with the growth of the union, the increasing bargaining experience of the union negotiating committee, and the maturing leadership of the union officers supported by a unified membership.

THE GAINS which a union member makes as a result of collective bargaining are concrete and measurable. His negotiated wage increases are exchanged for consumable items of many kinds: Food, clothing, and shelter. Other provisions of the union agreement may be less tangible, but they are no less valuable: The peace of mind which comes with job security, the self respect which comes with the knowledge that the union agreement contains a just grievance procedure, the dignity which a worker enjoys with the knowledge that he does not have to compete for favoritism.

Like many other rights, the protections and benefits contained in a union agreement must be understood by each member if they are to be fully realized and safeguarded. Without this knowledge a worker cannot be certain that he is not giving away his services without fair compensation. A thoroughgoing familiarity with the provisions of the union agreement is a worker's assurance that he is not working for less than his services are worth.

The hours, the days and the years of service which an employe gives in exchange for the compensation and working conditions contained in his union agreement are hours that cannot be lived over again. If he misses out on overtime pay due him, fails to take his rest periods, or is not classified according to the rate to which he is entitled, he is losing valuable property which can never be replaced.

The union agreement is the best way employes have found of securing a fair return for the productive hours of their life. But it is not an automatic guarantee. Only by full knowledge of its provisions and their careful observance can a worker be sure of securing a full measure in return for the productive hours of his life.

Morgan Says:

San Quentin's Condemned Men Point Up Death Penalty Issue

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.) The program will be resumed after the current network strike is settled.

POLLSTER LOUIS HARRIS finds that Gov. Ronald Reagan's conservative policies on education have split the state of California "down the middle." It would be interesting to measure the public's reaction to the governor's views on capital punishment. This, too, may build into a heated political issue. There are 62 men on "death row" in California's San Quentin prison awaiting execution. There has not been an execution in the state since January 1963. But many citizens and groups, the American Civil Liberties Union high among them, fear that what they describe as a kind of "legalized blood bath" may ensue if the death penalty is resumed with that extraordinary number of condemned men living daily under its shadow. The U.S. Supreme Court has granted stays to two of these men within the last three weeks. The U.S. Circuit Court issued a stay to a third man, but two other men have their executions definitely set between now and Apr. 15.

Morgan

These California cases cumulatively have national, indeed international ramifications, because capital punishment has become a worldwide issue and because, fairly or unfairly, here is another area in which Ronald Reagan's measure will be taken as a political figure.

On a recent visit to Washington—by coincidence he has been here three times in two weeks—Reagan told a news conference that although he was "not happy with it," he believes in capital punishment. "Until it can be proved that it is not a deterrent to crime," he said, "I do not look on it (merely) as punishment."

He emphasized that each of the 62 cases now on death row would be treated by his office as individuals and "where clemency is found warranted it will be given," but otherwise he did not think that the governor can "rise above the courts."

It is possible that the argument about whether capital punishment deters crime will never be resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned. But certainly the argument that it does not is at least as impressive as the reverse, and this observer happens to believe that it is far more so.

One can hardly dispose idly of the fact that Great Britain, where justice has been guarded perhaps more jealously than in any other country, has abolished the death penalty, except for certain "treasonable acts." The new attorney general of the United States, Ramsey Clark, gave the Justice Dept.'s view on the issue in a speech in 1965, when he was second in command. "We favor the abolition of the death penalty," Clark said.

"Modern penology with all its correctional and rehabilitation skills affords greater protection to society than the death penalty which is inconsistent with its goals. This nation is too great in its resources and too good in its purposes to engage in the . . . deliberate taking of human life as either a punishment or a deterrent to domestic crime."

A WELL-KNOWN California lawyer, Gerald H. Gottlieb, quotes that passage in a discussion recently published by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions in Santa Barbara. Gottlieb also quotes the late great warden of Sing Sing, Lewis E. Lawes', conviction that "(capital) punishment serves no purpose other than to get rid of the murderer." He further quotes San Quentin's own longtime former warden, Clinton T. Duffy, as saying "I hate the death penalty because it is not the deterrent to crime that its advocates claim. . . . I have yet to meet the man who let the thought of the gas chamber stop him from committing murder."

One argument the Civil Liberties Union mounts against capital punishment is that it is unconstitutional because it violates the 8th Amendment, which declares that "excessive bail shall not be required nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted." The ACLU notes with encouragement that only 15 persons were executed in the entire United States in 1964, only seven in 1965 and only one in 1966.

But it is highly apprehensive that Reagan will "turn the clock of humanity backward." Despite Reagan's assurance that each case will be considered individually, it was bitterly distressed by the fact that the governor did not attend the clemency hearing for one doomed man—whose sentence the Supreme Court later stayed—but sent instead his clemency secretary, Edwin Meese, a former California public prosecutor who, the ACLU said, has "expressed himself . . . in favor of capital punishment."

Permissiveness is not the issue here nor is it the argument of the opponents of the death penalty. Their main points are that it is a savage exercise of revenge and that it does not deter crime. So far Reagan has shrugged off charges that he is developing a "government by punishment" regime in education, welfare and state employment fields as the frivolous accusations of political foes. He may get a far more punitive label than he bargains for if he considers capital punishment as something less than an issue of life and death.

Direct Billing Ban Urged:

Medicare's Promise Dimmed by Doctors

MEDICARE went into effect July 1, 1966. Since that time many elderly citizens, covered by the law, have complained bitterly about the widespread practice among physicians of forcing oldsters to pay directly for services and then to seek repayment from the medicare carrier.

The full meaning of this practice was brought home recently by an officer of a local union in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee on revisions in the social security system.

Testifying was Michael J. Zahorsky, recording secretary of Steelworkers Local 1211, Aliquippa, Pa. He was accompanied by local Pres. Morros Brummitt and Financial Sec. Guido Palombo. The local has some 12,000 members.

Zahorsky opened his statement saying that medicare "was the most humane act passed by our Congress since the enactment of the Social Security Act of more than 30 years ago." Then he got down to the key point in his testimony.

He said that as recording secretary of the local "it is among my duties to serve our retirees and guide them in matters of concern to them, to assist them with their problems." This is what he found:

"It was shortly after July 1, 1966, that we began to observe and learn of inadequacies of medicare, even so as to cause us to view with suspicion the easing of opposition to the enactment of medicare by the profession so vitally opposed previously. . . .

"Retirees came to our offices loaded with medical bills, doctors' requests for full payment for treatments and services rendered. Many came in tears, many wives accompanied the emotionally disturbed pensioner, many called, many sought our advice and guidance.

" 'What has happened to medicare? Why do I have to pay all the doctor bill whereas heretofore all I was required to do was to sign my name and nothing more?'

Zahorsky said "an immediate revision must be made."

"Our oldsters," he testified, "are requested to make full payment of bills before the doctor will furnish him with a 'request for payment' form, in itself a cumbersome and confusing bit of paperwork for any aged person. . . .

"Why with only receipts for payments made, how in the world can you fill out the required questions as to nature of service, diagnosis, etc? Only an attending physician could do that. But have the patient return to the doctor for such completion of papers and you run into trouble with an extra fee."

The union furnished the committee a number of exhibits in which doctors asked for full payment before they turned over forms.

"Now," asked Zahorsky, "will any of you honorable men tell where that old retiree can scrape up $200, $300, $400 or $500 in a hurry? Give a thought to one of your parents receiving such a request if they be in the circumstances that the majority of aged citizens find themselves. Yes, and in cases I have been told they have been prompted to ask their children to assist them, to go to the bank and take out some of the savings they should have, or even go to a loan shark who will gladly lend them the money.

"Yes, and all the medicine and doctors in the world cannot administer a cure for the emotion that the oldster suffers in the meantime.

"We are asking you to please remove this stigma of being billed direct by the doctor, and we do believe you will. It is just too bad that too many of our old folks are so sentimental that they are actually going into life savings to pay when medicare had promised them something better than they previously had."

Zahorsky stressed other points he felt must be changed for medicare to provide the service its authors envisioned. One was halting the widespread increase in fees charged by physicians, enabling so many doctors to profit outrageously from medicare.

"Everyone must be compensated for the service he renders to society," the unionist told Congress, "but why must one assumed to be dedicated to alleviate human suffering place dollars before service?" (PAI)

Congressional Probe Urged Of Auto Insurance Industry

A THOROUGH investigation of insurance industry practices and policies that cause hardships for many people was urged by a labor official in a recent radio interview.

Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, charged that arbitrary policy cancellations, insurer bankruptcies and the practice of refusing automobile and other insurance to residents of particular areas make it especially difficult for Negroes and Puerto Ricans to get and keep good insurance protection.

The cause is "low income among minorities" with "overtones of racial discrimination," Miss Dubrow said, as she was questioned by reporters on the weekly network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

"All areas of insurance ought to be investigated," Miss Dubrow declared, pointing out that frauds in many kinds of insurance have taken place in several states.

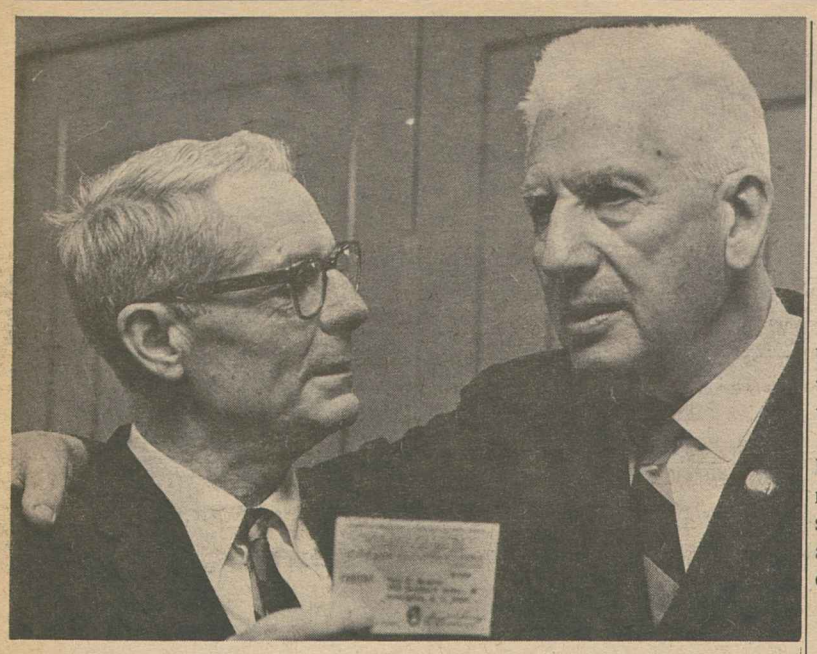
"We are not impugning the motives of insurance companies," she said. "We assume that the honest insurance agents and the honest insurance companies would want to clear up any question in the minds of the public" and "they ought to be cooperating with us," she added.

SHE CITED PROPOSALS now before Congress to create a federal auto insurance guarantee agency along the lines of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. that insures individual bank deposits. Such an agency, she said, would be a "first step" in the complete overhaul needed in the insurance field.

Miss Dubrow also observed that there is a good chance the 90th Congress will enact the long-pending "truth-in-lending" bill. "I think we are going to be able to iron out some problems that are in the minds of the people" who oppose the measure, she said.

Reporters questioning her on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Wilson Morris, Washington correspondent for United Press Intl., and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

A FULL INVESTIGATION of the insurance industry, its practices and policies is a key consumer-protection goal of organized labor, Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers told Harry Conn (left) of Press Associates, Inc., and Wilson Morris of United Press Intl. on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO-produced interview is a weekly feature on the Mutual Radio Network.



UNION CARD in the Chicago local of the Television & Radio Artists is presented to former Sen. Paul H. Douglas by Raymond A. Jones (left), the local's executive secretary. Douglas will conduct a series of national affairs television programs. It's not the first union card for the veteran statesman; he is a charter member of the Chicago Teachers union.

Baltimore-D.C. Drive Yields Organizing Gains

Unions that cooperated in forming the AFL-CIO Baltimore-D.C. Organizing Committee in 1963 have since won bargaining rights for 32,195 workers, the committee said in a report to Federation Pres. George Meany.

The participating unions originally set two years as the "target" period for the organizing drive but the advantages of joint effort have been so obvious that their cooperation continues into the present, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver W. Singleton said. He listed these gains:

- The cooperating unions won bargaining rights for 10,765 persons in 191 elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.
- Bargaining rights for an additional 21,430 employes of federal, state, county and municipal government agencies were won by card checks and other forms of "consent" recognition.
- The committee supervised the training of 23 union members as organizers, and 14 were later employed by participating unions.
- Central bodies in the area showed an increase of more than 15,000 in the membership of affiliated unions during the organizing period.

The committee reported also that it lost 96 NRLB elections in bargaining units with 5,429 workers.

Unions taking part in the drive pooled $231,000 into funds for the committee, and the AFL-CIO supplied all division coordinators and paid the cost of their services.

"The drive was very successful, but its most satisfying product was the creation of an atmosphere of fraternal cooperation, which still continues," AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher commented.

As a result of the cooperation, multi-union elections decreased and conflicting claims to representation were resolved, Kircher said. He added:

"It is gratifying that cooperation among unions has had such a beneficial effect. The same helpful procedures are continuing, and the regional office is maintaining the same cooperation."

Singleton is the committee director. He told Meany that all AFL-CIO departments and affiliates gave the committee their "complete cooperation" and assistance in the organizing drive.

'Backdoor' Approach:

Dirksen Spurs New Assault On One Man, One Vote Rule

Nearly all of them were passed by malapportioned legislatures, whose members were trying to protect their seats.

Two of the resolutions, dating back to 1963, called for an earlier, more drastic version of the Dirksen Amendment—one which would allow both houses of a legislature to disregard population.

Senators William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.), leaders of the fight against the amendment, have strongly challenged Dirksen's claim of 32 valid state petitions.

Only six of the legislatures were validly apportioned when they passed the resolutions, Proxmire told the Senate.

"For Congress to accept such petitions," he said, "would be like permitting all Democrats to have two votes in a referendum to determine whether or not Democrats should have two votes."

Tydings charged that Dirksen's strategy "seems to be to get so many state legislatures to ask for a convention that Congress will be terrified" into passing the amendment itself rather than throw the Constitution open to possible wholesale change.

Although constitutional experts differ, some have argued that a constitutional convention could not be confined to a single amendment and would be free to change the Bill of Rights or overturn a host of other Supreme Court rulings.

The AFL-CIO was an early foe of the Dirksen amendment and its predecessor attempts to overturn one man, one vote standards. Federation Pres. George Meany charged at the 1965 AFL-CIO convention that Dirksen's filibuster against repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14(b) was "solidly and inescapably intertwined" with labor's opposition to his constitutional amendment.

A lavishly financed public relations campaign was mounted by supporters of the Dirksen Amendment but it lost ground as state after state reapportioned on a population basis.

In Congress, then-Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) kept a steady glare of exposure on the campaign, charging that it was financed by "the big corporate interests . . . which wanted to evade and avoid the paying of their just share of taxation."

On the other side of the fence, Sen. Frank J. Lausche (D-Ohio) alleged that legislatures based on population would put labor "in control" and warned: "Destroy the influence of the conservative farmer and, in my judgment, there will be destroyed good government."

No matter how initiated, any constitutional amendment would require ratification by three-fourths of the states. But opponents are not taking rejection for granted after seeing what the League of Women Voters described as "blitz methods" used in the four legislatures which adopted Dirksen Amendment resolutions this year.

Dirksen's Role

The 1967 actions were by Colorado, North Dakota, Indiana and Illinois. A New York Times check indicated that Dirksen played an active behind-the-scenes role in at least three of the states.

The Colorado legislature had rejected a constitutional convention resolution in 1965, but the Speaker of the House told newsmen that it passed this year after a member of Dirksen's staff came to Denver to push for its adoption.

Illinois and Indiana legislative leaders confirmed that Dirksen had worked closely with the sponsors of the resolution in the two legislatures. It was steamrollered through the Illinois House, without hearings, on the same day it was introduced.

The League of Women Voters has urged its chapters to seek to have states that passed Dirksen Amendment resolutions before being reapportioned rescind their actions. There is a constitutional question as to whether recission would wipe out the original actions.

Some of the resolutions reportedly adopted by states have never been formally transmitted to Congress. The 32 states in which it has been reported that resolutions calling for a constitutional convention have been adopted are:

Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming.

Of these, Proxmire and Tydings contend, only Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, North Dakota and Oklahoma had legislatures apportioned to one man, one vote standards at the time they acted.

NLRB Condemns Effort To Oust Shop Steward

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that a company foreman's attempt to get rid of a union shop steward "or there'll be hell to pay" strikes at the "very heart" of the collective bargaining relationship and requires a cease-and-desist order.

The board, in a 2-1 decision, ordered Lever Brothers Co. to post a notice that it will not threaten employes of its Los Angeles soap and detergent supplies plant nor interfere with the internal affairs of Chemical Workers Local 452.

The case developed in 1965 when a foreman called plant machine shop employes to a meeting, told them he could not "get along" with the department steward and advised them to get rid of the steward or he would "make it rough" on everyone.

Trial Examiner Howard Myers recommended dismissal of an unfair labor practice charge because the incident was an isolated one and the company had an otherwise good record of peaceful relations with the union.

Two board members reversed the examiner and agreed with the NLRB general counsel that an order should be issued. In the overwhelming majority of collective bargaining agreements, members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., pointed out, the foreman-steward relationship is generally the first stage of the grievance procedure, and "each party is entitled to the unrestricted services of its representative."

Conceding that there was only one incident involved, they said that not only would the foreman's actions directly affect the steward's relations with the employes he represented in his section, but they could "very likely have a direct impact on the relationship between other stewards and the employes they represent."

Management posted a notice disavowing any involvement in the "claimed" interference but the notice was not posted until six months after the incident and only after management was notified of the NLRB counsel's intention to issue a complaint, the two panelists said.

CSA Sessions To Hear Public Health Experts

More than a score of nationally prominent experts on community health will take part in the 12th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services Apr. 16 to 20 at the Hotel Commodore in New York City, Federation Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis announced.

Scheduled speakers include Dr. Howard J. Brown, New York City health commissioner; Dr. Jack H. Mendelson, chief of the National Center for Prevention & Control of Alcoholism; Mrs. Marty Mann, executive director of the National Council on Alcoholism; Dr. Berwyn F. Mattison, executive director of the American Public Health Association; Dr. Maxwell N. Weisman of the University of Maryland; Brian O'Connell, director, National Association for Mental Health.

Also, U. S. Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball; Dr. Stanley F. Yolles, director of the National Institute of Mental Health; Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey; Harold F. O'Keefe of the U. S. Food & Drug Administration's Bureau of Medicine; Dr. Howard A. Rusk, director of New York University's Institute of Rehabilitation Medicine and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the Community Services Committee.

The final conference session will be the annual Murray-Green award dinner, Apr. 20, honoring Dr. Albert B. Sabin, developer of the oral anti-polio vaccine.

New Hope Rises Among Underpaid As Pickets Walk Streets of Laredo

Laredo, Tex.—Laredo is in the grip of a movement that is bringing new hope and new spirit to woefully underpaid workers.

"It's democracy in action," Texas AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans said of the movement that was started by VISTA volunteers who found conditions so bad they felt compelled to do something about it.

The "something" so far has resulted in two strikes, an unrelated first contract and a surge of interest in unionization among the city's 22,500 workers—11.4 percent of whom are unemployed. Another 5,000 Mexican nationals cross the international bridge across the Rio Grande from Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, each day to join the labor force. The local central body reports that Laredo's per capita income is the lowest of all U.S. cities.

The movement was sparked by Richard Geisler of New York, a VISTA volunteer who was so appalled at conditions he found among the workers that he quit his job and with the aid of his brother, William, and several young Laredo residents formed an organization they called VIDA, a word which in Spanish means life and in English stands for Voice in Democratic Action.

Other VISTA volunteers also gave help. Neil Birnbaum, 22, son of a Chicago attorney, and Douglas Ruhe, 22, of Kansas City, gave half of their modest VISTA salaries to feed hungry workers and entered so enthusiastically into VIDA activities that they were fired. Evans said the Texas AFL-CIO is attempting to secure their reinstatement.

The first picket line, featuring signs reading: "Could You Feed Your Family on $12 a Week?" was placed in front of a downtown cafeteria owned by Charles Deliganis, who indignantly declared that "it's not $12, it's $15—and they get their meals," who proclaimed that "one 'girl' gets $22 a week," and who said his workers "have never been so happy" even though some of them were getting 32 cents an hour.

After 11 days of picketing Deliganis went to District Court and obtained a temporary injunction prohibiting picketing. The Webb County AFL-CIO went to the pickets' aid and when the hearing came up the State AFL-CIO attorney, Sam Houston Clinton, came here from Austin to represent VIDA. The injunction was modified to permit one picket every 50 feet.

But Deliganis and VIDA got together and worked out a surprise agreement under which all the pickets, including six who had quit, were reinstated in their jobs and given wage increases described as "substantial" in view of past pay levels.

The unit at the cafeteria is now being channeled into the Laborers.

The employes of a grill and a cafe, spurred by the success of Deliganis' workers, have gone on strike for higher wages and better working conditions.

To Protect Miners:

Labor Cites Urgency Of Radiation Guides

Organized labor's long fight against the agonizing death that stalks underground uranium miners exposed to radioactive gas may soon bear fruit when the Federal Radiation Council completes action on a proposed radiation protection guide.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates, however, are still working to strengthen the safeguards. Uranium miners now suffer and often die from lung cancer at a rate far exceeding that for non-miners living in the same area. Labor wants their exposure to radiation reduced to a level no higher than that of radiation workers as a whole.

The proposals before the council would reduce the permissible level only to the point where it would be about three times the rate for the U.S. as a whole, and between two and three times greater than that in other industries, where radiation is a hazard.

The federal and state governments have done little until recently to protect the miners. The council was set up in 1959. It is composed of the secretaries or heads of U.S. departments and other agencies with responsibility for radiation control, with the secretary of health, education and welfare as chairman. The Metal Mining Act of 1966, passed with strong labor support, placed responsibility for regulating health and safety with the secretary of the interior through the Bureau of Mines.

Guidelines Discussed

The council, whose executive director is Dr. Paul Tompkins, recently held an informal meeting at which the proposed guidelines were discussed by union spokesmen and representatives of the federal government, the mining industry, the states and experts in the field of radiation.

Participants included Sec. George Taylor of the AFL-CIO Staff Committee on Atomic Energy & Natural Resources; Vice Pres. Elwood Swisher of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Research Dir. Paul Hutchings of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and Legislative Dir. Jack Sheehan of the Steelworkers.

When the proposed protection guide is approved by the council and by Pres. Johnson, standards and regulations will be adopted by the secretary of the interior. The affected states will be given a reasonable time to make them effective and enforce them. If they fail to act, the federal government can step in under the 1966 act and do the job itself. Labor is concerned lest the "reasonable time" be overlong.

The major radiation danger in uranium mines comes from radon, a radioactive gas which is a member of the uranium family of elements always found in uranium mines.

It continuously diffuses from the rocks into the mine air, as methane does in coal mines. It has a half-life of but 3.8 days and quickly breaks down into Radium A, Radium B, Radium C and Radium C', collectively known as radon daughters.

The half-lives of radon daughters are measured in minutes and fractions of seconds. But they attach themselves to dust particles which are retained in the lungs when inhaled, and miners who are exposed to excessive amounts often develop lung cancer.

The concentration of radon daughters can be sharply reduced by mechanical ventilation, although it remains above the danger threshold level. Respirators can cut it further.

The unit of measurement of radon daughters is known as the "WL."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in restating organized labor's position on the proposed protection guide in a letter to Tompkins, questioned whether the suggested "1WL" standard was "adequate for the fullest possible protection" of the miners, and strongly urged that it be reduced to ".3WL."

"This would reduce the expected rate of lung cancer among underground uranium miners to the order of risk faced by other nuclear workers in Atomic Energy Commission-licensed or AEC-contractor operations, which is about the same rate as that expected in the general population," Biemiller wrote.

Minimum Standard

He noted that the Intl. Committee on Radiation Protection is expected soon to recommend a ".3WL" concentration standard for the uranium mines of all nations, and added that "surely our own country should meet this minimum standard."

"The basic problem to be solved is mine safety," Biemiller said. "It can and should be approached on that basis: control to safe levels of the underground work environment by means of present techniques of ventilation and the use of safe and well-designed respirators. Such control methods are fully capable of reducing radon daughters concentrations underground to .3WL.

"While achievement of this degree of reduced concentrations will cost the mining industry several million dollars additional, the larger mines are well able to afford such an investment. A combination of respirators and ventilation could afford the same degree of protection in the smaller mines."

Biemiller also told Tompkins it is the AFL-CIO's conviction that "there is no conceivable reason" for delay in securing Presidential approval of "the strongest possible" protection guides and their "immediate enforcement."

R. I. Democrat Holds Lead for Fogarty Seat

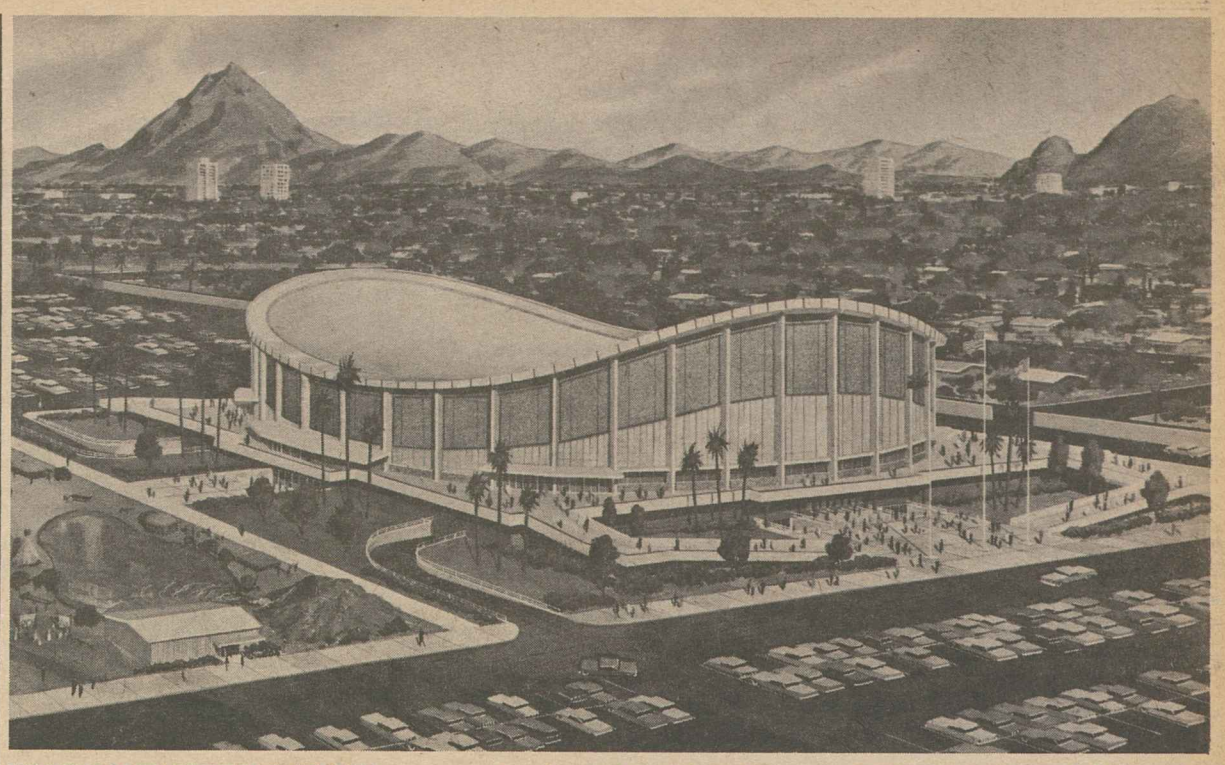
Providence—Democrat Robert O. Tiernan held a 500-vote lead in a closely contested election to fill the congressional seat of the late Rep. John E. Fogarty. But the outcome will remain uncertain until 1,900 absentee votes are counted.

Tiernan, a state senator from Warwick, was opposed by Republican James DiPrete, the mayor of Cranston. A third, pacifist candidate received only a scattering of votes.

Fogarty, a liberal Democrat and one of the more influential members of the House, held the seat from 1940 until his death in January.

In another special election, Florida voters elected a record number of Republicans to a newly reapportioned legislature. Democrats retained control of both houses, but not by the two-thirds margin needed to overrule vetoes by Republican Gov. Claude Kirk.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO



UNION-INDUSTRIES SHOW sponsored and produced by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. will be held May 19-24 in the air-conditioned Arizona Veterans Memorial Coliseum (above) in Phoenix. Unions and employers under union contract will give away more than $100,000 worth of gifts, prizes and souvenirs during the show, open daily from 1 p.m. to 10:30 p.m.

Albert Shift Bolsters Committee Majority

One of the most influential House Democrats has become the most junior member of the Education & Labor Committee.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) resigned from the Science & Astronautics Committee to strengthen the Administration majority on the Education & Labor panel, which handles much of the Great Society program.

He fills — at least temporarily—the vacancy that had been left at the start of the session for Adam C. Powell.

Textile Leader Hits Overseas 'Sweatshops'

A strong plea that other unions join the textile and clothing workers in fighting cheap imports from the Far East was made by Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers at a legislative luncheon of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

"I believe in free trade," Baldanzi said, "but are we liberalizing trade to improve the life of people in other lands or to give more to employers who already have too much?"

He cited the fact that in Hong Kong workers get paid 20 cents an hour.

"This cannot be overcome," the union leader declared. "I don't care how automated you are."

Baldanzi said that "legalized pirates" operate plants in Taiwan, South Korea, Spain, Portugal and Pakistan as well as Hong Kong and that if products have less than 50 percent cotton there is no protection against imports.

Since 1950, he reported, employment in the U.S. textile industry has declined through technological changes, automation and runaway plants to the point that 600,000 jobs have been lost.

"I don't believe that any amount of logic would ever persuade me that we should liquidate good jobs," he declared.

Baldanzi said that the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Clothing Workers, the Textile Workers Union of America and his own union have tried to help workers in these other countries to organize, but they have not been successful.

"Only in Japan," he said, "is there a real effort to elevate the worker's living standards and provide him dignity."

Social Gains Stressed As Boon to Business

Chicago—Labor is proud of being "the people's lobby" but would be glad to share the title with business groups, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said here.

Schnitzler told a conference of industry executives that business has benefitted from governmental social programs enacted with strong support from the labor movement.

Social security improvements, aid-to-education and minimum wage increases have "pumped vitality and purchasing power into the economy" as well as giving needed help to the recipients, Schnitzler said.

He told participants in an industrial relations conference of the American Paper Institute & Fibre Box Association that the money medicare patients save on hospital bills is being spent for consumer goods.

Warning that programs that have helped the entire nation are "under direct attack," Schnitzler declared:

"We need more of America to stand up for these programs. We need the voices and the support of business and management to join with labor and social and civil rights groups. . . . We need hard-headed businessmen to tell economy-minded congressmen that they are shortchanging America."

Schnitzler also called on law-abiding companies to support the AFL-CIO's demand that the government stop awarding "lush, tax-fed contracts" to firms that repeatedly violate the National Labor Relations Act, such as J. P. Stevens & Co.

To allow such a company "to amass great profits on government-awarded defense contracts" gives it "an unfair competitive advantage over law-abiding firms," Schnitzler said.

"It also contributes to an area-wide, low-wage economy around its plants, making it necessary for government programs to be initiated for the relief of company ailments. Thus you and I pay twice for the unlawful acts of such a company," he added.

"We protest. And we believe all Americans should join us."

Painters Launch Series Of Training Seminars

Houston, Tex.—The first of a series of 13 regional seminars for business representatives and financial secretaries of locals of the Painters was held here by the international union for affiliates in Texas, Arkansas and Louisiana.

Purpose of the seminars, said Pres. S. Frank Raftery, is to give local union officials additional training and guidance in organizing, bargaining, and the duties of shop stewards and financial secretaries, and to develop local education programs.

The seminars constitute an extension of panels started last year. They have been broadened to include participation by educators, economists, and leaders of the community and other labor organizations as well as the international union's general officers and staff members.

Raftery was host at a dinner for seminar participants and guests at which he summarized the sessions.

Other participants from the union included Sec.-Treas O. T. Satre; Vice Pres. G. K. Fritz, Jr.; Research & Organization Dir. Robert C. Welch; Guy Leber, administrative assistant to the president; Zel E. Lipsen, legislative assistant; Sam K. Williams and John Lazzara, assistants to the secretary-treasurer; and Representatives M. L. Parter, Virgil A. Stokes, Harry Carroll, John W. Hayes and Richard Gibbons.

Guest panel members included Dir. Nicholas Kurko of AFL-CIO Region XVII, with headquarters in Fort Worth; AFL-CIO Assistant Education Dir. Stuart Brock; Education Dir. Harold Tate of the Texas AFL-CIO, and Prof. Ray Marshall of the University of Texas Economics Dept.

ABC Signs 1st Pact At Russell Stover

Kansas City, Mo. — American Bakery & Confectionery Workers' Local 218 won a first contract with the Russell Stover Candy Co. here for 450 workers—nine months and 32 bargaining sessions after the local was certified by the National Labor Relations Board. The pact includes a 12-cent wage increase, a wage reopener next year, seven paid holidays and other benefits.

Public Spurs Probe of Auto Insurance

Hearings Planned in Congress As Protests Mount on Abuses

By David L. Perlman

If it's the squeaky wheel that gets the grease, legislation to curb abuses in the multi-billion dollar auto insurance industry may start moving in Congress and the state legislatures.

The outraged cries from the public are coming through loud and clear.

Indignant letters protest zooming insurance costs, cancellation of auto insurance for flimsy reasons or for no given reason at all, the denial of the right to buy insurance from standard companies to families who live in the "wrong" section of town.

The letters come in a steady flow to congressmen, senators, state legislators, unions and union newspapers. Virtually every published account of an outrageous experience with auto insurance brings a new series of "I can top this . . ." personal experiences.

Two congressional committees are planning investigations and hearings on bills to establish a degree of federal regulation of a notoriously free-wheeling industry. And in state after state, AFL-CIO central bodies are battling rate increases and prodding state insurance commissioners to represent the public interest.

At the federal level, a bill originally sponsored by Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn.) is aimed at protecting auto insurance policyholders against loss when companies go out of business because of fraud or mismanagement. Policies would be guaranteed by a federal corporation in a system similar to federal insurance of bank deposits. The 73 insurance company failures since 1963 cost 300,000 persons more than $100 million.

Even this modest form of federal protection and regulation would require Congress to reverse a resolution it adopted in 1945 ceding to the states all regulatory rights over the insurance business. The legislation was in response to a 1944 Supreme Court decision finding that insurance is interstate commerce and subject to federal regulation.

Calling for "a general investigation by Congress of the insurance industry," the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month cited evidence of "automobile insurance that is over-priced, often capriciously cancelled, and of consumer losses from liquidations of 'high risk' insurers." The council urged that the entire insurance industry be brought under federal regulation.

Among the sponsors of the Dodd bill are heads of two congressional groups expected to probe insurance issues—Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) of the Senate Commerce Committee and Rep. John E. Moss (D- Calif.), chairman of a subcommittee of the House Commerce Committee.

Some Loopholes

The proposed federal legislation would, however, leave untouched some of the major causes of workers' complaints, including overpricing, cancellations and "blackouts" of neighborhoods and occupations.

Here the battles have been fought at the state levels. In Arkansas this year, the State AFL-CIO was instrumental in blocking a big rate increase. The state federation collected 30,000 signatures on petitions opposing the increase and retained a nationally-known expert to testify at rate hearings.

A chief item of contention—as it has been in many other states — was whether the investment profits an insurance company makes on its reserves and unearned premiums should be taken into account in considering whether a rate increase is justified.

When the insurance commissioner indicated his agreement with the labor argument that investment profits should be considered, the companies withdrew their application for a price hike.

In many other states as well, labor was the leading force in fighting rate increases—sometimes successfully, sometimes in vain.

The Machinist, weekly IAM newspaper, has kept up a running expose of cancellations or refusals to renew policies of members with years of safe driving experience and few if any claims. Persons in their 50's and 60's have been cancelled, solely because of age; a Chicago member had his policy cancelled after two weeks because, the agent told him, he lived in a predominantly Negro neighborhood; a California member who had driven 26 years without an accident lost his insurance because he was under treatment for diabetes.

In most cases, persons who have had insurance cancelled or have been denied insurance have had to pay steep rates from so-called "high-risk" companies.

A reader of the Milwaukee Labor Press wrote the editor that his "retirement present" from his insurance company when he reached the age of 65 was a letter which "regretted" that they were cancelling his insurance. He had paid premiums averaging over $100 a year for 20 years, with a single claim of $120 during this time, he wrote.

Insurance companies have defended rising premium costs and selective insuring by pointing to the increased cost of car repairs and high jury verdicts in accident cases.

Congress Urged to Add Vocational Aid to GI Bill

The same program of apprenticeship, on-the-job and on-the-farm training that was a part of the original "GI Bill of Rights" of World War II should be provided for today's armed forces veterans, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

In testimony submitted to the Senate subcommittee on veterans' affairs, Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller gave organized labor's support to vocational proposals that would correct what he termed a "serious deficiency" in last year's veterans legislation. He also endorsed proposed increases in educational assistance allowances to ex-GIs attending college.

Biemiller noted that the vocational provisions would be "especially applicable" to veterans who are members of minority groups and who may never enter college. "These are the men most in need of skilled job training and the economic assistance that must supplement this training," he said.

Assistance to these men will also contribute to our full employment goal and economic progress, he declared.

The bill provides for training allowances to veterans in on-the-job training or apprenticeship of $80 per month for unmarried men to $115 for a man with more than one dependent. These allowances would be reduced gradually as the trainee's wages increased.

Biemiller asked that the bill's $310 per month combined wages-allowance ceiling be dropped. A cutoff in federal assistance, he said, could cause a high dropout rate in the latter training years as veterans are "lured out of training programs by immediately available higher wages in a semi-skilled occupation."

He told the committee that the program's additional federal funds will be repaid many times when the better educated and better skilled veterans increase their earning power and their subsequent tax contributions.

4 Railroad Unions Seek Firm Job Guarantees

Four rail unions representing 150,000 workers have asked the nation's railroads for a guarantee of full-time jobs for all regular employes.

The job security "movement," as it is described in rail labor terminology, was launched by the Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation-Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen, and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, which bargains for dining car workers.

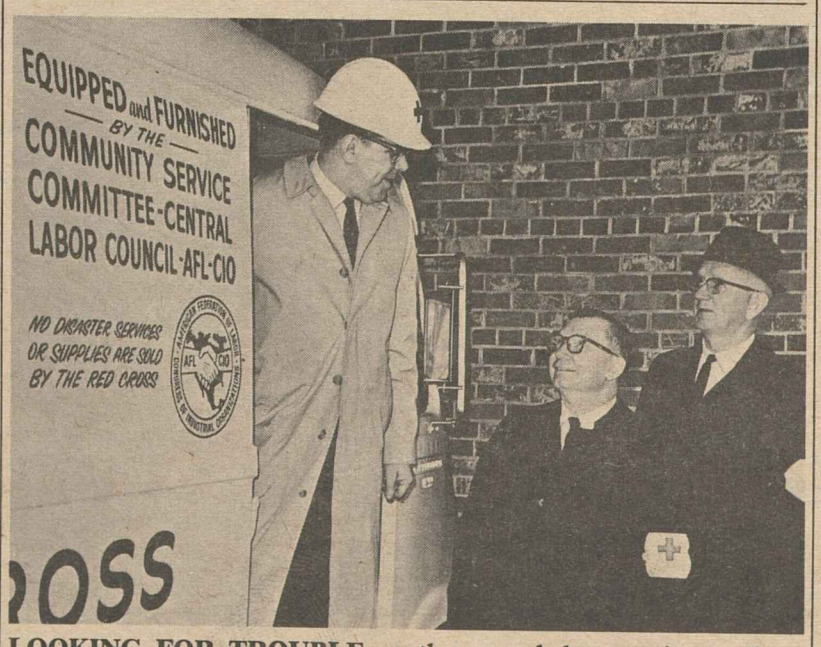
The four unions are asking that, effective July 1, railroads guarantee no layoffs of non-seasonal employes. The carriers would be barred from reducing full-time positions in any category in any seniority district by more than 2 percent a year, and then only through attrition.

Seasonal jobs could not be cut below the same month of 1966 and contracting out of work would be banned except by agreement with the union.

The cooperating unions also called on the railroads to establish a supplemental unemployment benefits plan to supplement railroad unemployment insurance.

In another rail labor development, six shopcraft unions began intensive negotiations with management in an effort to settle their wage dispute before Apr. 12. That date marks the expiration of the 30-day "no strike" period following the report of a presidential emergency board.

The Machinists, Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Firemen & Oilers, and Sheet Metal Workers had rejected a 5 percent wage offer which formed the basis of wage settlements by a number of other rail unions. After they had voted to strike for a higher increase, an emergency board was named and recommended a basic 5 percent increase plus a job evaluation plan financed by company payments into a trust fund to provide additional increases in cases of "inequities."



LOOKING FOR TROUBLE so they can help ease it are these members of the first AFL-CIO-American Red Cross disaster team, set up in Fort Wayne, Ind., by the Allen County AFL-CIO and the ARC's Fort Wayne Area Council. Emerging from the rescue car unit equipped by the local AFL-CIO is George Parker, area Red Cross director of disaster services. Greeting him are Chairman Roy Newer of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee and Thomas J. Burns (right), CSC United Fund staff representative.

5-10% Hikes Mark Canadian Pacts

Ottawa, Ont.—Major contracts signed last year by Canadian unions and employers gave about half of the 383,600 industrial workers affected immediate wage increases of 5 to 10 percent, a federal Labor Dept. survey showed.

Nearly half of the 186 major settlements—those covering 500 or more workers outside construction —were for two years, and more than 70 percent provided for total pay hikes ranging from 10 to 20 percent, the study revealed. Four settlements yielded 30 percent in raises and in three cases the total was 34 percent.

Labor Guides Set for Grants Under Arts Act

Professional performers and related personnel taking part in activities aided by grants under the National Foundation on the Arts & the Humanities Act must be paid a minimum compensation to be set by the secretary of labor, according to recently-issued regulations on labor standards.

The standards, set up by the Labor Dept., also provide that no employe be subject to dangerous or unsafe working conditions, and that recipients of grants file a guarantee of good faith in observing the requirements with the chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts.

In announcing the regulations, the Labor Dept. said they incorporate proposals made last November.

The proposals grew out of consultations with separate National Councils for the Arts and for the Humanities. Organized labor is represented on the arts council by Pres. Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians and on the council for the humanities by James Cuff O'Brien, director of the Steelworkers Committee on Older & Retired Workers.

Farm Workers Win Trailblazing Pact

Meany Hails Victory at DiGiorgio

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO farm workers have won the biggest agricultural wage and benefit package in history in the arbitration award establishing their first contract with the giant DiGiorgio Corp.

Its trailblazing provisions include unemployment insurance and a health and welfare-pension fund for farm workers. It grants the union shop and provides that all jobs are to be filled from a union operated hiring hall, with job preference for seniority.

Covers 2,700

The three-year contract is effective Apr. 3 and will cover a harvest-time peak of 2,700 workers on three DiGiorgio ranches in California, the largest number ever covered by a farm union contract.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a telegram to Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, called the contract award a "significant victory" that is "certain to bring new, long-needed gains to farm workers throughout the country."

"Your victory, therefore, is the victory of all farm workers," Meany added, "and should be an inspiration to those workers still on strike in Delano for the simple justice you have now won. It should also be clear notice to growers everywhere that the AFL-CIO will not rest until all farm workers — until now the most exploited workers in the United States — have the same opportunity to better their lives as other workers have."

The AFL-CIO president also announced the official ending of the boycott of DiGiorgio products launched last May 6 by the federation's Executive Council. He declared:

"The same solidarity demonstrated in the successful campaign against DiGiorgio will win in other battles still to come."

DiGiorgio Pres. J. Max O'Neill also predicted that the new agreement would "establish precedents" for farm worker contracts in California and other states.

Major provisions of the contract award include:

- A 25-cent per hour increase for hourly paid employes and adjustments to reflect a 25-cent per hour boost for piece work or incentive rates. This puts the basic minimum wage at $1.65 per hour.

Labor, Government Rally Support for Site Picketing

Wirtz, Unions Join Building Crafts Bid

By David L. Perlman

American labor and the Administration called on Congress to restore the right of peaceful picketing to building trades unions.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, leadoff witness at House hearings, termed passage of the on-site picketing bill "long overdue."

Four presidents, he stressed, have asked Congress to lift the "inequitable restriction" that prevents building trades unions from putting up a picket line at a construction site where more than one contractor or subcontractor is on the job. A 1951 Supreme Court ruling held this to be a secondary boycott violation of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Construction workers should have the same right as other workers "to protest substandard conditions," Wirtz said.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. spoke for the workers directly affected who, he emphasized, were asking only for the rights of "free citizens" to combat unfair employers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and spokesmen for virtually every segment of the American labor movement joined in statements of solid support for the building tradesmen and for the bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., chairman of the House Labor special subcommittee.

Labor's solidarity was expressed by the Industrial Union Dept., the Maritime Trades Dept., the Metal Trades Dept., the Railway Labor Executives' Association and by presidents of more than a score of unions.

Meany told the subcommittee that the situs picketing legislation

LBJ Urges 4.5% Hike In U.S. Pay

Pres. Johnson asked Congress to vote a 4.5 percent pay raise for salaried federal employes to bring federal pay scales closer to the goal of "comparability" with private industry.

Johnson said government figures show a 7.2 percent lag in pay. But he told Congress that his economic advisers believe "that a pay raise of this magnitude would not be prudent."

He asked also for a similar raise in military pay, declaring "as civilian pay goes up, so should the pay of the armed services."

Johnson proposed additional increases—of unspecified amounts—in 1968 and 1969 "to remove the remaining comparability lag in all grades by Oct. 1, 1969."

The amount needed to catch up with prevailing salaries outside of government would of necessity depend on the pattern of wage increases in private industry over the

Wages Key Issue:

6 Rail Shop Unions Set Strike Deadline

Six shopcraft unions advised 150,000 members on U.S. railroads to prepare for a walkout Apr. 12 while union and management negotiators continued contract talks in Washington at the call of the National Mediation Board and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The deadline was set after the National Railway Labor Conference, representing management of Class 1 railroads, rejected new union proposals to end a long dispute over wage increases and improved work rules.

Talks broke off Mar. 31 but were resumed Apr. 4 to seek settlement before the expiration of the mandatory 30-day "cooling off" period Apr. 12, with 6 a.m. local time as the deadline.

Shopcraft workers on the railroads are members of the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. They are represented in bargaining by a top officer from each union, and the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept., headed by Pres. Michael Fox.

Fox said management's turndown of union proposals triggered a notice to all shopcrafts to "alert your membership to prepare for a peaceful withdrawal from service" pending further developments. Fox called management's action "completely irresponsible."

The unions have been trying since last May to get contract improvements including wage increases large enough to close the "widening differential" between the pay and fringe benefits of skilled railroad

Protection of NLRB Urged in Agriculture

A Senate subcommittee has called for extension of the National Labor Relations Act to farm workers, declaring that "the need for an orderly method of resolving labor disputes in agriculture has become a necessity."

It blamed lack of bargaining rights and union recognition for both the bitterness of farm labor disputes, dating back to the early 1930's, and for the fact that farm worker wages are less than half those of manufacturing industry workers.

Other Needs

The migratory labor subcommittee, headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), is a unit of the Senate Labor Committee. It called also for:

- Extension of unemployment insurance "or similar income security measures" to migratory farm workers, with federal assistance because of the interstate nature of the problem.
- A gradual expansion of coverage of farm workers under the wage-hour act, beyond the "historic first step" taken by Congress last year. The subcommittee also called for continuing the step-up in the farm minimum wage until it catches up with the industrial wage floor. The present law cuts off the farm minimum at $1.30, while the nonfarm wage floor goes up to $1.60.
- Extension of workmen's compensation laws "to provide cover-

Union Backing Swells For Network Strikers

The labor movement rallied behind a strike by one of the AFL-CIO's smallest unions against the nation's giant television and radio networks—ABC, NBC and CBS.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the strike by the 18,000-member American Federation of Television & Radio Artists "has the complete support of the AFL-CIO." He added:

"The long strike-free record of AFTRA and its patience during five months of negotiations, extending well beyond the contract termination date, are ample evidence that this strike was forced upon the union by the networks, primarily through their arrogant refusal to bargain fairly and realistically on terms of employment of local newsmen and staff announcers.

"We are gratified and encouraged by the unity and spirit shown by the membership, including men and women of varied interests, talents and earning power, who are, in the best trade union tradition, lending their combined strength to the full support of their fellow workers."

While AFTRA members — including some of the nation's best known performers — walked the picket lines, representatives of other unions with members employed in

Safety Award Honors Heroic Rail Fireman

Compulsory arbitration is not the answer to labor-management differences on the railroads, Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) warned as he presented the annual safety award of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen to Alec D. Turney of the Soo Line for saving a trapped boy from the wheels of a freight engine.

"The best answer still is honest bargaining between a free labor movement and free enterprise employers," Nelson told an audience of 350 in Washington, D.C. The U.S. system, despite its occasional flaws, still is a "better system than any other," Nelson declared.

Turney is 37, and lives in Mellen, Wis. He was the ninth award winner whose heroism was recognized with a $500 gift and the engraving of his name on the union's David B. Robertson trophy.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert announced that Turney also won the Carnegie Medal for heroism. Ten other winners of annual or quarterly honors previously were given Carnegie awards, Gilbert noted.

Turney and his engineer, Les A. Howard, are members of BLF&E Lodge 259, Ashland, Wis. They were in the cab of a 15-car freight on Jan. 4, 1966, when they spotted Scott Stephenson, 7, crouching down on the ties of an icy trestle in the hope that the train would pass over him. Turney ran to the front of the locomotive and pulled the boy to the footboard by his jacket while the engineer tried to brake to a stop.

The two men and their wives were guests at the dinner. Other guests included Thomas R. Donahue, new assistant labor secretary, and Federal Railroad Administrator Albert S. Lang.

HEROISM AWARD of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen was presented to Fireman Alec D. Turney of the Soo Line (center) for snatching Scott Stephenson, 7, from icy rails in front of a moving train on an Ashland, Wis., trestle. Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) (left) made the presentation of annual safety trophy and $500 check for the union and BLF&E Pres. Harry E. Gilbert. Turney previously was given the Carnegie Medal for heroism.

Sharp Growth Reported In Government Unions

Unions bargained for more than 1 million federal government employes last year, according to a Civil Service Commission report.

The report, although just released, is based on August 1966 statistics. It showed the number of federal workers in exclusive bargaining units was 219,000 higher than the previous year and 324,000 above the 1964 figure.

Over the same period, the number of negotiated contracts nearly tripled from 209 in 1964 to 598 in 1966.

The commission's statistics showed that AFL-CIO affiliates represented the overwhelming majority of workers in exclusive bargaining units—where a union has proved its majority either through an election or a card check.

The government report listed the four unions bargaining for the largest number of government workers as the Postal Clerks, the American Federation of Government Employes, the Letter Carriers and AFL-CIO Metal Trades Councils. Together they held bargaining rights for nearly 800,000 federal workers. The largest union not affiliated with the AFL-CIO represented only 31,000 employes.

Besides establishments where unions have won exclusive bargaining rights, there are some 1,200 units in which unions have been given formal recognition — indicating they have more than 10 percent membership, but less than a majority. In such cases management agrees to consult with the union but does not negotiate a contract.

The Civil Service Commission report showed that the Post Office and Navy Departments had the largest numbers of employes working under a union contract—620,000 and 151,000 respectively.

1 Million Covered

The total of 1.05 million employes covered by exclusive recognition represented about 38 percent of the total employment in the Executive Branch of government.

Outside of the Post Office Dept., unions bargained for about 35 percent of all blue collar workers and 14 percent of white collar workers. Some 90 percent of postal employes are under a union contract.

Labor Hits 'Punitive' Measure:

Strike Fines Set By New N.Y. Law

Albany, N.Y.—The New York state legislature has replaced the penalty-laden Condon-Wadlin law governing labor relations in public employment. But the State AFL-CIO charged the new law is equally bad, applying new repressions to unions.

The Condon-Wadlin substitute, considered certain to be signed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R), would become effective Sept. 1. It sets up a state Public Employment Relations Board to certify unions as bargaining agents for units of public employes and to mediate contract disputes.

But it outlaws strikes by city or state employes and provides for fines of up to $10,000 a day for public employe organizations that "cause, instigate, encourage or condone a strike."

Individual workers who strike a public agency would be subject to discretionary penalties for misconduct, ranging from a reprimand to outright dismissal. Under Condon-Wadlin, dismissal was mandatory, but this provision had seldom been enforced because of its crippling effect on public agencies.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett called the new law "a flat repudiation and rejection of the basic freedom of all Americans, including the right to withhold their labor."

Charging that the legislature had replaced "one unworkable law with another," Corbett declared that "labor will have to give special weight in determining whom to support in the future, to the action taken on this bill."

The bill was passed by the State Senate, 38 to 18, and by the Assembly, 93 to 51, despite strong appeals from labor to reject any measure imposing harsh penalties.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired all members of the legislature voicing support of the state central body's position and assailing the bill as "hostile to the well-being" of the entire community.

"To levy confiscatory fines on unions of public employes who exercise free and democratic rights is not consistent with proven and workable labor-management-government relations," Meany declared. "This type of repressive legislation has proven to be not a deterrent to strikes but on the contrary has led to strikes or made them more difficult to resolve."

To obtain recognition or certification under the new law, a union would first have to "affirm" that it would abide by the prohibition against strikes.

In addition to the fines, a union found in violation of the no-strike rule could be deprived of the dues checkoff for up to 18 months and could regain the right only upon a new affirmation that it does not have the right to strike.

New York City, which has its own program of employe bargaining relations, would not be subject to the jurisdiction of the state board, but city workers and their unions would be covered by the penalty provisions.

Carbide Settlement Ends Walkout at Ohio Plant

Ashtabula, O.—A seven-month strike of the Steelworkers at a Union Carbide Corp. plant here ended when members of USWA Local 3081 voted to ratify a three-year contract containing wage increases of 37 cents an hour, and other improvements valued at 27 cents an hour.

The Ashtabula settlement was the sixth agreement reached since the giant corporation triggered a strike of 7,000 employes last July 2 by locking out Alloy, W.Va., workers who refused to accept a company-altered pension and insurance plan, not then open for negotiation.

Three plants with 630 employes remained on strike but their unions reported progress toward settlement—at Portland, Ore., where USWA Local 3103 represents the employes, and at Whiting, Ind., and the East Chicago Linde plant where employes are represented by Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 7-513.

The Ashtabula settlement was along the lines of an earlier "package" accepted by Carbide strikers at Marietta, O. These were the highlights reported to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which coordinated the 1966 bargaining efforts of three unions at Union Carbide—the Chemical Workers, OCAW and the USWA:

- Wage increases of 17, 10 and 10 cents an hour in yearly installments.
- Company payment, effective next Jan. 1, of the full cost of hospital, medical and surgical insurance for employes, who formerly paid half the cost.
- An improved vacation schedule, including one more week of vacation after five years of service, two more after 30 years to a top of six weeks' vacation.
- Eligibility for a full normal pension at 62 with benefits of 1.1 percent of final average earnings times years of service; retirement with full pension at 60 after 30 years of service.
- One more paid holiday for a total of nine per year.

Other plants involved in the joint bargaining effort were at Kokomo and Speedway, Ind., Sistersville, W.Va., and Sheffield, Ala.

Kokomo strikers were forced back to work Dec. 23 when the government secured a back-to-work order on the claim that the strike imperiled the national defense effort. They reached agreement Mar. 13 in a wage reopener.

The OCAW filed unfair labor practice charges against the corporation after the Alloy lockout and NLRB Trial Examiner George J. Bott upheld the union charges. He ruled the company was guilty of refusal to bargain by insisting "to the point of impasse" on union acceptance of company pension and insurance proposals.

Papermakers Propose VISTA Leave Clause

Albany, N.Y.—A contract clause protecting the rights of union members who take a leave of absence for service with VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America) has been approved by the executive board of the Papermakers & Paperworkers for use by local unions in negotiating with employers, UPP Pres. Paul L. Phillips said.

6 Shopcraft Unions Prepare for Walkout mechanics and workers with similar skills in other industries.

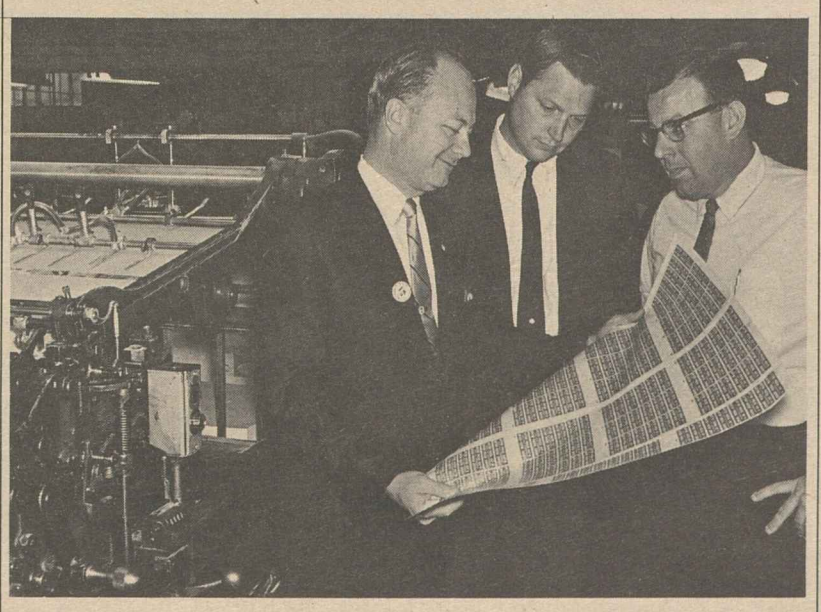
The carriers offered the shopmen the same 5 percent wage hike offered to other rail unions. When shopcraft members voted by heavy majorities to authorize a strike, Pres. Johnson named an emergency board which recommended that the parties agree to a 5 percent general increase, retroactive to Jan. 1; a wage reopening next Dec. 31; a comprehensive job evaluation study to be concluded within four months, and correction of the wage "gap" out of a fund to be placed in escrow by the carriers.

The unions then proposed the following settlement terms: a wage boost of 7 percent for all shopmen, plus 15 cents an hour for skilled classifications retroactive to last Jan. 1; a 5 percent general increase, plus an additional 15 cents an hour for skilled crafts, effective next Jan. 1; pay for all specified holidays, and vacations of three weeks after 10 years of service.

J. E. Wolfe, chief management negotiator, called the union counter-proposals "unreasonable and ridiculous" and offered to resume bargaining on the basis of the Emergency Board recommendations. The unions are prepared to call a strike after they have exhausted all the mediatory provisions of the Railway Labor Act, they said.

Other rail union developments:

- The Railway Conductors & Brakemen, unaffiliated, agreed to resume contract negotiations when representatives of 66 U.S. rail companies withdrew a threat to stop paying $23 a month per member for insurance coverage. Both parties will petition for dissolution of a temporary restraining order, issued Mar. 31 in U.S. District Court, Chicago, they said.
- Pres. Neil Speirs of the Switchmen will testify later this month in a move for dismissal of an injunction restraining a strike on the Pacific lines of the Southern Pacific Railroad. U.S. District Court Judge Albert C. Wollenberg temporarily enjoined a strike protesting the transfer of yardmasters that affected switchmen's jobs in Tucson, Ariz.
- U.S. District Court Judge Hubert L. Will, Chicago, restrained the Illinois Central Railroad from laying off 47 flagmen or brakemen on passenger trains, and the Railroad Trainmen from striking in protest. Both sides must preserve the status quo until higher courts settle a legal dispute over crew sizes, the court said.



10 MILLION STAMPS, actually stickers to go on envelopes, are being distributed by the Letter Carriers to push their campaign for higher pay. They bear the message: "Better Postal Pay—Better Postal Service—Write Your Congressman." Watching the first sheets come off the press are, from left, Letter Carriers Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher, and E. Kent Merkle and George Patterson of Merkle Press.

Kheel Reports Progress:

Key Issues Reached In Newspaper Talks

New York—Contract talks between 10 newspaper unions and 5 dailies moved to a new stage here as Mediator Theodore W. Kheel reported some progress in negotiations extended beyond the Mar. 30 deadline for expiration of the old agreements.

Kheel, who heads a mediation panel appointed by Mayor John V. Lindsay, scheduled bargaining sessions between the publishers and Typographical Local 6 on the key issues of wages and hours.

He described the situation as "tense" despite progress in a number of contract areas and urged both sides to withhold further public comment on the status of the talks.

The printers are seeking a 20 percent wage increase, plus a reduction of the workweek and other improvements. The union rejected as "insufficient" the first wage offer by the publishers of 4 percent in each year of a three-year agreement.

Local 6 Pres. Bertram A. Powers has conducted a series of 15 chapel meetings since March 30 to discuss bargaining issues at the Daily News. The News building also houses the offices of the city Publishers' Association.

Powers said the meetings, held during all three shifts, were not intended "to interfere with an edition" and added: "We have chosen not to strike and we do not intend to be provoked into a strike by anything management may choose to do."

He charged that the Daily News had been "the greatest impediment" in the talks but is in the best position to give pay increases "that will match our needs."

Newspapers involved in the bargaining, besides the News, are the Times, the World Journal Tribune, the Long Island Daily Press and the Long Island Star-Journal.

The unions include, in addition to the printers, the ITU Mailers, Newspaper Guild, Stereotypers, Photo Engravers, Paper Handlers, Machinists, Printing Pressmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the unaffiliated Deliverers.

The unions are bargaining separately with the papers, but with the exception of the Pressmen are coordinating their efforts within the framework of the Newspaper Trades Council. All but the Guild and the Pressmen have taken votes authorizing a strike at one or more of the dailies.

Local Guild Executive Vice Pres. Thomas J. Murphy, chairman of the union council, predicted that if the News should lock out the printers, members of other unions would respect the picket lines as they have done in previous strikes.

The News charged that the ITU chapel meetings slowed production to the point that it was forced to cut 128 pages of advertising from its Sunday edition, Apr. 2.

Union officials are agreed that a complete shutdown of all of the city's dailies is unlikely. They note that both the Times and the News continued to publish during the strike against the World Journal Tribune last year and that the National Labor Relations Board has upheld the right of the unions to bargain with individual papers rather than the Publishers' Association. The Post is not a member of the publishers' group.

New Steel Local Wins 70 Cents Over 2 Years

Centralia, Wash. — Steelworkers Local 7112 won substantial benefits for new members in a first contract with Imperial Metals & Abrasives, Inc. Members, who voted unanimously for the USWA in a National Labor Relations Board election last Oct. 26, will get increases of 70 cents an hour over two years; a wage reopener next year; seven paid holidays; safety equipment, and other improvements.

Union negotiators included Joseph Mallon, Clyde Blair, William Westley and USWA Rep. Lee Caldwell of Portland, Ore.

Pressmen's Win Cracks L. A. Times Stronghold

Los Angeles—The Printing Pressmen have made the first breach in a venerable non-union stronghold by winning a collective bargaining election at the Los Angeles Times. The vote, as tabulated by the National Labor Relations Board, was 240 for the IPP&AU, 205 against.

The Times is the largest metropolitan newspaper in the United States or Canada to operate without a union contract. It has for years led all other dailies in lines of advertising sold.

Pressmen, apprentices and pressroom helpers on the Times are preparing contract proposals and union spokesmen said they expect to negotiate an acceptable first contract without undue delay.

The IPP&AU, which launched its successful campaign last November, gave credit for the victory to an in-plant organizing committee and a steering committee sponsored jointly by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO and the Los Angeles-Orange Counties AFL-CIO Organizing Committee.

Eight other unions supported the campaign—the Newspaper Guild, Typographers, Stereotypers, Lithographers & Photoengravers, Building Service Employes, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Operating Engineers and Machinists. The unions said they intend to continue their coordinated effort until all other Times departments have been organized.

Dir. William L. Gilbert of the area organizing committee reported that other unions are "making definite strides" at Times-Mirror Co. enterprises and eventually will be filing election petitions in their own jurisdictions.

The "total labor movement" made the drive its responsibility, Gilbert said. He added: "The opportunity offered the other unions to be of help was perhaps of more value to them than to the Pressmen. In any case, it was a great victory for all of us."

IPP&AU Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade said the campaign "demonstrated that unity of effort, intelligently directed and enthusiastically pursued, will accomplish results." DeAndrade noted that the victory was the second successful effort at a major holdout firm since a union action program was approved at a series of regional meetings last year. The first was among pressroom employes of the Curtis Publishing Co., he said.

PICKET LINE in front of American Broadcasting Co.'s Washington news center backs strike by Television & Radio Artists (AFTRA) against networks. It was also a chance for bypassers to meet well-known performers. Signing an autograph is Washington's Frank Harden, who stars in his own radio program as well as delivering the commercials on the AFL-CIO-sponsored Edward P. Morgan broadcast. Also on the line are members of the Retail Clerks.

Union Backing Swells For Network Strikers

the broadcasting industry pledged support for the strike at a meeting in New York.

A number of network engineers, technicians and craftsmen refused to cross picket lines and programs came mostly from the tape cans.

AFTRA members not directly affected by the strike and volunteers from other unions took turns on the picket lines. Shoe stores near the studios did a booming business as actresses and entertainers quickly found that comfortable walking shoes were better than stylish heels on a picket line.

Betty Furness, recently-named White House consumer adviser and a longtime AFTRA member, joined the picket line in New York.

"Of course the President knows I'm here," she told an inquiring newsman.

One of the few familiar faces still on television—except for the reruns — was Chet Huntley, one-half of NBC's Huntley-Brinkley show. His erstwhile partner, David Brinkley, observed the picket line and Huntley's assertion that news commentators should have their own little "professional" union drew scathing retorts from his colleagues.

Meany noted that Huntley "enjoyed the protection and benefits of AFTRA contracts" before rising to "prominence and affluence," and termed his actions "a despicable act of betrayal."

Negotiations in the contract dispute had been broken off as the AFL-CIO News went to press. AFTRA Exec. Sec. Donald F. Conaway said the networks' latest offer was inferior to the last management proposal before the strike.

AFTRA is seeking a $25-a-week hike for newsmen and announcers on network owned stations in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago, plus a larger share of the commercial talent fee that sponsors pay when station employes appear on a program.

There was one break in the ranks of management. The Mutual network, which is in the radio but not the television field, reached an agreement with AFTRA and union members returned to work.

Support for Strike Cabled by Morgan

Buenos Aires—Edward P. Morgan, ABC network newscaster sponsored by the AFL-CIO, in South America on a previously scheduled trip, cabled that if he had been in the U.S. when the AFTRA strike began he would have joined the picket line.

Morgan said he is "accepting no broadcasting assignments, radio or television, for the duration of the strike," and expressed his hopes for a "swift, fair settlement" of the dispute.

The AFL-CIO has withdrawn the Morgan program for the duration of the strike.

Textile Union Urges Probe of Southern Mills

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America, at a conference here, called for an investigation by Congress into violations by southern textile employers of the legal rights of their employes.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said an investigation is urgently needed of National Labor Relations Board findings that "thousands of employes in a wide geographic area" are being denied the protections of the National Labor Relations Act and collective bargaining. One recent finding, by an NLRB examiner, was directed against J. P. Stevens & Co., cited in three other cases for "flagrant" law violations.

Bond Issues Hit

Pollock also called for an end to abuses by state and local governments that issue tax-free bonds to finance construction of plants and lure industry away from other parts of the country.

The conference, with 200 delegates voting, endorsed Pollock's call for a congressional investigation, urged legislative changes to make the right of workers to organize "more than a hollow promise," and urged the government to find new ways to obtain employer compliance with the labor act.

The delegates voted support of a TWUA campaign to extend 1967 wage increases negotiated in union contracts to unorganized workers in the South. They urged that Congress extend to U.S. wool products and man-made fibers the same safeguards against excessive imports now provided to the domestic cotton textile industry.

J. Harold Daoust, TWUA's northern cotton-synthetics director, was conference chairman.

AFL-CIO Organizer James Smith Dies

Atlanta, Ga.—James L. Smith, AFL-CIO regional staff member since 1946, died at his home in Bastrop, Tex., Apr. 3 and was buried in nearby Sandy Spring after funeral services here. He was 56.

An Atlanta native, Smith helped organize the Atlantic Steel Co. plant for the Steelworkers and was a union officer when named to the AFL-CIO staff. He served in the Atlanta regional office for several years and then in the Fort Worth, Tex., region. He was on limited duty, due to ill health, at his death, His wife Mary, a daughter and three grandchildren survive.

Merger Talks Pressed By Two Paper Unions

Latham, N. Y.—Merger of the two largest unions in the pulp and paper industry came a step closer at a meeting here of the joint Unity Committee headed by Pres.-Sec. Joseph P. Tonelli of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers and Pres. Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers.

A joint news release of the two union presidents reported agreement on a number of matters and considerable progress toward organic unity. Pulp-Sulphite, with 180,000 members, and the UPP, with 140,000, both have contracts throughout the United States and Canada.

Emphasizing the need for merger, the officers pointed to continual amalgamations among pulp and paper companies now dominating the nation's fifth largest industry.

"Merger of our unions is mandated by the exceedingly large number of consolidations in the industry which obviously concentrates more and more power in fewer and fewer hands," the statement said.

A continuation of the merger talks under the direction of the two presidents is scheduled for June 1.

Members of the separate Unity Committees are: For the Pulp-Sulphite Workers: First Vice Pres. Louis H. Lorrain, Montreal; Treas. Henry Segal, Fort Edward, N. Y., and Fifth Vice Pres. Jesse W. Whiddon, Sr., Mobile, Ala. For the UPP: Executive Vice Pres. Harry D. Sayre and Sec.-Treas. Al E. Brown, both of Albany, and Vice Pres. John R. Strattan, Philadelphia.

A Labor Landmark

THE FARM WORKERS' victory at DiGiorgio will go down as one of the landmarks in the history of the American trade union movement—one of the classic struggles of exploited men and women for human dignity and simple justice.

In the long 18 months from the day the grape workers struck in the Delano area until the handing down of an arbitration award on a new contract, every known strike-breaking and union-busting device perfected in the past 100 years—and a few new ones—were employed to break the will and the determination of the strikers. They all failed.

They failed because the men and women who worked in the vineyards had determined that the time had come when they would no longer endure the exploitation of their labor, the indignities inflicted upon them, their treatment as second-class citizens.

The growers' harsh campaign to break the strike failed because the trade union movement rallied its full strength and support to the farm workers, guaranteeing to them in the most meaningful terms that they did not fight alone.

The strike-breaking failed because the farm workers' case for justice was so insistently clear that important parts of the community—especially church groups—rallied to their support and fought by their side.

A year of intense and bitter struggle finally brought the major grower, DiGiorgio, to the point of consenting to an election. Then the farm workers faced a new onslaught from a non-AFL-CIO union that had been sitting on the sidelines hoping to pick up the pieces. The AFL-CIO farm workers won, and the arduous task of framing a contract began. Now the terms have been settled in a tremendous triumph for these courageous men and women—a brilliant victory in a continuing struggle.

The grape workers have won more than a victory for themselves; they have made an immeasurable contribution to the entire nation, to all the poor and exploited workers everywhere. They have begun in reality to put an end to the blight on the nation's conscience—the "harvest of shame."

A 16-Year-Old Injustice

FOR THE PAST 16 YEARS the building and construction trades unions have been victimized by an interpretation of the law that denies them the same rights enjoyed by other unions in a labor dispute.

The denial of picketing rights in certain disputes has been aggravated by the foot-dragging approach in Congress despite the support for remedial legislation by four Presidents—Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson.

This year the issue of situs picketing at construction projects is again before Congress. The bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) is the product of a lengthy history of growing consensus among members of both parties that the inequity against the building trades must be corrected by legislation clearly stating the unions' rights.

The hearings conducted last week should be followed by speedy committee approval of the measure and quick House action. The long-standing injustice inflicted on the building trades must be rectified this year. Sixteen years is an unconscionable period of time to deny workers basic rights to which they are clearly entitled.

New Anti-Union Group Proves Close-Mouthed, Mysterious

By Harry Conn

IN FEBRUARY each of 50 state governors received a communication with a letterhead reading, "National Freedom of Employment Committee."

It urged that the governor propose a "Freedom of Employment" amendment to the U.S. Constitution to his state legislature. The suggested amendment, such as the so-called "right to work," would wipe out union shops and union security generally.

The address on the letterhead was an older downtown office building in Washington. On the door, in addition to the National Freedom of Employment Committee, was another organization, Civic Association of America.

In one corner, next to a secretary, was a man fooling with a tape recorder. The man, Clifford Story, listened while the reporter explained that he was there for an article for the labor press on the committee's activities.

Story stared at the reporter for some time and then exclaimed: "You've got some guts coming up here!"

He declined to give any information or answer any questions.

"Something will break in April," he said. Later he changed the time to June. Story did admit that the committee was new, that it was a "division" of the Civic Association of America which "is 36 years old."

"Do you have any information on the association?" he was asked.

"No," Story said.

"Tell us something about Samuel M. Cavnar, your national chairman."

"I can't tell you anything," Story said. Then he added: "Here's some news for you. He's running for the city council of Los Angeles."

Further investigation showed that the Civic Association of America had, indeed, a past.

During the years of the New Deal it was fighting the socially progressive program of Franklin Roosevelt. It was opposed to such things as the progressive income tax and OPA.

In 1947 the association published a little newspaper called "United Business Facts." In one issue it took off on the cooperative movement.

The group was active during the 1960 presidential campaign and published some John Birch-type material.

In 1963, it inaugurated one of its most revealing operations when it set up its Employe Enrollment Division. Its plan: organize some of the 50 million unorganized workers in the country.

THE LITERATURE was directed not to workers but to employers with this suggestion on how to "expedite the program."

"1. Have your secretary or personnel officer prepare a complete list of the non-union employes you want to enroll. . . .

"2. Send this list and $2 for each person to be enrolled . . . if fees are paid quarterly . . . (includes $1 quarterly dues, plus $1 initial enrollment fee) or, $4 each, if paying for a full year, plus your $15 annual business enrollment fee to . . . Civic Association of America."

Cavnar and his association are great believers in amending the U.S. Constitution through the states.

They want to do it with the freedom of employment amendment, through a repeal of the income tax amendment, through an amendment to overrule the Supreme Court decision on prayers in public schools.

Some question was raised as to whether the Freedom of Employment Committee is tied up in any way with the Freedom to Work Committee, Inc. In 1965 this group, claiming tax exemption, had its anti-labor literature given out by Republican women. Reed Larson, head of the National Right to Work Committee, filed complaints against the group. It was moving in on his territory.

Story was emphatic: "We have nothing to do with the National Right to Work Committee," he declared.

The Freedom to Work Committee, Inc., disappeared but its literature looks similar to the new Freedom of Employment Committee. Both groups specialize in "surveys," too. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Boorish Bad Manners Reflect Lost Small, Vital Human Values

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST. The program will be resumed after the current network strike is settled.)

NEW YORK—It is just possible, so it seems to me, that Americans are causing more damage—to themselves and to the world—by an arrogance of boorish bad manners than—if Senator Fulbright will pardon the expression—by an arrogance of power.

Morgan

It would be frivolous to argue that the latter indubitably creates the former, though there probably is some causal connection. I think the connection is more indirect and therefore more insidious. The solution, I suspect—if there is one—is not to put the Emily Posts and the Amy Vanderbilts in charge of the State Dept. and the Pentagon, fascinating as the results might be, but to examine the flaws and deficiencies in the training and the resultant value judgments of the citizen in the American society.

We must begin with the assumption that the American is human, like everybody else. What sets us apart now is the fact that we occupy the Room at the Top. As a nation and as a people we are richer and more powerful than anybody else. Our mighty and opulent position incites envy, jealousy, suspicion, fear, downright hatred and—tragically but not surprisingly—very little respect. The lack of the latter, I am sure, stems from the belief of thoughtful and sorrowingly hostile foreigners—that we are a nation of hypocrites.

Because we live in a magnifying-glass house, they see every move we make, every mood we assume enlarged on a panavision screen. When we project policies in support of the open society, they think we are throwing rocks to destroy anything and everything that we can't readily fit into our own measures. Many of them believe—and I am afraid they are too often right—that they understand and act upon the dynamic inspiration of the American revolution, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and the Bill of Rights better than we do.

But I want to reduce this problem, as I started out to do, into terms of personal behavior, beyond, though strangely not totally separated from, the broad sweep of official policy. What we Americans lack, I fear, in a society that has everything is, more than anything else, the virtue of grace.

The other day, a certain lovely lady I know in Washington treated her two teen-aged daughters to a matinee of the movie "Dr. Zhivago." After they took their seats, they discovered, too late, they were trapped in an enclave of juveniles utterly delinquent in their manners. Seeing the film was the last of their interests. They chatted in loud voices, slurped cokes, shucked candy wrappers, chomped popcorn with the delicacy of cement mixers and unhesitatingly tramped other customers as they charged repeatedly out of their seats for reinforcements or a cigaret break.

Help finally came from a man in the next row who summoned an usher who threatened to throw all the miscreants, male and female, out. A tense, uneasy peace descended but what would have been a rewarding experience in seeing the Boris Pasternak classic translated to the screen was all but ruined.

THE APPALLING thing was that nobody cared. These rather expensively if sloppily dressed, middle class youngsters, presumably wanted neither by the FBI nor the truant officer, had not deliberately set out to spoil somebody else's afternoon. They were just doing what seems to come naturally these days: boorishness, bumptiousness, loud-mouthed lack of consideration for everybody not tuned in on their wavelengths.

This gracelessness is not a phenomenon exclusively peculiar to adolescence—unless you quibblingly want to make the point that adults who behave the same are not grown up either.

In any case, consider this evidence, which I wish were not available in such abundance. Charles Aznavour, the French ballad singer who is an international hit at the moment, is now making a personal-appearance tour in the United States. He was a sellout in Washington but his final night was reduced to musical rubble by a contingent of car dealers who made such a racket at their tables, despite angry shouts of "quiet" from Aznavour fans, that the artist was barely able to finish his program.

Somewhere in the process of producing material achievements, little but vital human values have been lost. Power is difficult to hold and to handle under any circumstances. In the possession of a people whose national syndrome shows some signs of reflecting the callous deportment of a careless, well-dressed dude, it may give the world anxious pause.

Growing Support Seen for Ban On Tax-Free Industrial Bonds

ORGANIZED LABOR'S CALL for a ban on the use of state and local tax-free bonds to finance private industrial plants was renewed in a recent network radio interview.

Assistant Dir. Frank Fernbach of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research charged that the "use of public tax money . . . to build a plant for private purposes" is "improper." He made the statements on Labor News Conference, public affairs interview broadcast each Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network. (The American Federation of Radio & Television Artists ended its strike against Mutual on Mar. 31.)

Fernbach said tax-free bonding was authorized to help state and local governments build and expand public facilities, but a growing number of communities are using the authority to build industrial plants and entice firms from other areas. Unless checked, the practice now permitted in 30 states threatens to spread to all 50, he warned.

Last year alone, he noted, tax-free industrial bonding was an "opportunity for more than 125 American companies to get cheap factory financing at the expense of the American taxpayer." Half a billion dollars worth of the bonds was issued last year, and within two years that figure will double, he predicted.

Fernbach said that "tremendous profiteering" results from the practice, pointing out that in addition to property tax and other concessions granted the companies, they often buy the very bonds issued to build their plants and collect the tax-free interest while writing-off the rent for the site as "a cost of business operations."

SUPPORT for changing the law is growing, he said. He noted that several bills to accomplish this are before Congress, and such Administration officials as the secretary of the treasury and the President's Council of Economic Advisers have spoken out against tax-free industrial bonding.

In addition, Fernbach said, the Investment Bankers Association, which represents "people who are in the business of selling tax-free state and local bonds," is actively campaigning to end the practice. They feel this is their "Achilles' heel," he said, "so socially, economically and morally unjustified that it might set in motion a clamor in Congress and around the country to end tax-free bonding for any purpose."

Reporters questioning Fernbach were Benjamin A. Franklin of the New York Times and Murray Seeger of Newsweek.

BUSINESS in the United States has never liked the National Labor Relations Act and it has always watched decisions by the NLRB with a wary eye.

This is understandable. Twice as many complaints are made each year against business as against organized labor and board decisions correspondingly have penned the "unfair" label a great deal more often on management rather than on unions. The result is that business and industry have long tried to get out from under the scrutiny of a system that Congress set up to balance the scales between workers and their employers.

This has taken the form of a desire for legislation that would abolish the NLRB. The drive tapered off during the years of the Eisenhower board when decisions were apt to go against labor. It has flared up in recent years as the Board's membership became more liberal than the Eisenhower appointees.

Latest effort to abolish the board has now come with the introduction of a bill to do just that. It is sponsored by a group of senators mostly known for their conservatism and their frequently anti-labor positions. To name them is to give the tone of what they want. They are:

Sen. Robert P. Griffin, Michigan Republican, who is noted for his half of the Landrum-Griffin Act; Sen. Carl T. Curtis, Nebraska Republican, who has a long anti-labor record; Sen. Peter H. Dominick, Colorado Republican, a long-time conservative; Sen. Paul J. Fannin, Arizona Republican, Goldwater-style conservative; Sen. Strom Thurmond, South Carolina Republican who switched to the Republicans because of his opposition to the Democratic stand on civil rights; Sen. Frank Lausche, the Ohio Democrat who votes conservative most of the time, and newcomer to the Senate, Sen. Charles Percy, Illinois Republican who defeated Paul Douglas.

PERCY, in a special explanation for his support of the bill, said that the legislation had the support of labor and management, but the only labor backing he cited was that of the leaders of three small unaffiliated unions.

What the legislation would do is to throw the settlement of labor-management disputes into the courts which are generally more conservative in labor matters than the NLRB which has developed over the years a great deal of sophistication in the realities of labor-management relations.

The bill would set up a U.S. Labor Court of 15 judges with 20-year terms. The present NLRB general counsel would be replaced by an administrator, empowered to issue complaints. Ninety commissioners, who would have to be lawyers, would be appointed by the court to replace the trial examiners who now serve the NLRB.

The bill has been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee which is headed by Sen. James O. Eastland, Mississippi Democrat. It may get favorable consideration there, largely because of the highly conservative membership of the Committee.

LABOR OPPONENTS of the legislation charge that the shift to a court setup is being asked largely because its proponents think the courts will give management a better break than the NLRB. They fear that the proposed change would weaken the position of unions, would throw the burden of waging suits against management on to workers and their unions and in general would reverse the whole spirit of the National Labor Relations Act.

Only recently the NLRB observed an important event in its history—the casting of the 25-millionth vote in a representation election. The vote turned out to be that of a worker in a plant being organized by the Steelworkers. The Steelworkers won the election and the victory, and the observance of the historic moment probably didn't sit too well with the country's anti-labor forces.

STATE AND LOCAL tax-free bonds to build private industrial plants result in "tremendous profiteering" and should be banned, AFL-CIO Assistant Dir. of Research Frank Fernbach (center) declared on Labor News Conference. Reporters Murray Seeger (left) of Newsweek and Benjamin A. Franklin of the New York Times questioned him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview heard weekly on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

TESTS USED by employers for promotion and hiring were scrutinized by full-time union representatives and staff experts at the weeklong AFL-CIO Institute on Testing at the University of Iowa. In top photo, the "union team" at a mock arbitration session plans its case. Bottom photo shows a group from the Communications Workers discussing a sample test with institute instructors.

Iowa Institute Focuses On Personnel Testing

A group of veteran union representatives spent a week at the University of Iowa studying one of the most technical and controversial areas of labor-management relations—the validity of tests used by employers to determine who shall be promoted or hired.

The first AFL-CIO Institute on Testing brought together 25 full time representatives or staff members from 12 unions and a special faculty drawn from universities, the labor movement and government.

Emphasis of the institute was on the practical problems the union representatives face in dealing with test procedures in collective bargaining, grievances and arbitration. The purpose, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis told the concluding session, is to enable unions to do an even better job of representing workers.

The institute was sponsored by the research and education departments of the AFL-CIO and the University of Iowa's Center for Labor & Management. The program was coordinated by Bertram Gottlieb, who is on leave as AFL-CIO industrial engineer while serving as visiting professor at the university.

Gottlieb said the institute was arranged because of the big growth in industry use of aptitude and personality tests. Thousands of workers are denied employment or refused promotion because they are unable to "pass" tests, many of which are of unproved validity. In many cases, he said, established seniority systems have been threatened by introduction of tests.

At the opening session, Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley Ruttenberg told the group that "too often tests are used to weed applicants out of jobs rather than to place them in jobs."

Areas explored at the institute included the development and validity of various types of tests, the union's right to bargain over their use, and the employers' obligation to furnish unions with full information about them.

There was extensive discussion of arbitration decisions involving the use of tests and the strengths and weaknesses of the arguments used by both sides.

A highlight of the institute was the presentation to Arbitrator Harold Davey of a mock arbitration case by "union" and "management" teams composed of institute participants. The arbitration case was used to enable the union representatives to put to practical use material presented during the institute.

Other members of the institute faculty were George Hagglund of the University of Wisconsin, El-Dean Kohrs, director of the Passaic, N.J., Children's Bureau, John Metzler of the Newark College of Engineering, and Duane Thompson, University of Iowa.

Labor Forum Has Debut on Arkansas TV

A weekly television series has been initiated by the Arkansas State AFL-CIO in conjunction with Station KARK, Channel 4, Little Rock, as a public service forum for national and local issues.

State AFL-CIO Pres. J. Bill Becker is the permanent moderator of "Labor's Language," which made its debut Mar. 26.

Becker says the series will feature labor representatives, public officials and civic and business leaders. Among programs already planned are discussions of social security amendments, minimum wage laws, and "right-to-work", as well as state house and pocketbook issues.

The program is telecast at 1 p.m. on Sundays and a simulcast is heard on KARK radio at 9 p.m., Sunday.

Guest on the inaugural show was Colorado Labor Council Pres. Herrick S. Roth, who is moderator in Denver for a television show having the same title, and who participated in discussions with the NBC-affiliated station to bring about the series.

Madison, Wis.—The 1967 Directory of Labor Education, listing university and trade union personnel participating in labor education is now available upon request to Workers Education Local 189, Room 825, 432 North Lake Street, Madison, Wis. 53706.

Cooks' Local Helps Train Needy Youths

Toledo, O.—Thirty youths with backgrounds of disadvantage will be given on-the-job training designed to qualify them to become apprentice cooks. The 30-week program will be conducted by Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 868.

The Labor Dept., under the Manpower Development & Training Act, has allocated $40,049 for the project, of which $20,095 was earmarked for on-the-job training costs, $11,150 for allowances to the trainees and $8,804 to the Penta County Vocational School, Perrysburg, O.

The trainees will receive 10 weeks of instruction at the Penta County school before starting the actual on-the-job training. They will be recruited through local State Employment Service offices from among youths with histories of no jobs or of chronic unemployment. Special efforts will be made to enroll "graduates" of Neighborhood Youth Corps programs.

Training allowances averaging $545 will be paid an estimated 20 youth who will need financial assistance prior to the classroom phase of the program, with earnings during the total training period expected to reach $34,800.

From 10 to 15 hotels and restaurants will sponsor 20 weeks of on-the-job training for which they will be paid an average of $420 per trainee. The trainees will start their formal apprenticeships at $2.75 an hour, with increases up to nearly $4 upon completion of the program.

Sec.-Treas. Dale Stormer of Local 868 will direct the program for the union.

Consumer Forces Face Uphill Fight

Consumers and their organizations are still fighting an uphill battle for legislation to protect them in the marketplace.

Sidney Margolius, whose column on consumer problems runs in the AFL-CIO News and many other labor newspapers, acknowledges progress made in recent years to protect buyers against safety hazards and worthless products. But he points out that the major legislation sought by labor and consumer groups has been blocked or watered down by fierce business opposition.

Margolius discusses this "business backlash" in an article in the April issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO magazine.

He quotes attacks which have branded consumer bills as "a deep, radical and dangerous trend" leading to "a controlled economy with a controlled society."

Some of the "hysterical" opposition "would be ludicrous if it had not proved so successful," Margolius comments. He adds:

"Business opposition proved successful in diluting the truth-in-packaging law; in blocking truth-in-credit legislation and in watering down efforts to remedy obsolete state credit laws which give high-pressure sellers the actual tools for deceiving and exploiting working families."

On the plus side, Margolius cites "a new vigor" in the two federal agencies most concerned with consumer protection — the Food & Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission.

The FDA, he notes, has ordered a number of ineffective products off the market and has issued stern warnings against misleading drug advertising, whether the ads are directed to doctors or the public.

New tire advertising guidelines by the FTC will "end some of the long-standing deceptive advertising in that field," Margolius notes. And the agency has proposed regulations governing advertising of credit which include some of the criteria in the truth-in-lending bill.

Another "major advance," he writes, "is that state, county and municipal officials have been stirred into seeking to provide more adequate consumer protection, both through legislation and through establishment of state and local consumer counsels and consumer protection bureaus."

There have been some "setbacks" in this area also, Margolius observes. In California, Gov. Ronald Reagan fired the state's highly regarded consumer counsel when he took office, chopped the office's budget, and named the wife of a real estate man to the job with instructions to investigate whether the agency should be continued.

Margolius discusses the pending federal legislation and also stresses the need for changes in present state laws governing installment selling.

Most of these state laws, he observes, were designed to protect the seller, not the buyer.

In most states, a seller can repossess goods sold on the installment plan if a payment is missed and still compel the buyer to keep on paying—garnishing his pay if necessary.

Very often, the mere threat of a garnishment is enough to compel a worker to pay for a deceptively-sold product because he fears the loss of his job. In a number of states, unions have sought—with little success—legislation to prevent employers from firing workers whose pay is garnisheed.

The article cites the growth in organized consumer activity in recent years, culminating last year in a national Consumer Assembly in Washington, D.C. It was sponsored by 32 organizations, including the AFL-CIO, representing a total membership of 50 million Americans.

One reason for this growth, Margolius suggests, is "the noticeably greater consciousness of many citizens that they are consumers as well as wage-earners and need to defend themselves on both flanks."

next two years. The 7.2 percent comparability lag is based on statistics already a year old—a point unions of federal workers have stressed in urging a higher raise.

The proposed increases would apply to some 2 million postal and classified employes. Hourly-paid wage board workers have their pay adjusted on the basis of prevailing wage scales in the areas where they work.

In the same message, the President asked Congress to increase postal rates for all classes of mail to provide funds for "modernizing and mechanizing the postal service" and to eliminate a current operating deficit.

He recommended a 1-cent hike in first class, airmail and postal card rates and staggered increases totaling 21 to 28 percent for other classes of mail.

AFL-CIO unions representing postal and other federal employes have urged substantially higher pay raises and job upgradings. The federation's Executive Council at its recent meeting called for "immediate and complete comparability" for government workers.

Johnson stressed that "a pay raise for the government's employes clearly is needed" to "keep faith with our employes."

Comparability must be achieved, he said, to "avoid placing the government at a serious disadvantage in recruiting and retaining competent workers."

The President proposed establishment of a special commission representing the executive, legislative and judicial branches of government to undertake an intensive study of all federal pay systems and report within two years.

Higher salaries for top government officials, congressmen and judges are considered a prerequisite to raising pay of top-bracket career civil servants. The President's 4.5 percent pay proposal does not extend to the top "supergrade" ranks, which would be given only nominal increases.

The proposed military pay raise would give all grades a 5.6 percent raise in basic pay, but smaller increases in quarters and subsistence allowances would bring the average down to 4.5 percent.

The President proposed an Oct. 1, 1967 starting date for the civilian and military pay raises.

Labor, Administration Back Bill:

Building Trades Seek Right To Picket Common Job Site

has "the full and complete support of the AFL-CIO."

He urged its passage to end "a long standing injustice that discriminates against building trades workers." The prohibited picketing, he noted, "would be perfectly lawful if performed by workers engaged in labor disputes involving manufacturing establishments."

The rail labor statement, on behalf of 23 affiliated unions, put its support for the building trades on the basis of "one of the oldest and greatest traditions of the American labor movement—that an injury to one is an injury to all." It added:

'Simple Equity'

"We in railway labor ask your favorable consideration of this bill not for any selfish reason but as a matter of simple equity to a large segment of America's working people."

Walter P. Reuther, speaking as president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the subcommittee:

"There can be no justification for depriving building and construction tradesmen of the same rights enjoyed by workers in virtually all the rest of the nation's industries. This injustice cries out for speedy correction."

Failure to pass corrective legislation, Reuther warned, would be "a grave injury to our democratic system."

Metal Trades Dept. Pres. B. A. Gritta urged "prompt and favorable action" by the House Labor Committee "to rectify the grievous injustice which has existed for years against building trades workers and their unions."

Paul Hall, president of the Maritime Trades Dept., expressed the unanimous support of unions representing more than 5 million workers.

The department also was host to perhaps the most dramatic demonstration of union solidarity on the site picketing bill.

The regularly scheduled Maritimes Trades luncheon on Apr. 5 was transformed into a rally for the legislation and gave prolonged, standing ovations to Thompson and Haggerty, the two speakers.

Standing in front of a banner declaring the department's support for his bill, Thompson predicted: "'We're going to pass it this year."

The department's executive secretary-treasurer, Peter M. McGavin, told the overflow gathering of union, industry and government officials: "We are for the situs picketing bill as much as we are for an independent maritime agency."

Haggerty was obviously moved by what he described as "a solid phalanx of trade unionists" supporting the building tradesmen in their fight.

He spoke of the frustrating occasions in past years when—on one pretext or another—the measure was kept from reaching the floor even though "we had enough votes in the House and Senate to pass the bill."

It's going to be a "tough, tight fight," Haggerty said. We need the legislation, he stressed, "so that we can go back to acting as trade unionists in the construction industry."

At the formal House hearings, Haggerty and Louis Sherman, counsel for the Building & Construction Trades Dept., stressed the distinction between a secondary boycott which harms an unconcerned third party to a labor dispute and action which only affects a single construction project even though several subcontractors may be working on the job.

The case that reached the Supreme Court involved a Denver contractor who brought in non-union electricians whom he paid 42.5 cents an hour below the union scale.

The union spokesmen affirmed strongly that workers in the construction industry have a right to act together to protect hard-won standards.

While some opponents of the bill are opposing any legislation, others are pushing a substitute bill introduced by Rep. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.) which is supported by the catchall District 50 of the unaffiliated Mine Workers. It would bar picketing when another union has bargaining rights for employes of a subcontractor.

Haggerty and Sherman said unions should be free to protest wage-cutting which threatens area standards but stressed that the situs picketing bill would not legalize actions which are barred by other sections of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Wirtz made the same point in his testimony, declaring that the Administration-supported bill—H.R. 100—"will not legalize otherwise unlawful recognition or organizational picketing."

The legislation, he said, is "a simple bill with a laudable purpose—and a long history of bipartisan support.

"That purpose is to restore to unions in the building and construction industry the right to engage in peaceful activity at a common construction site to protest substandard conditions maintained by any one of the construction contractors working at the very same site."

He noted that both Democratic and Republican administrations have recognized the need for such action and legislation has been endorsed by Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson.

Employer groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, opposed the legislation and declared unions already have too much power. The CofC spokesman said Congress should be considering tougher labor laws instead of lessening restrictions in present laws.

CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS on legislation to restore the right to picket construction sites opened before a House Labor subcommittee. Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. (left) discusses the Administration-backed bill with Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Labor Backs Expanded Mental Health Centers

The AFL-CIO has called on Congress to continue and expand the Community Mental Health Centers Act, pointing out that this will enable unions to negotiate programs wherever centers exist to provide services.

"Mental health is, indeed, America's number one health problem," Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, told a House Subcommittee on Public Health & Welfare.

"One out of every 12 Americans is now being hospitalized for mental illness at some time during his life," Seidman observed, adding:

"By providing early diagnosis and early treatment on an outpatient basis through the Community Mental Health Centers, this frightful toll can be substantially reduced.

"About one-half of the hospital beds in this country are used in treatment of the mentally ill. Through early diagnosis and treatment, many people who would otherwise require hospitalization can be kept on their feet, on their jobs and in their families and in their communities."

Seidman declared labor's support for amendments sponsored by Rep. Harley Staggers (D-W.Va.) which would continue federal aid for the construction and staffing of community centers and allow acquisition of existing buildings.

As of March 1967, grants of $66 million had been made to some 160 mental health centers in 46 areas to serve a population of 27 million.

Seidman urged an increase in the proposed fiscal 1968 authorizations of $50 million for facilities and $30 million for staffing.

Labor has a direct interest in expanding out-patient mental health care, he stressed. Until the federal program was enacted in 1963, he said, mentally ill workers rarely received any kind of treatment, good or bad. The mentally ill wound up in institutions and received custodial care rather than active therapy, he added.

Seidman said union-negotiated mental health programs have demonstrated the potential of out-patient care.

He cited the Retail Clerks' program in Los Angeles, where psychiatric care is offered at several centers open day and night. The program is financed by a 2 cents an hour employer contribution to the health and welfare fund and a $2 per visit fee.

The "great promise" of the Community Mental Health Centers Act, he concluded, is that it would enable unions to negotiate similar programs wherever a center can provide services.

400 Handbag Strikers Win Newburgh Pattern

Newburgh, N.Y.—A 51-day strike of 400 Regal Handbag Co. employes won an agreement unanimously ratified by members of Local 29, Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers.

Intl. Pres. Norman Zukowsky credited the settlement to the solidarity of the strikers, support by the labor movement, and the sustained interest of community leaders. The contract follows the pattern of an earlier agreement with Dubette, Inc., another handbag complex here.

It was the refusal of Regal management to conform to the pattern that prolonged the strike five weeks after Local 29 reached agreement with Dubette, Zukowsky said. While strikers' ranks held firm, the community rallied to their support. Their union provided a commissary, set up an emergency fund and paid strike benefits of $35 weekly.

Zukowsky said community leaders offered their mediatory services when plant management threatened to move out of town. Led by Mayor Joseph X. Mullin, they brought union and management together for round-the-clock negotiating sessions.

Terms of the one-year contract include an across-the-board wage increase of 10 cents an hour, upward adjustment of the minimum wage schedule; machinery for reviewing the incentive program for workers paid on a piece-rate basis, an immediate 5 percent increase for piece workers, and other improvements.

The settlement formula also was made applicable to the firm's four contract shops — Bonnie Handbag Co., Poppy Handbag, Newburgh Handbag and Helene Handbag Co. Inc.

In addition to the mayor, members of the citizens' committee included councilmen, the school superintendent, other educators, clergymen and businessmen, the union said.

Bill Backed to Regulate Mail Order Land Sales

Federal legislation to prevent fraud and deception in mail order sales of home sites has the strong support of the AFL-CIO.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the federation's Housing Committee, said legislation is needed to protect "small investors, including elderly persons, from being bilked by promoters into buying lots that are actually located in deserts, swamps, or other remote areas."

Buyers have found too late, Shishkin told a Senate Banking subcommittee, that home sites they bought "are not accessible by road, or lack water or other essentials for living."

He endorsed a bill sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), that would require promoters of subdivisions of 25 or more lots who plan to market them by mail to register with the Securities & Exchange Commission. Full and clear description of the land and plans for its development would be required in a sales prospectus, similar to the information required by law for sale of stocks.

Shishkin noted that mail fraud convictions have been obtained against some promoters. But putting the promoter behind bars, he stressed, is no help to the victimized purchaser who has lost his money.

"Timely prevention is better than belated remedy," he said. The merit of the Williams bill is that "it is designed to prevent frauds."

The legislation would also give purchasers the right to sue if they are sold land on the basis of deceptive claims.

Shishkin urged "early action" to enact the bill "in the present session of Congress."

U.S. Judge Upholds Hotel Local Vote

New York — Judge Inzer B. Wyatt of U.S. District Court here has rejected a Labor Dept. petition that he set aside an election of officers of Hotel, Motel & Club Employes Local 6 and order a new vote.

The election was held in May 1965. The suit was based on allegations by a dissident group within the union that eligibility requirements for running for paid union office were illegally restrictive.

The ruling held that the eligibility rules, while "technically" too restrictive, had no effect on the outcome of the balloting.

"So far as appears from this record," he added, "the voting was fairly and honestly conducted and the votes were accurately counted."

David Sullivan Designated for Papal Honors

Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, has been named by Pope Paul VI a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great. It is the first time a union official has been so honored by the Catholic Church.

The formal investiture, to be administered by Francis Cardinal Spellman, will be followed with a testimonial dinner honoring Sullivan, Apr. 29, at the Hotel Commodore in New York. Serving as honorary co-chairmen of the affair are Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Proceeds of the dinner program will go to Fu-Jen Catholic University Foundation in Taiwan, an institution which accepts students of all faiths. The university was founded at the suggestion of the late Pope John XXIII, predecessor of Pope Paul.

The Order of St. Gregory the Great was established in 1831 by Pope Gregory XVI to honor subjects of the Papal States. The honor is now conferred upon Roman Catholics in all countries for distinguished services to church or state.

Senate Showdown Nears:

Labor Backs Fight For Election Fund

The principle of federal financing of presidential election campaigns was at stake as the Senate moved toward a showdown vote on the issue after its Easter recess.

Supporters of federal financing—including the AFL-CIO and the Administration—have urged improvements in the ground-breaking legislation passed last year. The new law would allow taxpayers to earmark a dollar of their federal income tax returns for a bipartisan campaign fund.

Opponents have called for outright repeal of the law and Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) introduced a repealer as an amendment to an unrelated bill restoring the 7 percent tax credit for industry investment in new equipment.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said labor "strongly" supports "the principle of public financing of campaigns for public office as the surest way of freeing candidates from improper influence because of interest group contributions to their campaigns."

He wrote Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long, who sponsored the original campaign financing legislation, that the law should be "retained and improved," not scrapped "in the dim hope that, somehow, another and more perfect measure can be created."

Long has said that he has several perfecting amendments of his own and has promised early hearings on the legislation.

Biemiller said Long's proposed amendment to restrict presidential campaigns to either public or private financing, but not both, was an "excellent suggestion." He added that other proposals which should be considered "include application of the principle to other campaigns than that for the presidency, and the issue of a small tax credit for campaign contributions."

He stressed that "perfecting existing legislation is a far surer route to travel toward resolving problems than throwing out everything and starting all over."

The Senate division on the issue was considered extremely close and a vote was put off until absent senators could return to Washington.

On the House side of the Capitol, the chief activity was in committees.

The Education & Labor Committee approved an elementary education bill, including a two-year expansion of the National Teacher Corps, which sends teams of specially-trained teachers to poverty areas that request them.

The program is high on the President's priority list but has run into heavy opposition in Congress and its funds last year were cut far below the budget request.

In a jurisdictional compromise over handling the legislation, the committee assigned the teacher training provision of the Teacher Corps legislation to a subcommittee dealing with a separate higher education bill. It also trimmed back the Administration's request for a three-year extension to two years.

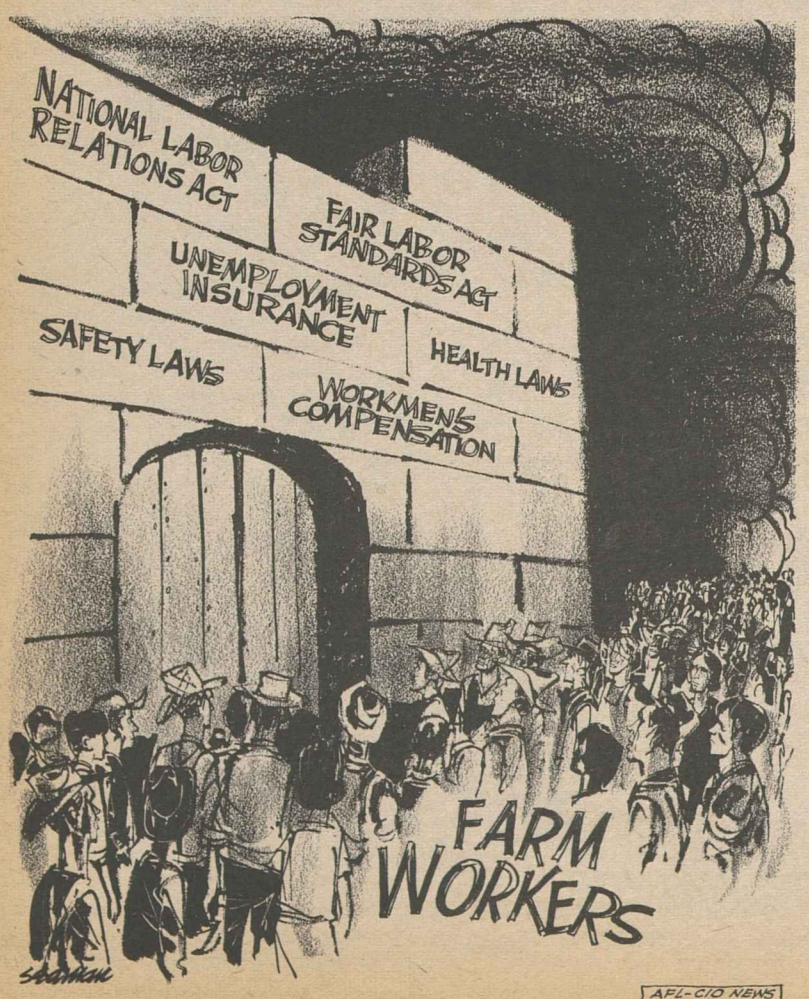
The committee approved spending authority for new programs of aid in the education of handicapped children and educational planning grants for states.

A floor battle is likely in the House, however, over the committee's action in postponing a change in the formula for allocating funds to school districts serving poverty areas. The committee majority took the position that unless federal aid were increased above the Administration's budget request, any changes involving a reshuffling of the present level of spending should be deferred in order to avoid cutting back present levels of aid in some areas.

The new allocation formula would have given more money to states that spend less per-pupil on education than the national average. It would also have raised the poverty income level from $2,000 to $3,000.

The committee majority said in effect that the changes, scheduled to take effect automatically under existing law, should be postponed until appropriations reach the level authorized by Congress. The Administration this year is seeking only half the amount previously authorized by Congress, although it was more than actually appropriated last year.

Outside the Law



FREEDOM HOUSE officers and trustees gave their Freedom Award of 1967 to Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for "outstanding contributions to the cause of human liberty." Secretary of State Dean Rusk (right) presented the award to Wilkins as AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph (left) watched. Pres. Johnson sent a message hailing Wilkins as a true leader "of all time" and Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey praised him as a "sound liberal" in a film shown to 1,200 guests at the New York dinner.

Protection of NLRB Urged in Agriculture

age for all agricultural workers." The subcommittee said consideration should be given to federal financing and administration of such a program "because of the predominantly interstate character of this problem and the high mobility of the farm labor force."

- Full financing of programs authorized by Congress dealing with schooling of migrant children and health care for migrant families, among others.

The subcommittee noted the big gap between the amounts authorized for these programs and the amounts actually appropriated by Congress. Last year, for example, Congress authorized more than $40 million in grants to improve the education of migrant children, but appropriated only slightly over $7 million. Likewise appropriations under the Migrant Health Act have totaled only $9.25 million during the first four years, as against $16 million authorized to be spent.

Collective bargaining, the subcommittee stressed, "has brought dignity to the working men and women of the United States enabling them to deal with their employers as equals. . . . The benefits of the collective bargaining rights and procedures of the National Labor Relations Act should be extended to our citizens in agriculture."

Backing the call for NLRB coverage were the four Democratic members of the subcommittee—Williams and Senators Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Gaylord Nelson (Wis.) and Robert F. Kennedy (N.Y.).

The two Republican senators—George Murphy (Calif.) and Paul J. Fannin (Ariz.)—said they subscribe to "the principle of collective bargaining for agricultural workers" but that the subcommittee should not "recommend a blanket extension of the National Labor Relations Act to agriculture."

Hotel Union Wins Arizona Election

Phoenix, Ariz.—Employes of the Arizona Biltmore, a resort hotel here, voted for Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 631 in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was 41 for the union, one opposed, with nine ballots challenged.

The election was held in the NLRB office because of the refusal of hotel management to agree to hold it in the hotel, a board official said. It was the first time in more than 10 years that an Arizona employer has made such a refusal, he told the Arizona Republic.

The Communications Workers were certified recently to represent 30 grounds employes of the hotel. gaining" as "the heart and soul of American labor relations." But they insisted that there are great differences between agriculture and the rest of the economy and said the "complexities" of the problem require more study and not a "headlong rush" to legislation.

Retired Rail Leader Jonas McBride Dies

Jonas A. McBride, retired vice president of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, died quietly while greeting old friends at the annual award reception of his union in a Washington hotel. He was 82.

McBride was a New York Central engineman from 1901 to retirement in 1953 and a BLF&E member since 1903. He was elected a union vice president in 1922 and as national legislative representative in 1940. He had attended every safety award dinner since the first one, in 1958, the union said.

COPE Adds 3 New Areas In Expansion

Three area directors have been added to the staff of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, expanding the number of COPE areas to 12 from the previous nine.

Frank McGrath has been named director of the new Area 10, comprising New York and New Jersey. Now stationed in Harrisburg, Pa., McGrath will move his headquarters to the new area May 1. He has been on the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO COPE staff for two years and previously was vice president of the Central Westmoreland AFL-CIO at Greensburg, Pa., and an official of Meat Cutters Local 590.

New Area 11 comprises Michigan and Ohio, with Jack Lowry as area director. Lowry formerly was president of Rubber Workers Local 125, Pontiac, Mich., and for six years has been on the URW staff. His home is at Union Lake, Mich.

Director of new Area 12—Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin—is Richard Fallow of Davenport, Ia., formerly business manager of Machinists Lodge 102 in the Quad Cities area of Illinois and Iowa, and legislative director of the Iowa Council of Machinists.

Both the latter appointments are effective immediately, COPE Dir. Alexander E. Barkan said.

The expansion removes the seven states involved from three existing COPE areas, leaving their make up as follows:

Area 1—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island.

Area 2 — comprising Pennsylvania, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Maryland and West Virginia.

Area 4—Illinois and Indiana.

Trailblazing Gains Won In DiGiorgio Farm Pact

An additional 5-cent increase is provided in April 1968. The agreement can be opened for negotiations on pay and benefits covering the last year of the contract.

- DiGiorgio is to waive its unemployment insurance exemption and file for coverage for all its agricultural employes by the state program. If the state refuses to accept jobless coverage, the company is to pay the 6 cents per hour cost into a special benefit fund.

- A 5-cent per hour employer contribution, retroactive to last Jan. 1 to set up the special benefit fund. The fund is to accumulate for a year and then be used for such benefits as medical, dental or hospital care, pensions or life insurance. Any union-management disagreement on benefits is to be resolved by the arbitrators.

The farm workers also got a 15-cent per hour retroactive pay increase effective on the dates the UFWOC was certified as bargaining agent last fall.

Under the hiring hall provisions, the company agrees to give the union at least 72 hours' notice in which to supply workers before doing any hiring elsewhere.

Also provided in the contract are one-week vacations after a year's employment and two weeks after three years, for workers who put in at least 1,600 hours a year, and time and one-half pay for work on six holidays.

The contract includes some points on which UFWOC and Di Giorgio had agreed before negotiations broke down last fall, most important of which was the union shop. It was put together by arbitrators Sam Kagel, a San Francisco attorney, and Prof. Ronald Haughton of Wayne State University, Detroit, under an agreement for binding arbitration in the event negotiations failed.

Dolores Huerta, UFWOC negotiating director, and Richard Liebes, economic counsel for the Bay District Joint Council of the Building Service Employes, conducted the arbitration case for the union.

The case was prepared and presented under the direction of Chavez and Assistant UFWOC Dir. Larry Itliong.

New Rail Wage Talks Set As Congress Delays Strike

'Leveling Off' Seen:

Jobless Rate Dips To 3.6% in March

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate edged down to 3.6 percent in March, reflecting a generally strong economy but with the manufacturing sector showing "a softening of conditions," the Labor Dept. reported.

The jobless rate had held at 3.7 percent for three straight months after rising from 3.5 percent last November. But in March, unemployment fell by 200,000—about 100,000 more than usual—due to a sharp drop in teen-age joblessness. This left total unemployment at just under 3 million, the same as a year ago.

In recent months, the Labor Dept. noted, the size of the labor force has closely followed employment levels, thus leaving the jobless rate virtually unchanged. Both employment and the labor force grew rapidly from October to January and then leveled off.

Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, reacting to speculation in the press that a recession may be in the offing, told reporters that "the economy has leveled off in recent months but has not receded."

Indicators Cited

Ross cited a half-dozen of the most important "concurrent economic indicators" to back up his statement.

However, in noting the gradual decline in the factory workweek, the fall-off in overtime, the rise in involuntary part-time work and the March increase in jobless pay claims, he commented:

"Putting these together, we do see a softening of conditions in the manufacturing area."

He emphasized that, in a stage referred to by some observers as "post-industrial," manufacturing ac-

Labor Hails Steps to Aid Economy

Government actions to keep the nation's economy from slipping into "a possible recession" were praised as "welcome measures" by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger.

Goldfinger hailed "the long-awaited cut in the discount rate" announced by the Federal Reserve Board and Pres. Johnson's release of $1 billion in frozen federal funds for highway construction and $146 million for other public works.

He said the construction funds will stimulate sales and jobs in the building materials and equipment industry as well as add to employment in building trades.

The Federal Reserve Board reduced its discount rate—the interest it charges on loans to commercial banks—from 4.5 to 4 percent.

The action was taken shortly before the Commerce Dept. reported that the nation's economic growth came to an apparent standstill in the first quarter of 1967. A preliminary report by the department pegged

Old Faces, Voices Return:

Major Gains Scored In AFTRA Victory

Television and radio executives went back to the executive suite and familiar faces and voices returned to the nation's airwaves after a 13-day intermission.

The first network strike in the history of AFTRA—the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists—was called to back the contract demands of network staff announcers and newsmen employed by network-owned stations in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago.

It brought to the members directly affected a substantial boost in wages, including pay guarantees and a share in the talent fees paid for personal appearances on sponsored programs.

The strike ended after negotiators hammered out a three-year contract during three days and nights of almost continuous negotiations. The pact was approved by the 84-member AFTRA board and is being submitted to the membership for ratification.

Growing support from other unions and crafts in the broadcasting industry helped pave the way for settlement as network man-

LBJ Urges All-Out Try For Pact

By Eugene A. Kelly

Six shopcraft unions headed into renewed wage talks with U.S. railroad managements after Pres. Johnson signed into law a joint resolution by Congress extending the no-strike provision of the Railway Labor Act by 20 days.

The talks had stalled after six months of intermittent meetings and the unions were preparing to walk out Apr. 13.

Swift Approval

Congress gave swift approval to the President's request for a 20-day extension to give "the process of collective bargaining a last clear chance in this case."

Johnson said the resolution would have the effect of extending the "no strike" period of the act for a full 80 days—the same period allowed under the Taft-Hartley Act governing restraint of other so-called emergency disputes.

The six AFL-CIO unions represent 127,000 workers who keep railroad equipment running — the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. They bargain with an employers' association representing nearly all major U.S. railroads.

The President urged the negotiators to "use every hour of these 20 days" to seek agreement. Unless a settlement is reached, he said, "Congress will again be required to help avoid" the consequences of a nationwide rail strike. He announced also that a new mediation committee headed by retired U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Charles Fahy would investigate settlement

Chicago Rally Builds Strong Support For Higher Social Security Benefits

Chicago—Massive support for Pres. Johnson's proposals to strengthen social security was generated here at the last of the AFL-CIO community rallies as 1,500 men and women pledged themselves to collect signatures from voters backing the program for improved benefits.

The people who attended the rally, sponsored by the Chicago AFL-CIO and held in Plumbers' Auditorium, took home petitions which they agreed to circulate among their neighbors for signatures. They acted after enthusiastically endorsing a resolution formally approving the benefit changes the President has urged.

The rally was the final one in a series of 15 the AFL-CIO set up across the nation under the sponsorship of local central labor bodies to demonstrate popular support for the Johnson proposals.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman noted that the meeting was held only a few days before the House Ways & Means Committee was to start closed hearings on the social security bill. He said the improvements recommended by the President and supported by the AFL-CIO should be considered just a "down payment" on what is required to meet the needs of the nation's elderly. The long-range AFL-CIO goal is a 50 percent rise in present benefit levels, financed in part by Treasury funds.

Seidman pointed out that the President's program of an average 20 percent increase would actually mean a 59 percent rise for those receiving the minimums—from $44 to $70 a month for unmarried per-

Alaska Rebuffs Dirksen Attack On 1 Man, 1 Vote

Juneau—Republican votes in the reapportioned Alaska state Senate dealt a blow to the efforts of the Republican leader of the U.S. Senate—Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois—to overturn one man, one vote apportionment of state legislatures.

A "Dirksen Amendment" resolution was beaten 9-8 in the Alaska Senate, with seven Republicans voting against it and only five GOP members supporting it.

LEGISLATIVE INSTITUTE sponsored by the Textile Workers Union of America gave this delegation from Biddeford, Me., area a chance to visit Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.). They were among the TWUA members from 19 states who spent a week in Washington getting a first-hand look at government in action.

2nd Volume Issued On Disputes Cases

The AFL-CIO has published a second volume of determinations by the impartial umpires under the federation's internal disputes plan covering the years 1964-65. An earlier volume covered the years 1962-63.

An index digest to the texts of the determinations for all four years accompanies the new volume. The material has been published for the use and information of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Copies of the 1964-65 volume and the index digest are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division at $5 per set. The volumes will not be sold separately. However, there are some copies of the texts of the 1962-63 decisions still available at $2.50 per copy.

Discount Rate Cut Welcomed By Goldfinger

the Gross National Product—the sum of all goods and services produced in the country—at an annual rate of 764.3 billion for the three-month period.

This represented an increase of $5 billion over the final quarter of 1966. But the increase was totally accounted for by price rises of seven-tenths of 1 percent, and the "real" GNP remained unchanged.

Goldfinger called the FRB action cutting the discount rate "a key signal that America's central bank is continuing its recent policy of easier money and lower interest rates."

The Federal Reserve's increase to a 4.5 percent discount rate in December 1965—taken by the autonomous agency over the Administration's expressed opposition—kicked off a "tight money" era which saw interest rates soar and the home-building industry stifled.

Goldfinger said the rate cut "is a hopeful sign that the Federal Reserve, which began to move away from tight money and high interest rates last fall, is now continuing to encourage the expansion of economic activities."

In a quick follow-up to the Federal Reserve's action, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, which lends money to savings banks, dropped its interest rate on outstanding loans from 5.75 to 5.5 percent after a high of 6 percent last year.

Union Papers Face Rise in Postage Cost

The Administration's proposed hike in postage rates, amounting to 20 percent in most classifications, would impose increases ranging from 16-2/3 to 60 percent on the labor press.

The bill would increase the minimum charge per copy for non-profit second-class mail from the present one-eighth of 1 cent to one-fifth of 1 cent. The law provides that publications pay either by the piece or by the pound, whichever is higher.

Under the present rates—one-eighth of 1 cent a piece or 1.8 cents a pound—eight-page tabloid newspapers pay the piece rate while the 12-page tabloids are just heavy enough to pay by the pound. The proposed 60 percent hike in the piece rate would affect 12-page and possibly some 16-page tabloids.

The postage rate bill (H.R. 7977) proposes to up the pound rate for non-profit second-class publications from 1.8 cents to 2.1 cents, in three annual increments of one-tenth of 1 cent. This is a total of 16 2/3 percent, somewhat less than the 20 percent norm for most classifications.

The bill introduces a new concept of escalating postage rates in proportion to advertising content. Thus the pound rate for publications with 70 percent advertising or more would be 2.8 cents rather than 2.1 cents. A sliding scale is proposed, so that publications with 10 to 20 percent advertising would pay 2.2 cents, those with 20 to 30 percent 2.3 cents and so on. These, too, are maximums reached in three annual steps.

The 60 percent rise in the piece rate would be a "castastrophe" for many AFL-CIO publications, said Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester of the Intl. Labor Press Association, which has some 400 member publications with a total per issue circulation of more than 20 million.

"Under this proposal an eight-page or 12-page labor tabloid with 500,000 circulation would be forced to pay an extra $375 an issue in postage alone," he pointed out. "Even the best-established international unions would find this an unreasonable burden, and for many smaller publications it would mean sudden death.

"It is ironical that the Post Office Dept., which says it is trying to neutralize the advantage in postage rates enjoyed by some non-profit publications that carry heavy amounts of advertising, should seek to impose the heaviest penalty on labor publications that carry no advertising at all."

Fiester said an earlier poll of ILPA members indicated a willingness to go along with the same proportionate increase asked of other classifications of mail.

The impact of the proposal respecting advertising content would require further evaluation, he added.

Paper Unions Win Vote at New Mill

Wauna, Ore.—Workers in a new Crown-Zellerbach paper mill chose two AFL-CIO unions over an unaffiliated group in a National Labor Relations Board election here. The vote was 153 for the Papermakers & Paperworkers and the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers; 85 for the Association for Western Pulp and Paper Workers; 1 for no union.

The campaign included a public demonstration of support by members of 50 area unions. The Clatsop County AFL-CIO and the county Building & Construction Trades Council helped, as did the AFL-CIO regional office under Dir. James J. Leary, the winning unions said.

Averts N. Y. Walkout:

Fire Fighters' Pact Boosts Pay, Benefits

New York—City Fire Fighters won an improved package of benefits and the first written contract in the 102-year history of the New York Fire Dept. after taking an unprecedented strike vote among 10,500 union members.

IAFF Local 94—the Uniformed Firemen's Association—was preparing to set a walkout date when Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) called union representatives to Gracie Mansion and, after all-night talks, offered terms that soon were ratified at a meeting of 6,000 off-duty union members at Manhattan Center.

Firemen had worked without an agreement for nearly 10 months. When city negotiators refused to make any settlement that was outside the "guidelines" set by a city fact finding committee, the union circulated strike ballots.

The Fire Fighters won a 27-month agreement providing raises of $500 a year retroactive to July 1, 1966, and another $400 a year effective this coming July 1. Welfare and pension improvements brought the total package to a union-estimated value of $1,361 per man over the contract term.

The new pact was notable also, Local 94 Pres. Gerald J. Ryan said, for two first-time gains—longevity wage increases and supplemental pension contributions by the city—and for these additional breakthroughs in contract fringe benefits:

- A "personal leave" day, to be earned in fiscal 1967 but taken in fiscal 1968, and continuing yearly thereafter.
- A fireman's right to be represented by his union or legal counsel at department investigations, interrogations and hearings.
- A written contract and a written description of job duties.
- Four hours extra pay when a fireman is recalled to duty on a day off; six hours when actually assigned to duty on being called in, both at time and a half pay.

Besides the pay raises, the city agreed to contribute $25 per man to a security benefit fund out of which hospitalization, anesthesia, optical and dental benefits are paid, and to reduce the pension contribution of each fireman by 2.5 percent, or an estimated $117—both retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967. After one year the city will put another $25 per man into the welfare fund, assume an additional $122 pension payment reduction, and make longevity payments on this schedule:

After 10 years of service, an extra $100 a year in pay; after the 20th year of service, an extra $100; after 25 years, an additional $100 in pay per year.

The supplemental pension agreement provides that the city will, on May 1, 1968, contribute $1 per workday per fireman for the balance of the contract term ending Sept. 30, 1968.

Firemen will continue to work a year-around average of 40.32 hours a week on the two-platoon system, the union and city government agreed.

Ryan said the settlement, which also was accepted by representatives of 24,000 city policemen, was achieved with the help of the New York City AFL-CIO and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., in getting stalled negotiations resumed.

Transit Pay Rises 4.2% over Year

Unionized local-transit operating employes pushed their average hourly wage up to $3 an hour on July 1, 1966—a gain of 12 cents, or 4.2 percent, during the previous year, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The BLS survey showed average hourly scales of $2.98 for operators of surface equipment and $3.20 on subway and elevated lines. Ninety-eight percent of the employes surveyed received boosts in their rates during the year, with 60 percent getting between 10 and 15 cents an hour.

Meany Spells Out Ethical Standards For Publications of Central Bodies

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has issued a set of ethical standards for publications owned or endorsed by state and local central bodies. Citing the AFL-CIO's rules governing central bodies as they relate to publications and advertising, Meany directed on Apr. 10 that:

"1. All such publications shall refuse advertising from any firm which resists organization of its employes by an affiliate of the AFL-CIO, and shall not solicit or accept advertising from any firm involved in a strike or lockout, or which is on the unfair list of the central body.

"2. In soliciting advertising, the only claim that shall be made is that such advertising may win consumer acceptance or approval of the advertiser's product or service.

"3. All advertising, except of nationally advertised standard brands, must carry the name and location of the advertiser, when pertinent, the identification of the product or service.

"4. Publications shall not associate themselves in any form with yearbooks, directories or programs which have as their primary purpose the solicitation of donations under the guise of advertising.

"5. Any endorsement conferred upon a privately-owned publication shall be by official, recorded action of the central body or its executive board; shall spell out in contract form all terms and conditions of the endorsement and shall provide for withdrawal of the endorsement for cause, which shall include violation of the terms of this directive. In case of such withdrawal, the central body shall make the fact public, with the reasons therefor. If there is a change of ownership or control of an endorsed publication, the contract between the publication and the central body shall be void.

"6. Such publications must publish in each issue an accurate statement of such endorsement. Such statement shall give the official name of the endorsing central body, but shall not include the names of the individual unions which are members of the central body.

"7. A committee of the central body shall supervise its official publication on a continuing basis to ensure that all provisions of Rule 23 and these ethical trade union standards are observed. Such committee shall report periodically to the executive board of the central body.

"8. Any understanding or arrangement between the publisher, editor or owner of any endorsed publication and an officer of the central body, or an officer of an affiliated body, shall be made a matter of record filed with the central body. Any changes in such arrangements or understanding during the life of the contract shall also be made a matter of record.

"9. Publishers and/or editors of endorsed publications shall agree, in writing, to observe this directive and all applicable provisions of Rule 23 of the Rules of the AFL-CIO Governing State and/or Local Central Bodies."

New Shopcraft Talks Slated As Congress Delays Strike

possibilities and seek to stimulate negotiations. Other members are Dr. George W. Taylor and John T. Dunlop, veteran arbiters.

The shop unions set a new strike deadline of 12:01 a.m. May 3 and agreed to "continue our efforts to negotiate in good faith." Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. said in announcing the postponement that rail management "up to now has been trying to set the stage for an unjust, un-American compulsory arbitration law" but "we hope they will change and use these weeks to make us a fair offer."

Still No Offer

Fox said the unions "still have received no specific offer from management" on the unions' proposals to close the gap between shopmen's wages and those of skilled workers elsewhere.

"Now Congress has forced a postponement," he continued. "If the government instead had let railroad management know, firmly and unmistakably, that the railroad worker's right to strike is not going to be abolished, then management would have made a fair offer and this dispute would be settled now."

Johnson sent a message to Congress Apr. 10 asking passage of the joint resolution. The Senate passed it, 81-1, with Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) the lone dissenter. He explained that he favored the extension but was voting no to discourage labor and management from "throwing up their hands and coming to Capitol Hill to have us resolve their problems for them."

McIntyre told newsmen: "There is something basically wrong with our present system of resolving disputes in the transportation industry if Congress has to be used with ever-increasing frequency as a tool" in bargaining.

Johnson's action in blocking a strike for 20 days provoked a rash of bills and oratory calling for further restrictions on the right to strike. Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) declared he will call for Senate action from the floor if the Senate Labor Committee fails to schedule hearings shortly on emergency strike bills.

Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Col.) termed the President's resolution "just a delaying tactic." Six Republican senators who voted for the extension resolution issued a statement accusing Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz of failing to keep earlier "promises" to propose new curbs on emergency strikes. Besides Javits and Dominick, the signers were Paul J. Fannin (Ariz.), Winston L. Prouty (Vt.), Robert P. Griffin (Mich.) and George Murphy (Calif.).

The House passed the resolution, 396-8. Those voting no, all Democrats, were William A. Barrett (Pa.); Phillip Burton, Augustus F. Hawkins, Harold T. Johnson and Edward R. Roybal (Calif.), Thaddeus J. Dulski (N.Y.), Arnold Olsen (Mont.) and William F. Ryan (N.Y.).

After passage by both houses the resolution was flown to Punta del Este, Uruguay, for the President's signature. Johnson signed it while waiting for the opening of a hemisphere trade conference there.

The shopcrafts first served their wage proposals on the railroads May 17, 1966. They sought a 20 percent pay increase, a cost-of-living escalator clause, and improved fringe benefits. The unions charged that carrier representatives "made no real effort to engage in meaningful collective bargaining" during direct negotiations or later mediation sessions.

Members of the six unions voted "overwhelmingly" last October to authorize a strike. The President appointed a three-member emergency board which last Mar. 10 recommended a 5 percent general pay increase retroactive to Jan. 1, a third week of vacation after 10 years' service, and a job evaluation study to "rationalize the wage structure" and correct inequities.

Escrow Proposal

The board proposed that the parties negotiate a sum of money to be placed in escrow by the carriers as a "down payment" pending completion of the job study.

Negotiations since the board report have proved fruitless, with the unions accusing carrier representatives of failing to deliver a promised counter proposal.

The shopcrafts' latest proposal calls for a general pay increase of 7 percent as of Jan. 1, 1967, and another 5 percent next Jan. 1, plus two adjustments of 15 cents an hour for highly skilled men. They call their request "fully justified" because skilled workers have for several years suffered a pay gap of 50 cents to $1.50 or more an hour "as compared with men of similar skills in other industries."

After Congress voted the 20-day no-strike extension, the six unions said they had rejected a request to postpone voluntarily their scheduled strike "out of consideration for the feelings of our members." Union members, they said, "don't wish to shut down the railroads; there has been no national railroad shopmen's strike for 45 years, but our right to strike is the only way we have to win a fair settlement."

Pennsylvania Labor Hits Dirksen Amendment Bid

Philadelphia—The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO's largest convention voted unanimously to exert every effort to defeat a State Senate resolution calling for a national constitutional convention to act on the so-called Dirksen Amendment.

The proposed amendment, whose foremost sponsor is Republican Senate Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, would knock out the U.S. Supreme Court's one man, one vote principle and permit any state to elect the members of one of its two chambers on a basis other than population. The convention proposal has been approved by the legislatures of 32 states, most of which were malapportioned at the time. Formal endorsement by the legislatures of 34 states is required under the Constitution.

The convention drew a record 2,173 delegates from 817 locals representing 102 international unions, and gave strong support to AFL-CIO leadership on state and national levels.

Major resolutions rallied union members behind Pres. Johnson's recommended 20 percent average increase in social security benefits, and fully endorsed the President's policies in Viet Nam.

Speakers on successive days were Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R) and his Democratic opponent in last November's election, Milton J. Shapp.

Shafer reiterated his liberal campaign pledges with emphasis on unequivocal opposition to a so-called "right-to-work" law. Proponents of such an anti-union curb have named Pennsylvania as one of their target areas.

Shapp thanked the AFL-CIO for its support last year and promised to support Shafer "whenever he proposes legislation that is good for all the citizens of the state."

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers reviewed the performance of U.S. unions in supplying the armed forces during World War II, saying it probably shortened the conflict by three or four years. Then he used the anti-labor drives immediately after the war, including enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, as the basis of a plea for immediate increased participation in COPE in anticipation of next year's elections.

Other speakers included Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D); Legislative Dir. Frank N. Hoffman of the Steelworkers; State Sec. of Labor & Industry William J. Hart, on leave as director of USWA District 19, and former Gov. George M. Leader (D).

New Jet Needs 3 Pilots For Safety, Union Says

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots want a three-pilot crew aboard the new short-range Boeing B-737 jets "in the best interests" of the travelling public, the union and the company, according to Chairman C. L. Woods of the union's Master Executive Council on United Air Lines.

The ALPA board of directors adopted the crew standard as mandatory policy at a convention last November. The action followed a series of inspections of the aircraft at the Boeing Corp. plant in Seattle, Wash., during which the pilots determined that a minimum of three of their number was essential to safe operation. United has ordered 50 of the new planes and plans to put them into service in 1968.

Woods, writing in Page One, monthly publication of UAL pilots, noted that the B-737 is represented as a "technologically-advanced aircraft" and added that "in many ways it is, but it is not unique in this respect as aircraft history goes."

"Every airplane we have flown on United from the Swallow and the Boeing 80-A to present aircraft has incorporated technological improvements—many of them regretfully not as successful as advertised and some of them actually found to be hazardous," he writes.

"That these innovations have not always proven reliable or desirable is a lesson which should not be ignored. Our pilots are operational specialists who recognize that neither man nor machine are flawless and many times have worked closely with the introduction of new equipment. They have learned to be especially skeptical about the use of design to relieve operational problems.

"Although the engineers continually assure us that the new technological improvements will resolve our problems, careful reexamination shows that the problems have not been resolved—simply shifted."

Variety Artists Redraft Union Security Terms

New York—The American Guild of Variety Artists announced it is redrafting its union security agreements to meet a finding by the National Labor Relations Board that the existing language is unlawful.

The new contract provisions will be submitted to the AGVA board and then to employers after union approval, an AGVA officer said.

The NLRB, settling a five-year dispute, ruled recently that AGVA contracts provided for an illegal closed shop, instead of the lawful union shop. At issue were AGVA's minimum basic agreement with 2,500 hotels, night clubs and circuses; 900 franchise agreements with promoters, bookers and agents; and the standard artists' contract requiring more than 13,000 actors and performers to be members.

The board ordered AGVA to stop further use of the contract forms but denied backpay to two former employes of the union who lost their jobs in 1962. The board said no evidence had been presented that the former branch managers—Clayton Hart and Al Fast—had been denied a job because of lack of AGVA membership.

The union said the new contract provisions being drawn up will contain a "pool" clause on union security. This would require an entertainer who goes to work under an AGVA contract to join the union after 30 days total work, including previous work within the jurisdiction of any other constituent union of the Associated Actors & Artistes.

In another development, the Labor Dept. announced that U.S. District Court Judge Constance B. Motley of New York has amended her order of Jan. 23 setting aside the 1965 AGVA election of officers. The amended order will permit present AGVA leaders to remain in office until officers are chosen for a new term this summer in an election to be supervised by the secretary of labor. Results of the last election had been protested by a slate headed by Sammy Davis, Jr.

John W. Park Dies; AFL-CIO Organizer

Beaumont, Tex.—AFL-CIO Field Rep. John W. (Bill) Park, attached to the Region XVII office with headquarters in Fort Worth, died suddenly at his home here. He would have been 65 in July, when he had planned to retire.

A native of Beaumont, he was a member of Beaumont Painters Local 243 in which he had been active as an officer prior to joining the organizing staff of the former AFL in 1941. He also had been president of the Texas Conference of Painters. Surviving are his widow and four children. Burial was in Beaumont.

AFTRA Wins Wage Raises, Share in Fees

agement moved from inflexibility to the give-and-take of collective bargaining.

Newsmen on network-owned stations, not previously covered by a general agreement, were guaranteeded $300-a-week base pay, plus 25 percent of talent fees up to the amount of their salary and 100 percent beyond that.

Staff announcers will receive a $25-a-week raise in base pay over the contract period, plus strengthened job security in handling announcing assignments for network FM radio stations.

The contract is retroactive to last Nov. 16.

AFTRA contracts covering the bulk of union members appearing on television and radio programs were negotiated early this year, but the union held off signing the agreements until a settlement was reached for its newsmen and announcer members.

Many of the nation's best-known news commentators and performers put in regular picket duty and only a few followed Chet Huntley of NBC through the picket lines. The contract settlement pledged both management and the union to take no disciplinary action against any employe or member.

Sec. of State Dean Rusk and a number of other prominent public figures cancelled scheduled television appearances during the strike. The settlement came in time to permit the televising of the Motion Picture Academy Award ceremonies. The movie stars and other performers on the program had refused to take part in a televised or broadcast program during the AFTRA strike.

The Second Most Valuable Card You'll Ever Have

(Nothing Beats a Union Card)

THE LITTLE SOCIAL SECURITY CARD in your wallet can mean $424,000 in insurance protection for you and your family now.

If Congress approves Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson's proposal for stronger Social Security, your Social Security card will be worth:

- $62,000 in retirement payments.
- $132,000 in life insurance payments.
- $230,000 in disability payments.

You couldn't buy it at any price. And remember it follows you all your working life, no matter where you work. The longer Social Security operates the more it will be worth for today's worker.

Nothing from your Social Security premiums goes toward paying agents' commissions, advertising, dividends to stockholders or similar items which can "load" a policy cost as much as one-third. Social Security doesn't lapse if the premiums aren't paid.

Suppose you started to work in 1966 at age 21. You retire when you're 65. You've earned the maximum under Social Security all that time.

You will have paid in an average of $42 a month. You and your wife will get back $377 a month. That's equivalent to a private insurance policy with a face value of $62,000. To buy a private $62,000 insurance policy you'd have to pay more than 1½ times as much . . . $67 a month.

Suppose you started to work in 1966 at age 21, earn the maximum, and die in 1975 leaving a wife who's then 25 and a two-year-old child. Your wife will get $356 a month until the child is 22. Then when she's 62 she'll get $196 a month for life.

That adds up to $132,000, based on normal life expectancy. It will have cost you only $3,858.

Suppose you become totally and permanently disabled when you're 30. You, your wife and your child will receive benefits that could add up to $230,000, based on normal life expectancy. It will have cost you only $3,858.

And don't forget Medicare. When you're over 65 medical insurance is hard to get and costly, too.

It adds up to your "best buy" insurance.

So write, wire, call your congressman and senators now to support stronger Social Security.

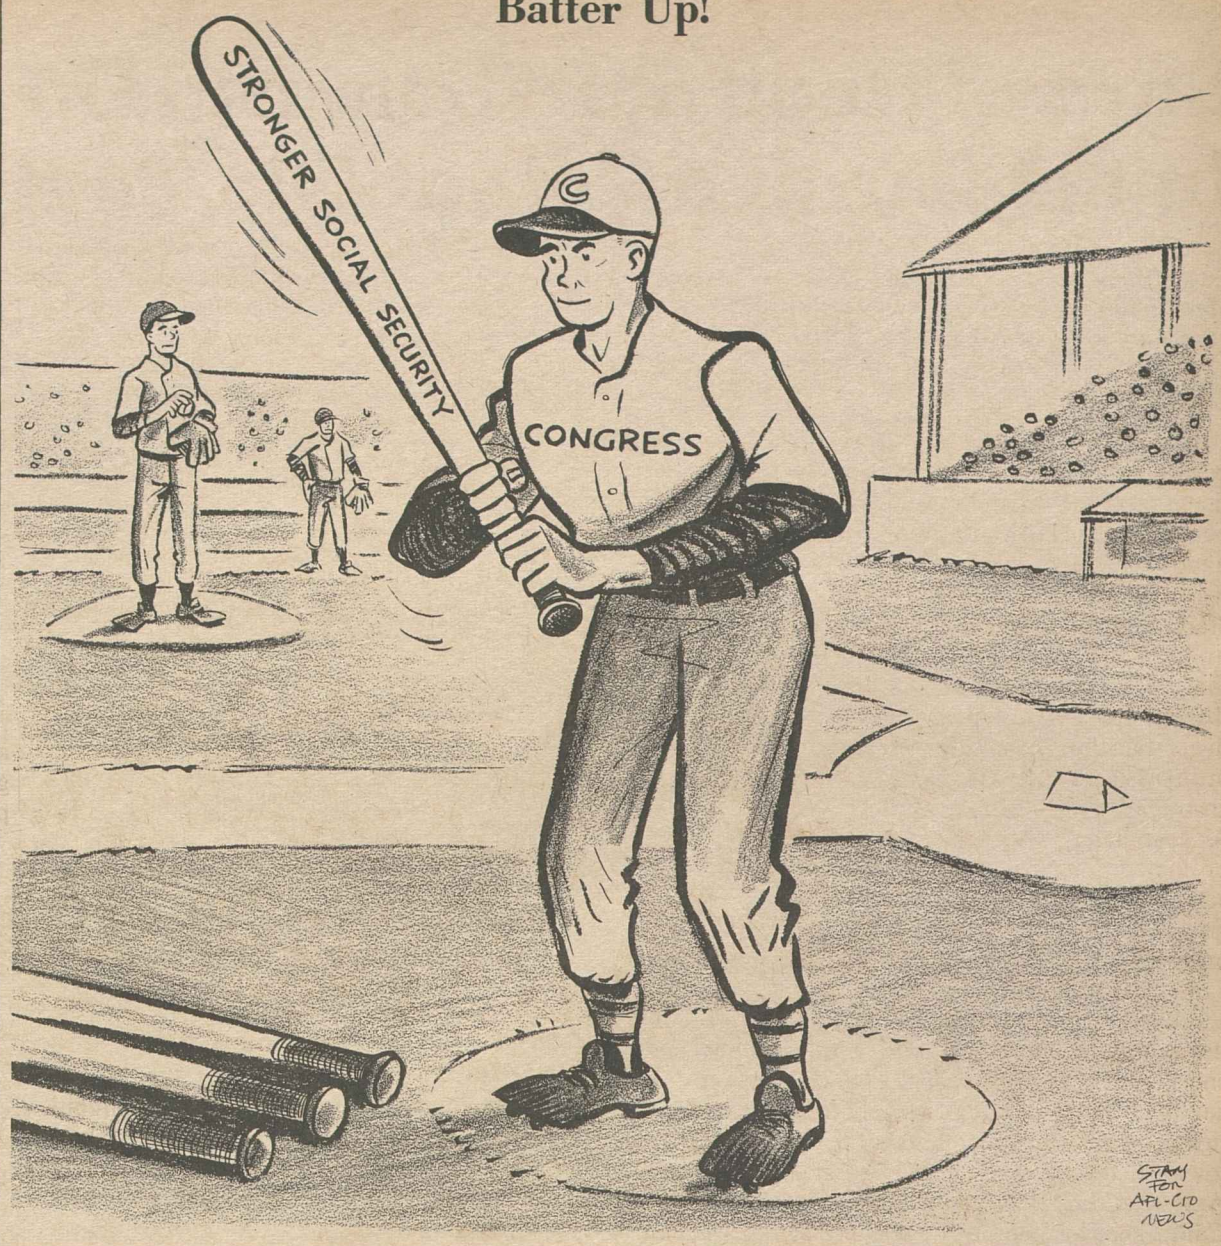
Batter Up!



Cites Ho's Stand:

Sen. Brooke Says Bombing Halt Unlikely to Spur Peace Talks

The following is excerpted from a speech by Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.) made on the floor of the U.S. Senate shortly after his return from a trip to Viet Nam and Southeast Asia.

SO MUCH HAS BEEN SAID and written about Viet Nam, often by people overcome by the great emotions which the war arouses in us all, that many fundamental considerations tend to get lost or confused in public discussion. For this reason, we need constantly to remind ourselves and our adversaries of the essential elements in the American commitment to defend South Viet Nam.

The President has often characterized that commitment: We are in South Viet Nam to help the people of that country protect themselves against a complex form of aggression and to help them establish a political system reflecting their own desires and needs, not one conceived and imposed by external force. The very nature of this mission dictates that our military action be limited in form and in purpose.

The crucial question which is so deeply perplexing is what this country must do to bring the conflict in Viet Nam to a just conclusion. During the past 12 months, I have repeatedly argued that the United States—which is so superior militarily and economically to its opponent—ought to take the first step toward creating a better climate of negotiations.

Everything I learned, not only in South Viet Nam but also in Japan, the Republic of China, the colony of Hong Kong, Cambodia and Thailand, has now convinced me that the enemy is not disposed to participate in meaningful negotiations at this time.

No one with whom I conferred had at any time received any word or sign which might by the most generous interpretation be construed as an indication of Hanoi's willingness to negotiate. Those most familiar with the East Asian mentality in general, and the North Vietnamese mentality in particular, are convinced that the enemy still waits, still aspires to victory through collapse of the American will to persist.

How long this wait may be, how determined our effort must be before the enemy will be convinced of our steadfastness, is a matter of conjecture. It is possible that the North Vietnamese base their calculations on the expectation of a growing division in the American body politic on the question of our basic commitment in Viet Nam. We may differ on the conduct of the war. We may differ, and we do, on cessation or noncessation of bombing in the north. We may differ on whether to include the National Liberation Front in any possible negotiations.

But, in the main, the American people do not and have not differed on our basic commitment. And let there be no doubt in the mind of Ho Chi Minh or anyone else that the American people will persevere in their fundamental support of the South Vietnamese. That commitment is a willingness to discuss an equitable political settlement in Viet Nam, and a readiness to continue our military and economic assistance to the South Vietnamese so long as is necessary.

I HAD HOPED that a cessation of bombing in the north would bring about negotiations for peace, that if we did cease our bombing, Ho Chi Minh would come to the conference table and honest negotiations for peace would commence.

I am discouraged by his recent statement affirming his original position that negotiations are impossible without cessation of bombing in the north coupled with a unilateral withdrawal of American and allied troops from South Viet Nam. This reassertion of his original and fixed position shows no intention on the part of Ho Chi Minh to negotiate for peace at this time.

I believe the burden of responsibility has shifted from the United States, and shifted clearly to Hanoi. Thus, it does not appear that suspension of the bombing in the north would, by itself, produce fruitful negotiations.

Since I believe that North Viet Nam is not prepared to negotiate in a meaningful way at this time, I must reluctantly conclude that the general direction of our present military efforts in Viet Nam is necessary.

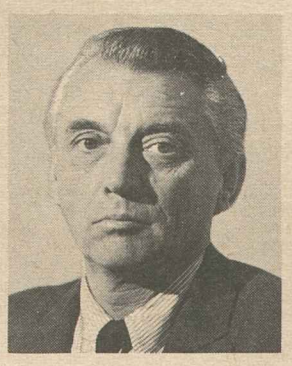
Story of Head Start Summed Up In the Life of a 7-Year-Old Boy

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

A SEVEN-YEAR-OLD BOY isn't often the personal guest of the President of the United States and the First Lady, and that's what happened to Pancho Mansera and his parents. This happy occasion would never have come about if a volunteer pediatrician with Project Head Start hadn't discovered in the summer of 1965 that Pancho had a grave thyroid deficiency. Then five, Pancho had the mental and physical growth of a child of two. A year later, with coordinated medical and educational care, he had grown an astonishing 5.5 inches.



Morgan

At the White House, scrubbed, combed and dressed in a black suit with white buttons and short black cowboy boots, Pancho was a bit subdued by the dazzle of the photographers' flood lights but as the great bulk of Lyndon Johnson towered fondly over him, the small Mexican-American boy from San Luis Obispo County, Calif., kept his cool, as he was proclaimed "Head Start Child of The Year."

But conscientious Americans, in and out of government, should blow their tops in shame over the neglect Pancho Mansera's case history represents. At the same time they can touch their hats in an encouraged salute to what Head Start has already done on a shoestring and what it can do if Congress and the public will give it the modest support it needs to touch the estimated 6 million other poor children under six who need special medical and school help now, before they are abandoned on society's human junk pile as numbers on some community's welfare roll.

Thanks in some large part to the obstinate opposition of organized medicine, county public health services in the United States have been little more than a cruel joke—teaching some crude fundamentals in first aid, testing for tuberculosis in some communities, providing smallpox vaccinations in some instances and doing little else but, figuratively, wiping children's noses.

Pancho comes from Grapes of Wrath country where as far as the migrant poor following the harvests are concerned, things have changed comparatively little in the 30 years since John Steinbeck wrote his searing, epic novel about the Okies from the Dust Bowl, the Mexicans who slipped over the border to do stoop-labor in the fields, their miserable wages and filthy work camps virtually dictated by the organized growers.

Pancho's father, a dignity and dedication shining through his Latin swarthiness, absorbed with modest pride the official White House fuss over his son's good fortune. Simon Mansera drives a tractor in the California cauliflower fields. He barely manages to keep his wife and four children in a small frame house set out there, as one visitor said, "in the middle of nothing." They do have a TV set and a car, but when a blight set in on Pancho's health, they couldn't afford a doctor. The public health nurse that looked at Pancho knew something was seriously wrong, but the health service had no facilities to examine or treat him.

SOCIAL consciousness had broadened since the worst days of the depression. When Head Start came to San Luis Obispo, Jim Vestal, photographer for the Telegram-Tribune, spotted the stunted, pathetic, almost gnome-like figure of Pancho and the paper published his picture.

Dr. William J. Tibbs, a project pediatrician, found his glandular condition and began to treat it. In a matter of months, Pancho began to emerge from his physical and psychological prison. A 24-minute color documentary made of his almost magical transformation was shown at the White House ceremony.

It will be screened for interested communities across the country against a factual backdrop of some of Head Start's heartening accomplishments, coupled with reminders of the job yet to be done in salvaging these very young of the poor —only 40 percent of whom, interestingly enough, are Negro; the other 60 percent are white, a third of whom are of Spanish-speaking ancestry.

The story of Pancho is both shining with promise and steeped in tragic frustration. The war on poverty is becoming a major casualty of the war in Viet Nam. As a New York Times editorial observed, Pres. Johnson has spoken out boldly on the need for population control but budgetary pressures of the conflict in Asia have apparently caused him to omit earmarking funds for family planning services for the poor, "thus putting their future in doubt."

At the program for Pancho, the gifted, loyal but harassed general of the anti-poverty war, Sargent Shriver, fired some impressive statistical ammunition in defense of the Head Start campaign, which the Administration wants to expand slightly: 740,000 children immunized against polio; more than a million vaccinated for measles; 900,000 dental cases discovered, with an average of five cavities per child, and at least partially treated.

The value of the human resources thus saved by the investment of a relative pittance of money and enormous dedication of Head Start volunteers is simply incalculable. But our priorities are cockeyed. Forget the billions invested in space and the war in Viet Nam. Shriver noted that the U.S. has spent more research money on pregnant cows than pregnant women.

'Moral Obligation' Spurs Aid To Farm Worker Organizing

LABOR is spending large sums of money to help organize farm workers because it has a "moral obligation" that is much above any consideration of profits or losses, the AFL-CIO director of organization declared in a recent interview.

The trade union movement will not regain in the next 100 years the funds it is spending in behalf of farm workers and their union, said William L. Kircher, but there is a "moral obligation upon all of us, as trade unionists, that is much above the ledger sheets."

"This is what really motivates all unionists with respect to farm labor and unionizing," said Kircher, who appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, presented each Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

One of the costly factors in the farm workers' struggle is their exclusion from the National Labor Relations Act, Kircher said.

"The kind of orderly processes that are made available to other workers are not available to the farm worker," he observed. "It's terrible, when you think of it, that the American people and the government say to farm workers, you have to strike—you have to boycott—you have to harass—you have to engage in all of these other practices that we say in our public posture we are opposed to."

KIRCHER SAID that California farm workers can't expect any help from Gov. Ronald Reagan or his administration. "The top people in his cabinet who have anything to do with this are going to be as harmful . . . and hold us back as much as they can," he said.

Reporters questioning Kircher on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, were Stanley Levey, labor reporter for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers.

IF THE PROPOSAL by Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien that the Post Office Dept. be converted into a nonprofit government corporation, removed from the President's cabinet, does nothing else it will focus a searing spotlight on the problems of the postal service.

These problems are manifold—from the poor service to the antiquated facilities to the inadequate pay and benefits for the 700,000 employes of the department.

And now, with O'Brien seeking another postal rate increase from Congress, the problems are touching everyone.

The attitude of the postal unions on the O'Brien corporation proposal is largely wait and see. But they are obviously finding the suggestion, as did Pres. Johnson, "worthy of serious consideration."

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks says he believes the proposal is modeled after the white paper published by the government of Prime Minister Harold Wilson in England. The British government is now in the second year of a step-by-step planning program to set up a public corporation by 1969.

"There's a fundamental difference between the British and American systems," Hallbeck points out. "Their system includes the telephone and telegraph services and both of these are moneymakers. No post office in the world, limited to handling the mail, would ever make money or break even." And, of course, the root of the problems of the American Post Office Dept. is money.

"I think I know what prompted O'Brien to make his proposal," said Pres. Jerome J. Keating of the Letter Carriers. "It was his frustrations, his difficulties in getting the money out of Congress to adequately run the postal system."

Keating says the "economy budget" has meant that the department has not been able to pay wages that would enable it to compete in the labor market. As a result there is a critical shortage of experienced employes. "A public corporation could be an out," he continued, "but I'm not so sure it's a very good out."

BOTH KEATING AND HALLBECK are emphatic that the Post Office Dept. should be operated as a public service and should not be expected to be run in the black like a business. If the department were to be limited by its own revenues the service would probably cease to function as we know it.

In most years first class and air mail are paying their own way. Parcel post breaks about even. All other classes of mail cost the department money.

Second class mail, for example, covers newspapers and magazines. This class of low rates was set up in Congress early in our history to encourage the spread of knowledge and information.

Many members of Congress believe that smaller and non-profit publications should continue to benefit from this. However, there has been an outcry for years over the millions of dollars in subsidies paid to extremely profitable magazines.

Fourth class mail, too, subsidizes profit-making businesses with its extremely low rates for circulars and various printed matter and merchandise of eight ounces or less.

Congress has refused to stop these subsidies to private businessness; it won't provide sufficient funds out of general federal revenues and the citizens are being hit by proposed increases in rates. Meanwhile, the Post Office Dept. limps along.

"The Post Office Dept. is an old institution," Keating said. "It has established certain policies and procedures which make changes impractical and impossible."

Hallbeck, who says he'd "like to see the blueprint of the house before I buy it," envisions other difficulties. As a start he wants to make sure that the 700,000 employes of the department have their retirement and pension rights protected.

In light of all this, an observation by a top postal official that "we don't expect this suggestion to be put into effect tomorrow," seems pretty obvious.

LABOR'S "MORAL OBLIGATION" to help farm workers organize is above any consideration of profits or losses, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher (center) declared on Labor News Conference. Reporters Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers questioned Kircher on the AFL-CIO public affairs interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

STAFF INTERNS from the State, County & Municipal Employes are welcomed to AFL-CIO headquarters by Pres. George Meany. The training program includes classes in Washington and field assignments, then a final week of orientation in Washington.

CITY PLANNING seminar is led by Dr. Royce Hanson, president of the Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies.

CLASS SESSIONS, including give-and-take discussions, made up a large part of the first month's training program.

INTERNS STUDIED operations of their own union. Here a group meets with Elwood Taub, SCME education and research director.

State-County Builds Staff From Ranks

Take 14 active, enthusiastic union members from their jobs with city, county and state governments.

Bring them to Washington, D. C., for a month of intensive instruction —in classes, seminars and formal and informal discussions. Let them see at first hand the operations of their own union, the AFL-CIO, Congress and the executive branch of government.

Send them out on seven weeks of field assignments to get first-hand practical experience.

Bring them back to headquarters for a final week of study and orientation. And then put those who show promise and performance on the union's field staff.

That's the formula the State, County & Municipal Employes adopted for a pilot staff intern program.

The goal, SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf said, is to develop a service staff of people with first-hand knowledge of public employe problems and training in the broad areas of union leadership.

The interns, chosen from a large group nominated on the basis of their union activity, aptitude and interest, have met with congressmen, union leaders and experts in many fields.

There's no textbook for future union organizers and staff representatives. But there's a lot to learn. And the AFSCME interns wanted to learn.

Keenan Cites Unmet Needs:

Housing Parley Asks Step-Up in U.S. Aid

"Prompt and decisive action" to put into effect a 20-year program to "restore strength and vigor to residential buliding" was urged by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in his keynote speech at the 36th National Housing Conference in Washington.

Keenan, general chairman of the conference, declared such a program would "redress the balance" between federal spending on housing and on other programs.

Construction of new homes, he maintained, must be brought to a level "commensurate with the needs of the people and with the requirements of a healthy, expanding economy."

New Priorities

He urged a "drastic realignment" of national priorities to give needed financial strength to programs administered by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. And he called for a major increase in HUD's programs of loans, mortgage insurance and grants-in-aid.

Keenan pointed out that HUD expenditures are offset by receipts from repayments and participation sales on loans. In 1968, he observed, the HUD budget calls for $6.3 billion in expenditures and $6.4 billion in receipts.

He also outlined the program later adopted by the convention calling for construction of 50 million new dwelling units in the next 20 years at the rate of 2.5 million annually.

At least 10 million of the new units, he said, must be built at the rate of 500,000 a year to "provide housing for those who have been largely neglected up to now—the families and individuals of low and moderate incomes . . . the people who are not served by the normal private housing industry."

The conference recognized the difficulities posed by the Viet Nam conflict, but declared "it is neither sound nor equitable to throw the burden of domestic restrictions on the housing and urban development programs." It warned that "we are at a time of crisis" in housing with need at an all-time peak and construction at its lowest levels in many years.

The delegates were critical of HUD's administration of its programs, charging a "damaging disparity" between statutory objectives and "administrative interpretations, action and inactions."

Pres. Johnson sent greetings to the conference, which he said was meeting "at a time of decision on the destiny of urban America."

"The last Congress equipped us with the means of dealing with the needs and aspirations of our people," the President wrote. "It is now our task to put these tools to work in our towns and cities.

"I have called on the Congress to provide funds for these urban programs. But we must also have the support and active leadership of national organizations and local communities to get them under way. The cost of moving forward is small. The cost of failing to do so would be staggering."

Re-elected to new two-year terms as NHC directors were Keenan; Pres.-emeritus Harry C. Bates of the Bricklayers, also an AFL-CIO vice president; Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, and Ben Fischer of the Steelworkers.

Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers was newly-elected to a two-year term. Bates and Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers were re-elected vice presidents.

Powell Victory Confronts House

The House faces for the second time this year the question of whether to seat Adam C. Powell as the representative from New York's 18th congressional district.

Powell's Harlem constituency gave him an overwhelming victory in the special election called after the House had refused to seat him on grounds of misconduct in office. He received 27,900 votes to 4,091 for the Republican candidate and 427 for a Conservative Party opponent. It was the biggest percentage of the vote Powell had ever received.

Powell has challenged the House's constitutional right to bar him from office and his attorneys are pressing an appeal from a federal judge's ruling that the courts have no authority to interfere with the House action. There was speculation that he might await further legal action before seeking to claim his seat on the basis of his re-election.

Alaska Rebuffs 1 Man, 1 Vote Foes

The defeated resolution would have called on Congress to convene a constitutional convention to initiate an amendment allowing minority control of one house of a legislature.

Republicans, who had gained seats in the reapportionment, said Dirksen and his aides were on the phone trying to persuade GOP senators to back the resolution. He even sent what one senator described as "a four-foot telegram" and Alaska Republicans, who had gained seats after reapportionment, complained of "long-distance arm twisting."

The resolution had passed the Alaksa House early in the session. It had been bottled in the Senate Rules Committee whose chairman agreed to let it come to the floor after talking to Dirksen, but then voted against it along with the majority of his GOP colleagues.

To date, 32 legislatures are reported to have passed resolutions of some sort over a period of years calling for a constitutional amendment on reapportionment. Constitutional experts have challenged the validity of many of the resolutions —most of which were passed by minority-controlled legislatures before reapportionment.

Untried Procedure

Under a never-used section of the Constitution, amendments can be proposed by a constitutional convention summoned on call of two-thirds of the state legislatures—34 of the 50 states.

Dirksen, himself, in a 1965 speech, acknowledged that such a convention might be empowered to propose sweeping amendments to the entire constitution, rather than be confined to consideration of a single amendment.

"There is strong legal opinion," Dirksen said in his speech to the National Grange, "that once the states have mandated a convention, neither the courts nor the executive can control it, guide it, or establish the matters with which it would deal. A constitutional convention, many sincere people believe, would, once unlocked, spread in every direction."

Despite his expressed reservations, Dirksen has prodded state legislatures to pass constitutional convention calls. Some observers have described this as an effort to put pressure on Congress to initiate his constitutional amendment rather than risk the entire Constitution to the hands of a convention. The U.S. Senate twice rejected the Dirksen Amendment, despite several rewritings to make it more palatable. In its latest form, it would allow states to apportion one house of a legislature on a basis other than population.

'Leveling Off' Seen:

Jobless Rate Dips To 3.6% in March

counts for only about one-fourth of total employment.

By the same token, any stagnation or minor slumps in manufacturing industries can be obscured in the overall statistics by the steady growth of the service and governmental sectors.

This was illustrated by the Labor Dept.'s job report on the February-to-March developments:

"Drops of 35,000 in manufacturing, 62,000 in retail trade and 33,000 in construction were offset by increases of 56,00 in service activities and 72,000 in government employment, mainly state and local."

Overall, seasonally adjusted nonfarm payroll employment showed little change over the month. Nonfarm jobs totaled 65.5 million in both February and March and were up by only 100,000 since January after a strong upsurge last year.

In the manufacturing sector, there has been a loss of 100,000 factory jobs since January, down to a total of 19.4 million, seasonally adjusted. Production worker employment has declined by 150,000 in the same period, the report said.

The apparel industry was the hardest hit in March, suffering a loss of 21,000 jobs, seasonally adjusted.

In addition to the widespread factory job declines in manufacturing, the Labor Dept. also reported the number of workers on part-time for economic reasons was 2.1 million in March, up from January's 1.9 million. These figures are adjusted to account for seasonal influences.

Another sign of "a slower pace" in some areas, the Labor Dept. report said, was the decline in the factory workweek. The average workweek was 41.0 hours in January, 40.3 hours in February and 40.4 hours in March, seasonally adjusted. The slight rise in March was explained by weather fluctuations, the report added.

Ross was more sanguine about the larger economic picture. Evidently irked by what he feels is overinterpretation of the movement of single indicators, he said it was "fundamentally inaccurate" to call this a recession in everything but name, as did a business magazine.

He buttressed his case by reviewing the status of the main "concurrent" indicators.

He said non-farm employment rose through January and then leveled off; the jobless rate has held steady for three straight months; the Gross National Product is expected to rise, although not as strongly as last year; the industrial production index did decline in January and February, with March not yet in; personal income has been rising and should go up in March and retail sales were level in February but went up in March.

On the unemployment side of the Labor Dept.'s report, the March decline in teenage joblessness cut their usually volatile rate from 13.2 percent in February to 10.7 percent.

The non-white jobless rate was 7.4 percent in March compared to 3.1 percent for white workers. For the first three months of 1967, the non-white rate has averaged 7.0 percent or 2.2 times as high as the rate for whites, the Labor Dept. said.

The report also said the average hourly earnings of factory production workers rose 1 cent to $2.79 and average weekly pay was up 96 cents to $112.44.

FREQUENT ISSUES of Unity, voice of the AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining with GE and Westinghouse, were used to keep 200,000 members of 11 unions informed on developments in the coordinated effort to win better contracts for all.

11-Union Unity at GE, Westinghouse Seen Shaping Course of Bargaining

Coordinated bargaining by 11 AFL-CIO unions with General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Electric Corp. in 1966-67 has had so great an impact that it "may influence the future character of labor-management relations," the chairman of the 11-union steering committee reports in the current American Federationist.

David Lasser recounts in the article how the unions overcame a long-established management policy of fragmented bargaining and "one and only one offer" through what he calls "the first phase of labor's most ambitious effort at coordinated bargaining."

Lasser is assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, one of the unions which launched the cooperative effort at a meeting called Mar. 15, 1966 by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

All Partners

Other partners in the coordinated bargaining move were the Auto Workers, Carpenters, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Machinists, Plumbers, Sheet Metal Workers, Steelworkers and the Technical Engineers.

Until 1966, the article notes, GE's policy was to "keep the unions weak, divided and discredited." One offer, and only one, was made simultaneously to all unions, and to non-union employes.

"Relentless" drives were made to secure acceptance by the weakest of the bargaining units and then to "undermine the resistance of any holdouts," Lasser writes. He notes that the company was aided by "staggered expiration dates" of contracts, so that the combining of inter-union strength was prevented.

Westinghouse, he observes, was not so "blatant" in pursuing its goals but faithfully followed GE's main techniques.

All previous efforts to coordinate bargaining goals and strategy had been defeated when management forces made concessions on some key local issues to "break away important units, while maintaining constant pressure on the rest," the author says. Meanwhile, profits rose while wages barely kept pace with living-cost rises.

Among the methods used to turn the tide, Lasser says, were these:

Meany and the presidents of the cooperating unions created a Committee on Collective Bargaining. A steering committee was set up, and subcommittees set to work. Meany acted as CCB chairman and "gave the movement his active support, participating as a major speaker at national conferences, signing statements and securing the enthusiastic endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the AFL-CIO convention."

A member of the federation's public relations staff was assigned to the committee, and the full resources of other AFL-CIO departments were made available.

To counter "massive propaganda campaigns" by management among employes, the committee called a national conference, agreed on program goals, adopted a unity resolution, and held grass-roots meetings across the country to bring the issues to the members.

A newspaper, Unity, was published monthly and sent directly to members. Local union stewards were involved, copies of the bargaining goals were circulated, economic materials spelling out the union position were prepared, and suggestions were given on countering company propaganda.

Crises Overcome

Lasser reports how numerous crises were overcome and agreements finally reached on the national level after a presidential panel assisted the negotiators and then, after strike action in various locations, on the local level.

The author lists these major results of inter-union cooperation:

- The 1966 agreements were better than the total of the two preceding contracts, covering 1960-1966, and important benefits lost in 1960 were restored.
- The annual wage increase rose to a more adequate level; a partial cost-of-living escalator clause was established, and inequity adjustments for skilled, salaried and day workers were negotiated. The pension, insurance and vacation agreements, considered by management as closed until 1968, were "not only reopened but substantially improved."
- GE's "take it or leave it" philosophy was shattered by a final agreement that increased the value of earlier offers by 5-7 cents an hour. The wage guideline that GE had called "too high" was "effectively destroyed."
- Recognition by union members that coordinated bargaining, in spite of its difficulties, has "completely proved itself" and must "continue as a permanent feature" at GE and Westinghouse.

While only one year was devoted to preparing for 1966 negotiations, Lasser observes, nearly three years are available for 1969 preparations. A "much better job can be done," he notes, with harmonious inter-union relations, stronger membership support, and in view of the experiences of the past.

The author lists problems of coordinated bargaining that need continuing study. Among them are these:

- Better meshing of the unions' national and local bargaining experiences so that more inter-union support can be rallied for local bargaining.
- Closer cooperation among unions, with as much attention given to coordination in Westinghouse as in GE.
- Extending the coordination to cover all AFL-CIO unions that deal with the two firms, and working out cooperation with unaffiliated unions.
- Further unification of contract expiration dates. Two big unions achieved identical expiration dates at Westinghouse but most Westinghouse contracts expire two weeks after GE contracts.
- Anticipating the problems posed by threats of Taft-Hartley back-to-work injunctions.

Lasser also urges intensified coordination, along lines begun last year, between unions in the Intl. Metalworkers Federation representing GE and Westinghouse workers abroad as well as those in the U.S.

Meanwhile, he observes, the unions are not sitting back until 1969, but have developed a program on contract administration, including cooperation in handling grievances that the companies refuse to arbitrate, action on area wage differentials, and other matters.

Studies will be made, Lasser says, to determine whether cooperative action is possible to organize the non-union plants of the two companies. He concludes:

"With the great wave of mergers and absorption of companies with different union bargaining representatives, there is a vast field for coordinated bargaining which will increasingly influence labor-management relations of the future."

Musicians Seek Royalty For Use of Recordings

The Musicians asked Congress to recognize the right of performers to share in the profits from commercial performances of phonograph records.

AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin urged a Senate subcommittee to amend a House-passed copyright law to provide a royalty for musicians and other performers, as well as for the composer.

Failure to do so, Kenin declared, would perpetuate "a long and shameful discrimination."

Jobs Curtailed

Recorded music dominates the airwaves, he noted, and along with discotheques and juke boxes has drastically curtailed employment opportunities for musicians.

It is time, he urged, to adopt a copyright law that would give the performing musician "a fair participation in the profits derived from public performance of records."

Kenin suggested a 10-year right of a performer to a share in the commercial profits from his recording, based on a "reasonable" royalty fixed by the Register of Copyrights.

The House-passed bill, the first overhaul of the copyright law since 1909, for the first time requires royalties to composers—although not performers—on juke box performances. The bill sent to the floor by the Judiciary Committee would have required juke box owners to pay $19.20 a year for each machine into a fund to be divided among composers. The House cut the license fee to $8.

In another area, Kenin submitted a statement to the Senate Commerce Committee endorsing Pres. Johnson's proposal for a Corporation for Public Television which would use both public and private funds to improve non-commercial television and radio.

Johnson said consideration should be given to using communications satellites to establish an educational television and radio network.

Senators Ask Action On Site Picketing

A bipartisan drive to pass the on-site picketing bill opened in the Senate as seven Democrats and three Republicans joined in sponsoring legislation to permit building trades unions to picket any construction site in a labor dispute.

House hearings have already been concluded on a companion bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.). A divided Supreme Court in 1951 ruled that picketing a low-wage, non-union subcontractor on a construction project in which several trades were working violated the secondary boycott prohibition of the Taft-Hartley Act. Four Presidents have called on Congress to restore the right to picket.

The two chief sponsors of the Senate measure—Democrat Wayne Morse (Ore.) and Republican Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.)—led off with major speeches marking the introduction of the bill.

Its purpose, Morse told the Senate, is "to restore parity of treatment" under the law "between construction workers and their nonconstruction brethren."

A contractor who employs a non-union subcontractor is not an "innocent bystander" or a "neutral" third party to a labor dispute at the construction site, Morse stressed. The secondary boycott ban, designed to protect employers with no involvement in a labor dispute, should not apply in such cases, he declared.

Time For Action

Kuchel said the 1967 bill, strongly supported by the Administration and the AFL-CIO, is virtually the same as the measure urged by Pres. Eisenhower in 1954 and co-authored by the late John F. Kennedy when he was in the Senate.

"It is high time action were taken," he declared.

Joining in sponsoring the measure were Senators Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.), Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.), Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), and Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Pending business before the Senate was the House-passed bill restoring the investment tax credit to business and industry on the purchase of new equipment. For more than a week, however, the debate had been on an effort led by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) to use the bill as a vehicle to repeal the ground-breaking legislation passed last year providing federal financing of presidential election campaigns through a voluntary checkoff of $1 from income tax returns. A showdown vote was expected momentarily as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The House Judiciary Committee approved a bill setting one man, one vote requirements for congressional districts after the next decennial census.

Starting in 1972, there could not be more than a 10 percent difference in population between the largest and smallest districts in a state, and the average variation in districts in a state could not exceed 5 percent.

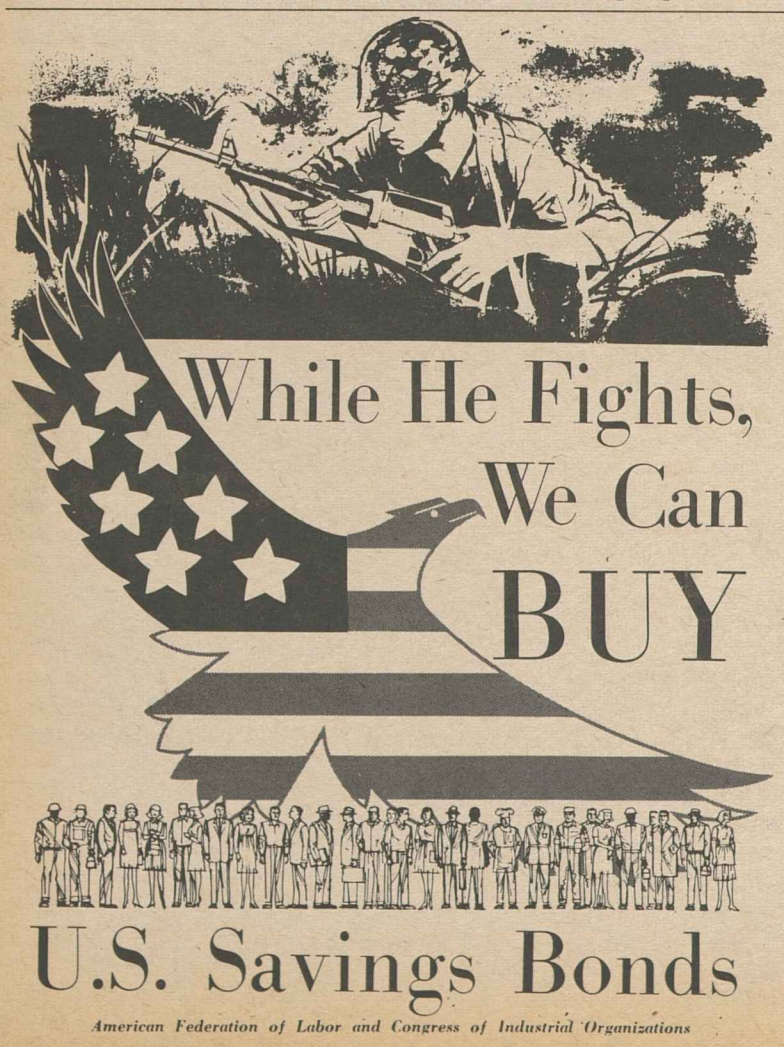
A sharp political battle this year over the anti-poverty program shaped up as 10 of the 14 Republican members of the House Education & Labor Committee joined in announcing a GOP "alternative" program. It would abolish the Office of Economic Opportunity—the key anti-poverty agency — revamp existing programs, and cut $300 million from the $2 billion in federal funds requested by Pres. Johnson.

Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) charged that the GOP plan "is simply a scheme to cut the heart out of the program." The Republican sponsors warned, however, that unless the Administration goes along with their plan, Congress may "kill off" the entire anti-poverty program.

The House Ways & Means Committee continued with its closed door consideration of social security legislation, with indications that it will be some weeks before the committee gets to the voting stage.

A major push for the long-pending "truth-in-lending" bill began in the Senate as a Banking subcommittee under Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) opened hearings.

Prospects for its passage appeared to be the best in years, with strong Administration support and changes in the membership of the full Banking & Currency Committee improving the prospects.



MORE THAN 1,500 PERSONS attended organized labor's Chicago rally backing Pres. Johnson's proposals for a 20 percent overall increase in social security benefits. Residents of Chicago Housing Authority units for the elderly are shown arriving by bus for the session, held in Plumbers' Auditorium. Amalgamated Transit Union Division 241 paid for the use of the buses and members donated their services to drive them.

Busmen on Holiday Help Aged to Rally

Chicago—Some 300 residents of Chicago Housing Authority units for the elderly made it to the AFL-CIO social security rally—and back—with the help of Amalgamated Transit Union Division 241 and six of its veteran members taking the proverbial "busmen's holiday."

The division hired the buses from the Chicago Transit Authority and turned them over to members who had volunteered their services—Michael McCarthy, a member for 37 years; Walter Straubing, a 35-year member; Fred Laske, 27 years; William Redmond and David Kissane, 25 years, and John Ogar, 22 years.

The arrangements were made by Pres. James J. Hill of Division 241.

Meany Named To Post Office Study Panel

Pres. Johnson named a 10-man commission, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, to study a possible reorganization of the postal service.

The President specifically asked the commission to consider the proposal by Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien that the Post Office Dept. be abolished and the job of delivering the mail turned over to a nonprofit government corporation.

Johnson appointed Frederick R. Kappel, former board chairman of the American Telephone & Telegraph Corp., to head the new Commission on Postal Organization.

Its other member, besides Meany, are: George Baker, Harvard business school dean; David Bell, vice president of the Ford Foundation and former AID director; General Electric Co. Pres. Fred Borch; Washington Attorney David Ginsburg; Ralph Lazarus, president of Federated Department Stores; J. Irwin Miller, chairman of Cummins Engine Co.; W. Beverly Murphy, president of Campbell Soup Co., and Bank of America Pres. Rudolph A. Peterson.

"I have specifically asked the commission," Johnson said, "to determine whether the high quality postal service which Americans have come to expect can better be performed by a Cabinet department, a government corporation or some other form of organization."

sons and from $66 to $105 for couples. For those receiving more than the minimums, the increase would be 15 percent.

He emphasized that social security helps the younger worker and his family as well as the post-65 worker, and warned against the Republican plan for higher benefits which he said would freeze recipients' living standards at subpoverty levels.

Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) strongly urged neighborhood letter-writing campaigns to win votes in Congress for the proposals. He particularly asked retired workers to get younger members of their families to write senators and representatives, declaring it is time everyone in the country realized that the problems of the aged are national problems.

"Social security is the greatest insurance bargain on the market today," he said.

"If a worker is disabled, he has protection for himself and his family. In case of his death, his widow and children are protected. When he retires, he gets a check every month. When we strengthen social security, we strengthen democracy."

Pucinski hailed organized labor for its longstanding support of social security legislation, noting that "labor believes in people, and we are here today to show our concern for people."

President William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO also urged those at the rally to get out and work for the Johnson program.

"The more letters we write to our congressmen," he said, "the more petitions we have signed, the more we let people of all ages know just how vital it is to strengthen social security—all of this and more will add up to success."

He appealed to rally participants "to join together in the greatest work of all, the strengthening of social security, the public policy that says we in America really care about what happens to people."

Sec. J. Charles Laue of the Near North Citizens Council urged support for a measure pending in the Illinois Legislature that would end the State Public Aid Commission's practice of cutting relief payments when minimum social security benefits are raised. The bill would require the commission to keep welfare benefits at the current level regardless of minimum social security payments.

James Gatehouse Dies; Brick & Clay Official

Coalport, Pa.—Vice Pres. James C. Gatehouse of the Brick & Clay Workers, president of the Union's Dist. Council 7 with headquarters in Clearfield, died in Philipsburg State Hospital of cancer. He was 52.

Burial was in nearby Irvona, his birthplace. Surviving are the widow, June, three sons and three daughters.

Textile Import Curbs Urged To Save Jobs

Stronger import controls are needed "to preserve the American textile industry and the jobs of 4 million Americans," the United Textile Workers said in congressional testimony.

UTW Pres. George Baldanzi said all textile fibers—not just cotton products—should be regulated through long-term agreements that include import quotas "by country and category."

Testifying before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), Baldanzi said imports of synthetic textiles and woolen goods come primarily from low-wage, industrialized countries.

"Many of the countries exporting textile products subsidize them solely for the purpose of getting into the profitable American market," he declared.

Baldanzi charged that present U.S. trade policy in many areas "subsidizes the greed of entrepreneurs, whatever their nationality, who find a great opportunity for uncontrolled profiteering in these low-wage areas and who couldn't care less about raising the standards of those they exploit."

Truth-in-Lending Pressed To End Credit 'Flim-Flam'

StrikeRight Called Vital To Liberty

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told 600 Georgetown University students that labor's right to strike is essential to their freedom, even if it sometimes inconveniences them.

"I don't know of any way you can write a law that will protect a citizen from the adverse effects of the legal action of another person," he said. If such a law were enacted, he warned, it would be "the end of our way of life."

The AFL-CIO president fielded 90 minutes of questions—first from a panel of three students and a professor, then from the audience.

New Campus Program

It ended with a standing ovation after a broad-ranging give-and-take session which launched the university's new program "to bring the issues and leaders of the country to the campus."

It started with a statement from the program's moderator, Willoughby Abner of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, that "collective bargaining is a robust and healthy animal."

Meany brushed aside a student suggestion that collective bargaining may have "regimented men too far" to the detriment of the individual.

It has brought benefits that the individual worker couldn't possibly obtain on his own, he pointed out. And one could hardly call it regimentation, he observed, when union leaders negotiate a contract and the members turn it down.

He assured a questioning professor that neither the labor movement nor the Democratic Party is likely to nationalize American industry. "The record bears out," he said, that "we have done better for

TAPE OVER MOUTHS was the answer of striking restaurant workers and their allies in Laredo, Tex., when they were enjoined from shouting "huelga," the Spanish word for "strike," while on the picket line. A broad surge of interest in unionization is spreading among the city's workers, many of whom are Mexicans or Spanish-Americans. (Story, Page 3.)

Quality, Quantity Stressed:

CSA Parley Urges Health Care for All

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—Community counselors to the U.S. labor movement examined the health care available to the average American, found it wanting and called for improvements in quality and quantity.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall told 500 delegates at the opening session of the 12th Annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services that the same labor movement which pioneered in furnishing funeral expenses and health clinics for the working poor and which helped lobby the passage by Congress of medicare can put its opinion-forming machinery into gear to improve health care.

"It is appropriate and timely to recall that recently the AFL-CIO called on Congress to improve and expand the areas of health care," said Hall, who is president of the Seafarers.

In the keynote address, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services, spelled out the need for a "comprehensive program of quality health care for all, whether the American Medical Association likes it or not." He said the conference was organized to bring current facts and problems to light, specifically:

- Mental Health, "perhaps the nation's No. 1 problem."
- Alcoholism, one of the "top four problems in a country with more than 5 million alcoholics" needing treatment.
- The effective implementation of the medicare program "so that it works not only for the elderly but will lead to a national health program for all."

Arthur E. Hess, deputy commissioner of social security, reported that the medicare program is "working well" in its first nine months but two leading medical men found serious flaws in its effectiveness.

The five-day conference was scheduled to end with the annual Murray-Green Award Dinner at which AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne was to present labor's

Big 4 Rubber Talks Near Pact Deadline

Akron, O.—Negotiations centering on the Rubber Workers' proposal for a Full Employment Earnings Program—FEEP—approached a climax as bargaining teams for the union and the Big Four rubber manufacturers sought to hammer out agreements before contract deadlines.

The sessions, covering 75,000 URW members, were being held in Cleveland, Cincinnati and Columbus with Goodyear, Firestone, Uniroyal and Goodrich. Current contracts were to expire at midnight Apr. 20.

Union bargainers were backstopped by heavy strike votes that reflected a strong spirit of unity and militancy among URW members.

In Akron, where 20,000 members are covered by the agreements in Goodyear, Firestone and Goodrich plants, the strike votes were carried by more than 93 percent. The Firestone and Goodyear locals reported the biggest votes in their histories.

AFL-CIO Assails Rate Camouflage

By David L. Perlman

Organized labor called for passage of a federal truth-in-lending bill to lift the "curtain of indecipherable statistics" that keeps the American consumer in the dark when he borrows money or buys on the installment plan.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Banking subcommittee that the majority of union families are making payments on installment purchases—and most of them are paying much more in interest than they realize.

Along with other consumers, he said, they are prevented from shopping for the best credit terms because of the "flim-flam" by which sellers and lenders camouflage interest rates.

Since 1960

He reminded the Senate panel that truth-in-lending legislation has been before Congress since 1960, when it was first introduced by former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.).

Labor is not opposed to consumer credit, Biemiller stressed. It's the only practical way many families have to make major purchases, from automobiles to washing machines.

"All we ask," he said, "is that the consumer be told how much credit is costing him, in honest, understandable terms."

Every year the bill has been considered, Biemiller noted, labor has asked: "What's wrong with it?"

"We have yet to hear anything approaching a persuasive answer," he declared. "It seems to us that the only institutions that will be hurt are those who have something to be ashamed of—who know they are bilking the buyer, and that

Bill Backed To Outlaw Wiretaps

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to outlaw all forms of "bugging"—including both wiretapping and newer forms of electronic eavesdropping.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, testified in support of the Administration's "privacy" bill at Senate judiciary subcommittee hearings.

The bill, sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman Edward V. Long (D-Mo.) and 21 other senators, makes only one exception to its flat ban on eavesdropping.

It allows the President to authorize eavesdropping by federal agents in cases involving the nation's security. Even there, the evidence could not be used in courts.

Harris said the national security is the only "overriding consideration" which could justify an invasion of privacy.

He strongly disagreed with the position of some law enforcement officials that wiretapping and bug-

Full Financing Sought For Domestic Programs

Full financing of the "long-overdue social legislation" enacted during the 89th Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO as it "emphatically" rejected the argument that "domestic programs should be cut back to support our military commitments."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the United States has the resources to continue domestic social progress at the same time it combats Communist aggression.

Biemiller testified before two House Appropriation subcommittees, one dealing with the budget for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and the other with financing of the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, and related agencies.

On the HUD budget, he stressed the importance of the $40 million sought by Pres. Johnson for rent supplements and the $412 million asked to launch the model cities program.

He termed rent supplements, designed to help low-income families live outside of "barracks-type public housing," an "imaginative" approach which labor fully supports.

The model cities appropriation request is "a realistic beginning," Biemiller declared. It is the "minimum" needed to make a start towards upgrading entire neighborhoods of deteriorating cities.

He also urged approval of funds sought for metropolitan planning for facilities needed both in the central cities and the suburbs, and for research in urban problems.

R. J. Thomas Dies at 66; Former UAW President

Muskegon, Mich.—R. J. Thomas, a leader of the Auto Workers from the union's hectic early days and its president from 1939 to 1946, died at his retirement home here after several years of failing health. He would have been 67 in June.

He became an assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the time of the AFL-CIO merger in 1955, and retired because of disability on Jan. 1, 1964, after a stroke.

In a telegram to Mrs. Thomas, Meany and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler expressed "deepest sympathies" at the death of "a sincere trade unionist, a great American and a warm personal friend."

"His contributions to the Auto Workers and to the cause of the trade union movement in the United States were long, and we are sure they will be lasting," they said. "All of us who knew him and admired him will miss him."

In Detroit, 3,000 delegates to the UAW special collective bargaining convention expressed grief at Thomas' death and hailed him as "a pioneer in the organization of our industry and as a UAW president who contributed greatly to establishing our union."

A hard-working, blunt-spoken man dedicated to the interests of the rank-and-file, Thomas was born in East Palestine, O., moved with his family as a child to Youngstown, and completed his formal education with a year and a half at Wooster (O.) College.

After service in the engineering department of the Bell Telephone Co., he became a welder in the Cadillac plant in Detroit and several years later moved to Chrysler's Jefferson-Kercheval plant, also in Detroit.

In 1934 he helped organize workers at the Chrysler plant and was elected president of the independent union there, which he linked with a similar union at Chrysler's Dodge plant headed by Richard T. Frankensteen, who later was a UAW vice president.

The two unions became part of the UAW at its founding convention in South Bend, Ind., in 1935. In 1936 came the Chrysler sitdown strike, which Thomas led, and the following year he was elected a UAW vice president.

Named President

When Homer Martin, after a fierce internal struggle, was ousted as UAW president in 1939, Thomas was named to succeed him by the executive board and was confirmed in the post by the convention a few months later. He was elected a CIO vice president the same year, and later became secretary-treasurer of the CIO Political Action Committee.

During World War II he was a member of the National War Labor Board and of Pres. Roosevelt's Labor Advisory Committee. When Walter P. Reuther succeeded him as UAW president in 1946, he was elected a UAW vice president. The following year he became assistant organization director for the CIO.

He is survived by his widow, the former Mildred Wettergren, and a son, Frank Jay Thomas, of Muskegon, who was an AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization staff member from 1962 to 1966. Funeral services were held in the Clock Funeral Home here, with burial in Lakeside Cemetery.

Stephens Gets Federal Post, Leaves AFTE

Russell M. Stephens has resigned as president of the Technical Engineers to accept a position as labor consultant to the U.S. Civil Service Commission's bureau of inspections.

Stephens served as president of the AFTE since 1951. A graduate of the Drexel Institute of Technology, he had 14 years of government service in Philadelphia and Washington before becoming a full-time union officer.

The Civil Service Commission announcement said that Stephens will deal with employe-management relations problems referred to the bureau of inspections, consult with federal employe organizations and "make continuous assessments of the nature and trend of complaints bearing on the general welfare of federal employes."

AFTE Sec.-Treas. James Woodside said the union's executive council will meet May 4 in Washington to choose an interim president to serve until the 1968 convention.

484 Disabled Aided Under Iowa Project

Des Moines, Ia.—The demonstration project sponsored by the Iowa AFL-CIO in cooperation with the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration has helped 484 clients with various disabilities since the program became operative Dec. 1, 1965, the annual report shows.

The project was initiated by 20 union-designated counselors who received training at the University of Iowa and who serve in their spare time without compensation. Another 114 counselors have since been added to the staff.

The men and women who received assistance included both union and non-union members. They were counseled on the need and availability for rehabilitation services, assisted in obtaining employment or re-employment, and advised on workmen's compensation and social security problems.

In addition, according to the report, 583 disabled persons were referred to and assisted in obtaining help from other agencies.

NLRB Names Director Of Kansas City Region

Robert E. Allen, 37, has been appointed regional director for the National Labor Relations Board at Kansas City, Mo., to fill a vacancy created by the February death of Martin Sacks. He is the youngest of the NLRB's 31 directors.

Allen was formerly NLRB trial attorney and supervisory attorney in Memphis, Tenn., and Washington, D.C.

Chemical Union Local Sues Defecting Officers

Chemical Workers Local 63 in Washington, D.C., has filed suit charging nine former officers with misappropriating union funds.

The local, which has been placed under an administrator by the international union, represents 1,400 employes of the Washington Gas Light Co.

The suit charges that the former officers paid themselves lost time for attendance at meetings at which they plotted to lead the local out of the Chemical Workers and form a rival organization known as the Intl. Union of Gas Workers.

In addition, the suit accuses them of paying their salaries, totaling $550, for April though they resigned on Mar. 27; with collecting lost wages they were not entitled to because the work they alleged they performed was done on days they were not scheduled to work, and with sometimes collecting twice the amount they were entitled to.

The suit was filed under the section of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act dealing with union officers' violation of fiduciary responsibilities. In it the local seeks $20,000 in compensatory damages and $10,000 in punitive damages.

Named in the suit, filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, were former Pres. Paul O. Bible, former Vice Pres. Kenneth E. Kidwell, former Recording Sec. Donald R. Mead, former Financial Sec.-Treas. M. C. Breckenridge; Ralph R. Thompson, John Buckholtz and Robert P. Burgess, former trustees; Henry C. Outlaw, former guide, and Charles Wetzel, former sergeant-at-arms.

Salaries of the first four officers were listed at $100 a month and of the remaining five at $30. The suit points out that it is union policy to reimburse officers and members for wages lost because of absence from their regular employment for the purpose of carrying on legitimate union business.

For All Americans:

chief award for distinguished community service to Dr. Albert B. Sabin, developer of the Sabin vaccine for immunization against poliomyelitis.

The conference theme, "Toward Improving Our Community Health Services," was stressed not only by Hall and Perlis but also by AFL-CIO Vice President David Sullivan and Paul Jennings. Sullivan is President of the Building Service Employes, Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Beirne heads the Communications Workers and also is chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee.

Delegates from most AFL-CIO unions and major central bodies with full-time community service workers heard reports from professional experts in health services and attended 10 workshops on community action against alcoholism, 10 on community mental health facilities, and 10 more on various phases of medicare.

The conference opened with a reception sponsored by the Clothing Workers and the Textile Workers Union of America and welcoming talks by three leaders of the New York labor movement—Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York AFL-CIO, and Chairman Michael Sampson and Dir. Gerald R. Waters, Sr., of the local AFL-CIO Community Services Committee.

Theme of Talks

Major talks were delivered on The Hospital as a Major Community institution, Health Needs of a Community, Improving Community Health Services, The AFL-CIO Blood Bank Program and the Program of the SIU, Community Programs on Alcoholism, Public Health, Community Mental Health Facilities, Medical Frauds, Community Programs on Mental Retardation, Medical Rehabilitation, and Medicare.

An evening program featured messages by Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on social security and by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey on "You and Medicare." Mrs. Humphrey spoke at one session as a member of the President's Committee on Mental Retardation.

Perlis reminded delegates that a major function of AFL-CIO Community Services is to "help deliver health services to our members, their families and all other citizens." Labor is "concerned with the total health of the total person," he said, and has been since its beginnings.

Labor was among the first to fight for and secure workmen's compensation, other insurance legislation, disability payments, housing, health and welfare improvements for all. It was the first agency to secure many benefits through collective bargaining. It pioneered in dental care, mental health, medical care and now medicaid, he reported.

Next, Perlis said, labor people are ready to campaign for national health insurance. The "final answer" is a comprehensive program of quality health care for all, he said, citing this reasoning:

Priced Too High

"Medical care in this country is not within the reach of most people of average incomes. Every single person in this room is neglecting his health because he cannot afford to pay for comprehensive care.

"If you want one complete physical checkup a year, it will cost you $100 or more for each member of your family. If you do not have prepaid group practice care, you will have to pay much of this cost yourself. And this does not include dental care, or real optical care."

Perlis declared that "the price of health care is out of the reach of most persons in this country, and it is going higher and higher."

The largest annual increase in doctors' fees since 1927 was recorded in 1966, and the largest increase in hospital charges in 18 years occurred last year, he reported, adding: "Union men know that the wage increases they won at the bargaining table have been lost to higher prices. much of it in the cost of medical care."

A national health insurance program will not automatically improve the quality of health services, but it will help obtain the kind of prepaid health care basis that will combine not only quantity, price and delivery but eventually quality, as well, he observed. Perlis reported that "hospitals are the only major community institutions that still hold out against labor participation on their governing bodies and concluded: "It is important that labor's voice be heard."

Dr. Howard J. Brown, city health services administrator here, charged that patients are not getting any better medical and hospital care than they were before medicare and medicaid paid part of the costs. So far as welfare patients are concerned, they "go to the same doctors who are still providing the same care but for higher fees," he said.

Brown suggested that labor support legislation which "strengthens planning and rationalization of health services" and programs arranged for a "total community" and for those at all levels of income."

He said "labor has made important contributions to the advances of medical care" and has "broadened the frontiers of health not only for its members but for everyone by raising living standards, the enviromental key to health."

Dr. Ray E. Trussell, director of Columbia University's School of Public Health & Administrative Medicine, said hospital costs are "out of control" and urged a reduction in the number of days patients are confined to hospitals by having them examined on an ambulatory basis before admittance to bed care.

Earnings Guarantee Sought:

heavy balloting reflected rank-and-file resentment at a mutual aid pact entered into by the Big Four and the General Tire Co., where the contract runs until May 19. The employers pledged that if one or two firms are struck, the others will provide financial aid.

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito, confident of achieving the bargaining goals set up at a Policy Committee meeting in Cleveland last February, called the employers' assistance agreement "the rubber industry's anti-poverty program."

FEEP Program Outlined

FEEP would pay laid-off workers 92.5 percent of their regular weekly wage for up to four years. Those on short weeks—three or four days—would get 95 percent of their average earnings.

The plan would be built on the supplemental unemployment benefits program (SUB), already in effect between the URW and the Big Four, which gives each laid-off worker 65 percent of his regular wage plus $2 a week for each dependent up to four.

SUB is financed by a fund into which the employer pays 5 cents per hour per man. Union spokesmen say FEEP would cost another 2 to 3.5 cents. Eligibility for SUB payments becomes more stringent when the fund is at a low level; the union proposal would make it even tougher under FEEP.

Bommarito said the union is not looking for pay for not working, but for a full year's pay for a full year's work. FEEP, he declared, would make the employers schedule work more efficiently and would eliminate periods of high overtime followed by short workweeks and layoffs.

Other major URW goals are a "substantial" wage increase, upgrading of skilled tradesmen, longer and higher-paid vacations and two more paid holidays.

The union negotiators say the industry can well afford to meet the proposals. They cite record sales and profits, increased productivity of union members, and the predictions of rubber company spokesmen of continued prosperity for this year. Other industry officials, however, have predicted a decline in tire sales because of the drop in auto production and have promised strong resistance to union demands based solely on 1965-66 financial reports.

The contract covering wages and working conditions is the first of two the URW and the Big Four must bargain out this year.

Separate agreements covering pensions and health and welfare benefits come up for renegotiation in August, when the union is expected to seek a substantial boost in the basic retirement benefit of $3.25 per month per year of service.

Police State Unions Hit By ICFTU on May Day

Brussels—A warning that "our common fight" will be "long and difficult" was sounded by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in a special May Day message to workers in countries under dictatorial rule. May 1 is labor's traditional "day" in most parts of the world, the United States and Canada being the principal exceptions.

Dictatorships can be maintained, the ICFTU said, "only by terror and by vast police forces." Their "state-controlled bodies masquerading under the false label of trade unions," it added, are merely "instruments . . . to control the workers."

The worldwide free trade union center had special messages for the workers of two police states:

"To the Soviet workers we want to say that we commemorate with them the 50th anniversary of the revolution. We will never forget that it was the real revolution, the glorious February Revolution, that abolished absolutism and czarist rule and, for the first time, introduced democratic institutions, including authentic workers' organizations.

"The October Revolution was not a genuine revolution, but a civil war in which the Communists took power to reap the profit and the glory gained by the successes of the democratic forces. . . .

"To the Spanish workers we want to express the solidarity of the workers of the free world in their hour of need. The Spanish dictatorial regime is stepping up its repressive measures against the workers fighting for their rights because it knows quite clearly that once these rights are achieved, the days of the dictatorship are numbered. Despite oppression, however, the struggle for freedom and trade union rights which the Spanish workers are waging . . . is beginning to bear fruits."

The message concluded with a pledge that "we will not cease our struggle until the rights of the workers, the freedom to organize trade unions of their own, the freedom to elect their representatives, the full respect of their dignity and the right to enjoy freely the fruits of their labor be achieved."

In a May Day Manifesto carrying "warmest fraternal greetings" and pledging international labor solidarity, the ICFTU hailed "the pioneers who blazed the trail for us to follow."

It also protested governmental interference in free collective bargaining in both industrial and developing nations, charging that "sacrifices are constantly demanded of the workers in the name of economic stability, of nation-building, and similar otherwise desirable causes." It continued:

"In genuine patriotism, trade unionists yield to none. But they insist that, if sacrifices are needed, they be made in the first place by those able to bear the burden; that if, for instance, wage control there must be, then this must be matched by equally stringent price and profit control.

"The present worldwide economic squeeze once again drives home the lesson: whatever the government in power, the workers' surest guarantee of social justice lies in a strong and independent free trade union movement."

The ICFTU also promised "to throw our whole weight" into the campaign to insure that the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights is ratified and applied.

New Spirit Of Unionism Grips Laredo

Laredo, Tex.—Nearly 2,000 persons turned out for a rally in support of striking restaurant workers here and gave new evidence of a surging union spirit among this border city's underpaid workers.

The rally, which was addressed by Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans of the Texas AFL-CIO, raised more than $400 for the strikers. The Webb County AFL-CIO, which represents only about 1,500 workers in 12 international unions, is raising a similar sum monthly to push the organizing campaign.

The drive has already brought small wage increases to workers — most of them Mexicans or Mexican-Americans employed in other restaurants, hotels and motels—from employers hopeful of heading off unionization. Businessmen have formed a committee to improve labor-management relations headed by a former president of the Laredo Chamber of Commerce.

The interest in union organization was sparked by VISTA volunteers who were shocked by the conditions they found. Some of them helped union-minded workers set up an organization they called VIDA. The initials in English mean "Voice in Democratic Action;" in Spanish, the word means "life."

The struck restaurant is being picketed by workers who borrowed from Mexican unions an official red and black strike banner, use of which has been highly successful in cutting down patronage. In Mexico, strikes are official and strikebreaking is forbidden by law.

The bulk of the organizing work is being coordinated by Intl. Rep. Jose H. Vazquez of the Laborers, the only international union representative in Laredo. The union has been chosen bargaining agent by a group of cafeteria workers who staged the first strike in the current drive and won substantial wage increases.

Papermakers Win Vote at New Plant

Pomona, Calif.—The Papermakers & Paperworkers, AFL-CIO, defeated the Association of Western Pulp & Paper Workers, unaffiliated, in winning bargaining rights at the plant of the Garden State Paper Co., still under construction here. The vote was 46-31 with one no-union vote in a National Labor Relations Board election.

An in-plant organizing committee was assisted by Thomas Terry of UPP.

Avco Strike Enjoined; Bargaining Is Reopened

Stratford, Conn.—Negotiations between Auto Workers Local 1010 and the Avco Corp.'s Lycoming Division here were resumed after 4,600 striking members of the union were forced to return to their jobs by a court order after what amounted to a one-shift walkout.

The plant is the sole producer of motors and parts for the "Huey" helicopter made by the Bell Helicopter Co., Fort Worth, Tex., and used as a troop transport in Viet Nam.

An order restraining the strike for 10 days was handed down by Judge William H. Timbers in U.S. District Court in New Haven. The Justice Dept., acting at the direction of Pres. Johnson, sought the injunction on the ground that the strike imperiled the national safety.

A hearing was set for Apr. 25 on the government's request for an 80-day strike ban under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The union struck when its contract expired at midnight Apr. 15. There was no full shift scheduled to work before the morning of Apr. 17, but production was not resumed until the 3 p.m. shift.

Major issues, according to Pres. Russell Booth of Local 1010, are wages, supplemental unemployment benefits, and improvements in pension, welfare and insurance coverage.

Booth accused the company of attempting to use the Taft-Hartley Act against the union and said it had rejected the local's offer to begin discussion of the issues 45 days before the contract expired.

He also charged the firm with building up resentment against it among union members by filing unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board. In addition, he charged, it distributed leaflets among the employes listing the names, addresses and telephone number of union negotiating committee members and urging the workers to bring pressure on them for a speedy settlement.

Assisting the negotiators, who scheduled morning and afternoon meetings beginning Apr. 18, was the fact-finding panel the President had named and which had reported that a halt in production would interfere seriously with the war effort.

Its members are the Rev. Leo C. Brown, S.J., from the Cambridge Center for Social Studies, Cambridge, Mass.; Prof. Clyde W. Summers of Yale Law School and James C. Hill, Huntington, N.Y., arbitrator.

Bricklayers Get Grants To Train Needy Youths

A total of 470 low income youths in three states will receive on-the-job training in masonry skills as a result of agreements between the Bricklayers and the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

The trainees are expected to continue through three years of apprenticeship after completing their preliminary instruction.

The largest project is getting under way at Salisbury, N.C., and calls for 12 weeks of training with building contractors all over the state for 250 bricklayers, 15 stone masons and 35 tile setters. They will start at $1.75 an hour for the first 10 weeks, paid by the employers, and after 12 weeks will become formal apprentices with starting rates of $2 per hour.

The Labor Dept. has earmarked $110,700 in Manpower Development & Training Act funds for the project. The training will be offered primarily to Neighborhood Youth Corps graduates and to holders of high school diplomas who have completed masonry courses in vocational schools. The state has about 130 masonry courses in vocational schools with 3,500 students, 65 percent from minority groups.

In Georgia, the union's state conference is sponsoring a project for Macon which will give 18 weeks of apprentice-entry training to 110 prospective bricklayers, 15 plasterers, 10 terrazzo workers, 10 tile setters and five marble masons. More than $74,680 in MDTA funds has been allocated.

In Binghamton, N.Y., the union's Local 42 has initiated a training program for 20 bricklayer apprentices who will receive $2.65 per hour for 14 weeks of on-the-job instruction. The Associated Building Contractors of the Triple Cities is cooperating.

The Credit Jungle

AS FAR BACK as 1960, then-Sen. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois introduced a truth-in-lending bill in the 86th Congress. He kept trying in the next three Congresses, but the bill never emerged from the Senate Banking & Currency Committee. Now Sen. William Proxmire of Wisconsin has taken up the fight anew.

Bankers, small loan companies, retail merchants and their various trade associations have violently opposed truth-in-lending from the beginning.

They have called it an attempt to hamstring private enterprise. They have described it as move toward federal regulation of interest rates and credit charges. They have pleaded that it would be impossible to administer, because salesmen and sales clerks couldn't compute the finance charges they are asking the customer to pay.

These arguments are nonsense.

Truth-in-lending imposes only two conditions on credit establishments and money-lenders. It would require them to tell their customers the total amount they are paying for credit:

- In dollars and cents.
- As an annual percentage rate on the loan or credit involved.

This is not regulation; it is simply disclosure. It does not tell anyone how much he can or should charge for credit; it merely makes him tell how much it is.

A lender or credit house that is unwilling to do this must feel that it has something to hide. This, of course, is the point.

The credit houses and the loan companies know to the third decimal point exactly how much they charge for credit and at what annual rate. They have to know; it's how they make their money. They could provide their personnel with little tables—like the sales tax tables that perch on so many cash-registers—that would give instant answers.

THE WORST SUFFERERS from excessive credit charges are those who can least afford them—the lower income groups. They have less cash, and greedy sellers can more easily exploit their need for credit. In addition, members of minority groups are often charged higher rates regardless of their personal credit standing.

But these are not the only victims. The well-to-do are also duped. The true rate of interest on one of the more popular college tuition loans was found to range from 26 to 54 percent a year.

Servicemen are among the favorite targets, too. The Defense Dept. has sought to rescue them with a truth-in-lending directive of its own, requiring lenders to disclose finance charges and actual charges and actual interest rates in transactions with men in uniform.

Truth-in-lending can become law only if the people—the consumers and the borrowers—speak louder than the lenders.

Write to your senators and your congressman and demand action on Proxmire's bill, S-5. Tell them about your own experiences, and those of your neighbors, in the jungle world of credit.

Tyler Cites Response to Change:

Analysis of 'Labor Revolution' Sees New Era of Union Growth

"The Labor Revolution" by Gus Tyler, Viking Press, 625 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y. Published 1967. 279 pages. $6.50.

WHY HASN'T the trade union movement curled up and died in accord with the prophecies from the left, or choked the life out of the American economy as predicted by the right? Basically because neither group understands the dynamics of the trade union movement, where it came from and where it is going.

That understanding is presented with incisive brilliance in Gus Tyler's new book, "The Labor Revolution," a benchmark in the recent literature about unions and "must" reading for trade unionists and those who comment on or teach about the labor movement.

In 279 crisply written, well-researched pages, Tyler—assistant president of the Intl. Ladies' Garment Workers Union and director of the ILGWU's Dept. of Politics, Education & Training—weighs and dispatches as irrelevant and uninformed the prophets of the left and right.

He concisely but comprehensively sets out a history of organized labor in America and, in one chapter, "Leviticus: The Laws of the Movement," lays out the whys and wherefores of trade unions, the motivations and dynamics of their operations and their memberships.

Chapters on automation, labor's economic program, the resurgence of collective bargaining, the labor force, the "new labor movement" (portions of which were published in the September 1966 Federationist) civil rights, labor and politics and the internal politics of the labor movement make Tyler's case: that a labor revolution is in the making and that the trade union movement is embarking on a new era of growth and importance, the third in this century.

He describes the dynamics of labor's future in these terms: "Statistically, union membership is on the rise . . . automation is not abolishing the labor force . . . politically, the labor movement today shows greater strength and expertise than ever and remains the mass base of a liberal-labor coalition in America . . . the American labor movement has shown not only its capacity to survive adversity—the Taft-Hartley Act, and Landrum-Griffin Act, state 'right-to-work' laws—but the further capacity for renewal and growth."

The present revolution in labor is a "response to a changing society," Tyler writes.

"Basically, the unions are responding to a new economy that is creating a new kind of workforce. But this is not the only factor underlying the change in labor's personality. The movement is responding to the increased politicalization of the American people; it is responding to the metropolitan ferment; it is responding to the awakening of the Negro and to the remaking of the South. It is responding to the challenges of the second half of the Twentieth Century and is doing so through the attitudes of a changing membership and leadership."

He contends that the labor revolution has been progressing without public notice because many of the commentators on the labor movement "have either grown so far away from the unions as to have lost sensitive contact with current developments or are so immersed in recording and reinterpreting the past as to have lost interest in the future."

THE TRADE UNION MOVEMENT as an intrinsic part of the fabric of American society pervades Tyler's book from the discussion of collective bargaining to the formulation of economic policy and programs to handle the challenge of automation. He sees its growing involvement in political life to assure continuing democratization of the political process and to provide a growing base for a progressive coalition.

By his analysis, the labor movement is entering its third great modern epoch with its strength based on the "new" unionists of the white collar and service trades. He marshalls facts and figures to demonstrate the growth, the changes, benchmarks that chart the new era. And from these he projects a new course that is rooted in the same trade unionism from which the very first American union sprang.

To those in the trade union movement whose commitment is rooted in the basics of which Tyler writes, his book will come as a loud, clear reaffirmation. To those spoonfed on intellectual frustrations and ill-informed commentary, it will take on the nature of a revelation.

Morgan Says:

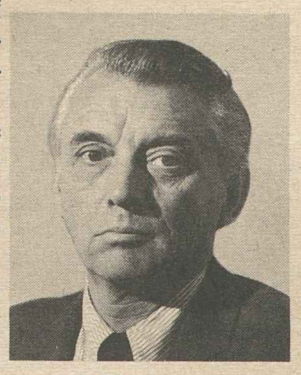
AIFLD's Successful Latin Aid Provokes Communist Sabotage

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

PUNTA DEL ESTE—The Kremlin already knows all about it, so it is not exactly breaking security to reveal that U.S. labor leaders are infiltrating Latin America.

Their mission, with a boost from American industry and the U.S. government, is to show the working class south of the border how to organize strong, free non-Communist trade unions. The headway they are making is modest but exciting and important enough for the Communist Party of Uruguay to put high on its agenda the sabotaging of the American Institute for Free Labor Development through which this "infiltration" is being conducted. So far this Communist priority has failed.



Morgan

The AIFLD is a kind of pocket-sized foreign aid program mixing in some Peace Corps techniques, but building bargaining strength for laborers, instead of barns and water systems for farmers or bringing plumbing to city slums. It was Pres. Joseph Beirne of the Communication Workers who was credited with the idea of having U.S. trade unionists share their organizational know-how with other unions of the hemisphere. The AIFLD is the result.

It now has projects going in at least 17 nations. Some are so modest they go unnoticed —$500, for example, to teach women in Chile how to use sewing machines; $5,000 for a worker's medical center in the inland industrial city of Cordoba, Argentina; a $2,200 loan to help Brazilian chemical workers build a union hall in Rio de Janeiro, and so on.

The money comes from the AFL-CIO, its individual unions, from such U.S. businesses with interests in Latin America as the Grace Steamship Line, and Intl. Telephone & Telegraph, and from the U.S. government. Harold Geneen, head of ITT, was so impressed with the philosophical sales talk for the project by labor's George Meany, who is also AIFLD's president, that he doubled ITT's contribution.

The industrialists aren't involved with projects in the field. That work is done by trained American union men themselves; men like Charles Wheeler of the Communications Workers and Gene Meakins of the Newspaper Guild in Argentina and Robert Wholey of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Uruguay.

Naturally these personnel, their families, and their institute projects are the targets of furious propaganda blasts by Communist organizations. In the wake of the Central Intelligence Agency's unhappy undercover ties with student groups, foundations and individual labor unions, including the Guild in past operations, the AIFLD inevitably is accused of being a CIA front as well.

Institute officials both here and in Washington stoutly deny this is true, though they make no secret of their close collaboration with U.S. embassy and foreign aid officials. Everybody being human, this collaboration is somewhat uneven.

The institute has something neither the government nor business can furnish—working men who can talk the same language as the obrero in Latin America. No matter whether the former doesn't speak Spanish or the latter doesn't speak English, interpreters are available. And there is a kind of intangible interpreter, so to speak, built into the contact—the feeling on the part of the Latin American worker that here is somebody who really understands his problems.

Here something of the person-to-person esprit of the Peace Corps begins to percolate. In addition to field projects, the AIFLD finances tours to the United States for non-Communist union men to attend seminars about union organization.

THINGS ARE never easy and they are sometimes rugged. Here in Uruguay, where the Communists control 80 percent of the organized workers, thugs have beaten up rank-and-filers who have dared to accept help from the institute. Communists drivers of a bus line in Montevideo refuse to pick up workers if they spot them carrying AIFLD briefing kits.

But the Communists in Latin America actually have less power than they are often given credit for. Though they do control the unions in Uruguay, they don't in Argentina, and paradoxically the former Peronista unions there, those elevated to power by the deposed Dictator Juan Peron, are working in reasonable cooperation with AIFLD field men.

The institute tries to exercise care so the money, modest though the appropriations usually are, is not wasted. The AFL-CIO has underwritten some housing projects in both Argentina and Uruguay, not to mention other countries, amounting to millions of dollars in investment. But work has not gone forward because governments or unions or both in these Argentine and Uruguay projects have not met the requirements stipulated in the loans.

One project has gone through—a $350 AFL-CIO donation to the transport workers of Uruguay for a typewriter and a filing cabinet. A mimeograph machine may come next and, who knows, there may be some anti-Communist propaganda to follow.

Haggerty Declares:

Site Picketing Bill Would End Unfair Contractors' Advantage

SAFE AND DECENT working conditions for construction workers, as well as fair rates of pay, are at stake in the situs picketing bill now pending in Congress, a top union official declared in a network radio interview.

The 16-year ban against multi-employer building-site picketing protects subcontractors who maintain substandard conditions and substandard wage rates, giving them "an advantage over union subcontractors," said Pres. Cornelius J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

"We want to equalize the conditions in the industry for all the participants—both the employers and the union people involved," Haggerty said. His statements came during Labor News Conference, broadcast each Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Almost certain passage of a similar measure was blocked in the last session of Congress when Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), then chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, refused to call it up for floor action, he said.

The bill "was on its way," Haggerty said. "It had cleared the committees on the House side and was on the calendar for action. We had plenty of votes to pass it in the House, and I feel sure the same was true in the Senate." But Powell's "unprecedented act" stopped it from coming to a vote, he said.

HAGGERTY SAID that even though several House members "sympathetic to our cause on the situs picketing bill" were defeated in the last election, "we think we still have enough votes" to pass the measure in the present Congress.

He said the proposal has support on both sides of the aisle in Congress and is backed by the Johnson Administration, as it was by those of Presidents Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy.

Reporters questioning Haggerty on the AFL-CIO produced program were Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press, and Alan Adams, Washington correspondent for Business Week magazine.

J. P. STEVENS & CO. is the second largest textile corporation in the United States. It employs more than 40,000 workers in North and South Carolina alone and it clearly has become the spearhead of the obvious determination of the southern textile industry to prevent unionization of its plants.

Certainly it has become the dramatic symbol of an intolerable situation—that of giant corporations repeatedly found in violation of the nation's labor-management laws yet in receipt of huge government contracts and, ironically, of government aid in the training of workers to take, at least in part, the jobs of men and women illegally fired for union activities.

The Stevens case is rapidly becoming a cause celebre in American labor-management relations. The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on Pres. Johnson to bring an end to the granting of defense contracts to corporations which are in gross violation of the law—notably Stevens.

The Labor Dept. is reconsidering a $54,000 allocation under the Manpower Training & Development Act to Stevens to train 117 workers in seven textile occupations.

Here is the Stevens story in outline:

Round One: In 1963, the Textile Workers Union of America and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. began a concerted drive to organize Stevens workers in 20 of its North and South Carolina mills. Union supporters were fired en masse; union complaints were filed with the National Labor Relations Board; a trial examiner found that 69 workers had been fired illegally; the board itself found the company guilty and raised the number of illegally discharged employes to 71. The board accused the corporation of "massive and deliberate" unfair labor practices and ordered Stevens to take appropriate corrective action including restoration of the fired workers to their jobs. The company appealed; the case is now before the U. S. Court of Appeals in New York City.

Round Two: While the first case was going on, workers who had testified for the union were fired. New complaints were issued; the trial examiner found Stevens guilty of illegally discharging another 19 workers; his decision accused the company of a determination to "destroy the union root and branch by discharging its most active members;" the full NLRB again agreed. Stevens again ran to the courts.

Round Three: While the second case was going on, new firings took place. There were complaints in two of them, the usual hearings and a trial examiner's decision that excoriated the company even more sharply than in the first two cases. Boyd Leedom, chairman of the NLRB in the Eisenhower Administration, was especially shocked at what he called the deliberate "perversion of justice" and obvious perjury of company officials in denying that Stevens workers had been fired for their union activities.

Round Four: Firing continued and complaints were made in a number of new cases; hearings on these complaints were held in January of this year and Trial Examiner Thomas A. Ricci found the corporation guilty in three new firings.

Round Five: This round hasn't quite reached the active complaint stage, but the TWUA reports that "charges are beginning to accumulate" for new complaints.

THE QUESTION that arises, of course, is how can powerful corporations be forced to obey the National Labor Relations Act? Leedom posed this question when in his decision he observed:

"It begins to appear doubtful if any remedy legitimately devised within the framework of the Labor Management Relation Act will right the wrongs of an employer who persists in violations in the way the respondent (Stevens) has persisted."

One way, of course, would be for Congress to put teeth into the National Labor Relations Act so as to prevent perversions of labor justice such as the 11-year Kohler case and now the four-year Stevens case which apparently has no end in sight.

PASSAGE OF the on-site picketing bill would help promote safe working conditions as well as fair pay rates for construction workers, AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty (center) told Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine on the AFL-CIO produced radio interview, Labor News Conference, heard weekly on Mutual.

BUILDING TRADES UNIONS called for a practical "brick and mortar" approach to the rebuilding of America's slum-ridden cities in testimony before a Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.). At the witness table, from left, are: Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Peter Fosco of the Laborers; Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty; Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters and Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers.

To Protect Jobs:

High Court Upholds Contract Prefab Ban

The Supreme Court has ruled that collective bargaining agreements protecting workers at a jobsite from use of prefabricated materials are legal and that union workers have the right to boycott the use of such materials.

The court ruled in two cases by 5 to 4 margins that "before we may say that Congress meant to strike from workers' hands the economic weapons traditionally used against their employers' efforts to abolish their jobs, that meaning should plainly appear. . . ."

Legislative history, the majority opinion said, does not show that Congress intended to outlaw agreements designed to preserve work for employes of a primary employer.

The decisions covered two cases, the first a dispute between the Carpenters and the Philadelphia General Contractors Association and the second between the Asbestos Workers and the Houston Insulation Contractors Association. The first case involved the use of prefabricated doors on a housing project, the second the use of off-site precut materials for insulating pipes.

Justice William J. Brennan, writing for the majority in both cases, said that the national labor law gives unions and management wide latitude to negotiate their differences and that Congress "had no thought of prohibiting agreements directed to work preservation." Arguments against such agreements should be addressed to Congress, Brennan wrote. "It may be that the time has come for re-evaluation of the basic content of collective bargaining," he added, "but that is for Congress."

Brennan was joined in the majority by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Abe Fortas, Byron R. White and John M. Harlan. Justice Peter Stewart for the minority, including Justices Hugo L. Black, William O. Douglas and Tom C. Clark, said national labor law condemns agreements under which an employer agrees to refrain from handling products of another manufacturer and that the Philadelphia and Houston contracts were illegal. The dissent added that the court majority has "substituted its own notions of sound labor policy for the words of Congress."

In both cases the union, under terms of the agreements, directed its members not to hang the prefabricated doors or to install the precut insulating materials.

The National Labor Relations Board had upheld the right of the Carpenters in Philadelphia to refuse to install the prefitted doors under their contract. The U.S. Seventh Court of Appeals reversed the board and ruled the action violated the "hot cargo" Landrum-Griffin amendments to the NLRA. The top court reversed that finding and supported the board's position.

Youth Centers Aid 2 Million Job Seekers

The U.S. Employment Service's Youth Opportunity Centers served about 2 million young people during their first two years of operation, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced in marking the program's second anniversary.

Wirtz described the centers as separate employment offices serving those 16 to 21 years of age. They were set up, he said, to give young job-seekers "a clearly designated source of services tailored to their individual needs at a convenient location."

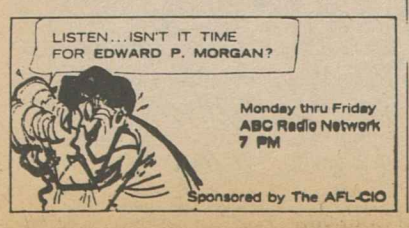
The original 12 centers of 1965 have grown to 166 in major cities in each of the 50 states, with five more scheduled to be opened soon, the report showed. They are accessible to about half of the country's youth.

Wirtz said specially-trained job counselors and advisors at the centers have:

- Placed 468,000 young people in jobs.
- Helped more than 10,000 youths return to high school.
- Referred 118,800 applicants to the Neighborhood Youth Corps on work assignments and referred 24,700 to the Job Corps.
- Obtained entrance to apprenticeship training for more than 11,000 young people under the Manpower Development & Training Act.
- Provided 71,000 youth with on-the-job and classroom training.
- Counseled 529,611 young men and women and administered aptitude tests to about 500,000.

An important element in the program, Wirtz said, is "outreach to the disadvantaged," with special youth advisers and community workers hunting in slum areas for young people who need help, explaining the program to them and helping eliminate any suspicions they might have.

The basic aim is to increase employability once young people have been reached, and to help them get jobs. The centers cooperate with government programs and other community agencies, and refer their clients to vocational training, work-training programs, and medical and other services when needed.



Building Trades Pledge Aid in Rebuilding Cities

Building trades unions told Congress that rehabilitation of slum housing is the nation's "most important and urgent" domestic problem and pledged full cooperation to a "brick and mortar" approach to getting the job done.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., joined by top officers of affiliated unions, said the construction industry can come up with the "practical technology and highly efficient procedures" to do the job.

The building trades leaders testified before a Government Operations subcommittee headed by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.).

They told the Senate panel that both unions and contractors are constantly seeking and finding better building techniques, materials and tools.

"We invite you to go on any construction job that we man," Haggerty said, "and see for yourself how we are doing it faster, better and cheaper than last year or 10 years ago."

He told the senators that union money is financing "a costly study" of prefabrication and new techniques in building. Unions have also hired outside consultants "to determine if we are training enough young men in the construction field."

He warned the committee, however, that there is no short-cut way "to build houses at half price" or to create "massive job opportunities for the urban poor, unskilled and disadvantaged."

The "hard reality," he stressed, is that rehabilitation of housing "requires more skill—not less skill—than building new homes."

The union spokesmen stressed their organizations' "absolutely sincere" efforts to bring in Negroes who can qualify for apprenticeship programs. Two main stumbling blocks, they indicated, have been continued high unemployment in the construction industry, which has kept down the number of available jobs, and educational inadequacies, which have brought a high drop-out rate in training programs.

Haggerty called for a more practical approach by government agencies to housing needs, and suggested that incentives to private builders and policies to raise incomes so that more people could afford better housing would bring the quickest results.

Baltimore Tugmen Win Guaranteed Workweek

Baltimore—Harbor tugmen returned to work with a benefit they had stayed on strike for six months and two days to win—a guaranteed workweek—and other contract improvements.

Crews of 18 tugboats and 32 other harbor vessels ratified a new three-year agreement at a meeting of the Inland Boatmen's Union, affiliated with the Seafarers. Union negotiators then signed the pact in the Baltimore office of Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew (R), whose efforts to end the long tieup were called "very helpful" by SIU Vice Pres. Robert A. Matthews, national director of the boatmen's union.

Three tugboat companies serving ocean-going vessels in this major port agreed to these terms:

- A guaranteed five-day work week, Monday through Friday, for 15 crews, and a guaranteed four-day week for six crews.
- Wage increases of 5 percent each year in base pay, retroactive to Oct. 1, 1966, and compounded annually thereafter.
- Tight seniority rules, with all promotions, transfers and layoffs subject to a grievance procedure with arbitration as the final step.
- Company contributions into the pension and welfare fund rising from $2.25 a day to $2.44, and possibly to $3 if fund trustees find more financing needed.
- Triple time for work assigned to begin after the 12th hour of work in a stretch, and for crews called out between midnight and 2 a.m.

The contract also gives tugboatmen three more paid holidays for a new total of 12, double time and a half for work on a holiday, premium pay for out-of-harbor jobs, overtime to be paid in 30-minute increments, and a meal allowance of $3 if supplies are insufficient on trips out of the harbor.

Tug crews had walked out Oct. 12 after failing to win work guarantees in contract negotiations with the Curtis Bay Towing Co., Baltimore Towing & Lighterage Co., and the Baker-Whitley Towing Co.

"Before this strike," Matthews said, "the men were actually on a day-to-day shapeup. The companies could lay them off without any notice at all. There'll be no more of that under this contract."

The workweek guarantee is a "major breakthrough" in tugboat contracts, according to the SIU official.

Labor Calls on Congress to Provide Full Financing for Social Programs

He called on the subcommittee "to meet its responsibilities to the future" so that "our children will bless our foresight" rather than "curse our folly."

The AFL-CIO submitted a detailed series of recommendations on the Labor Dept. and HEW budgets, but Biemiller stressed particularly the need for funds to enforce the new minimum wage law.

He warned that even if the Administration's full budget request is granted, wage-hour inspection will fall off from present levels. It would take 33 years to inspect every firm covered by the law, he declared.

Biemiller reiterated the AFL-CIO's position that "improving the minimum wage and broadening its coverage is the best and cheapest anti-poverty program." He added: "To enact such a law and then to deny its promise by limiting its effective enforcement is utterly shortsighted."

The federation strongly supports HEW's request for more money for civil rights compliance activity, Biemiller said. And he expressed labor's "deep concern" that budget requests for federal aid to elementary and secondary schools are more than $1.68 billion less than the amounts authorized by Congress.

$1,000 a Class

He warned that the withholding of needed funds "will severely damage state and local programs now under way or just getting out of the planning stages" and amounts to "an average cut of $1,000 for each classroom in America."

He also protested the "false economy" of curtailment of vocational education funds—with the 1968 money request $43.6 million less than the authorization.

College construction funds and particularly college work-study appropriations should be financed at levels previously authorized by Congress, Biemiller urged.

He asked the subcommittee to go beyond the Administration's budget request for occupational health programs and "to direct the surgeon-general to carry this program forward vigorously, without delay, and in full cooperation with the Dept. of Labor."

Summing up, Biemiller declared: "We reiterate our conviction that the American economy can provide the foundation for both continued social progress at home and an honorable settlement of the war in Viet Nam. The rising expectations, aroused by government programs in the past several years, must not be undermined by blocking the expansion of efforts to meet the needs of our growing population."

Labor Assails 'Statistical Curtain':

Truth-in-Lending Bill Urged To Beat Credit 'Flim-Flam'

their charges cannot stand disclosure."

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), sponsor of the 1967 truth-in-lending bill and chairman of the subcommittee considering it, called Douglas as the first witness.

The white-haired former senator said he was "deeply disappointed" that the legislation hadn't been enacted during his tenure, but was glad to come back "from the politically dead" to speak for it.

Opposition to the bill, Douglas suggested, stems from fear that disclosure of credit costs would force lenders charging high interest rates to lower their charges. That would be fine, Douglas said. A 1 percent drop in average interest on consumer debt would save American families about 1 billion a year—which would then be used to buy more products.

"It has been an economic fact of life," Douglas added, "that despite lip service to free enterprise, almost no business likes to compete in terms of price."

Treasury Under Sec. Joseph W. Barr stressed the Administration's support of the Proxmire bill, which he termed "realistic, practicable and workable."

As to complaints that it would be too complicated for retailers to figure the annual interest rate on credit charges, Barr said the Treasury Dept. has worked out a single table that business firms could readily use.

Leslie V. Dix, acting executive director of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests, testified on behalf of Betty Furness, who will take office May 1 as Pres. Johnson's consumer adviser.

Leaflet Describes Remedy of 'Truth'

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet describes in simple language the credit traps that face the consumer and explains the simple remedy of the truth-in-lending bill.

It includes the names of the members of the Senate Banking & Currency Committee, who will decide whether to clear the legislation for vote.

The pamphlet is free. The title is "Truth in Lending: What It Means to You." It can be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlets Division, 815 Sixteenth Street, NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

As evidence that legislation is workable and helpful, the statement cited the enactment of a truth-in-lending law by Massachusetts last year and the Defense Dept. requirement that lenders dealing with servicemen make full disclosure of interest costs.

Dix told the subcommittee of a bank that advertised 5 percent interest on its deposits—and claimed to finance car purchases at 5 percent interest.

"Quite obviously," he said, "no bank could pay a depositor 5 percent on deposits and then lend money at the same rate."

Johnson Quoted

Dix quoted Pres. Johnson's appeal to Congress to supersede "the antiquated legal doctrine" of "let the buyer beware" with a new policy, "let the seller make full disclosure."

Not all the testimony was in favor of the bill. A spokesman for a trade association of small loan and finance companies argued that the field was one for state rather than federal action. "We fail to see how passage of a federal law of any kind is going to cause the consumer to use any different common sense than he has been using all along," he declared.

The purpose of the bill, Biemiller retorted in his testimony, "is not to save fools from their folly; its purpose is to protect the prudent from duplicity."

He cited as examples of the "indecipherable statistics" of the credit market a loan company's rate of 3 percent a month on the first $150; 2.5 percent on the next $150, and 1 percent a month on the remainder to $1,000.

One bank may offer a $7 per $100 per year "add-on" rate, while another offers a loan at a 7 percent "discount."

Biemiller cited a survey showing that borrowers who knew the true interest rate of their loans paid an average of 12.1 percent on loans under $500, while those who didn't paid an average of 37 percent.

The time has come, he urged, to pass the legislation "so that the clear light of truth can illuminate credit transactions."

"WHAT'S WRONG with it?" AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said labor has been asking that question of opponents of truth-in-lending legislation ever since 1960 and "we have yet to hear anything approaching a persuasive answer." With Biemiller at Senate hearings on the bill is Anne Draper of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Labor Asks Expansion Of Economics Education

The quality of economic education in American schools is "rather poor," the AFL-CIO told Congress in urging wider federal support of institutes for teachers and curriculum development in the field of economics.

Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger of the federation's Dept. of Research expressed labor's views before the Subcommittee on Economic Progress of the Joint Economic Committee.

"Despite its essential importance in this final third of the 20th Century—and despite the efforts of some educators and economists—the current state of economic education in our school systems is far from good," Goldfinger declared.

An increased number of students in the nation's school systems are being reached by economics courses or by economics content in social studies courses, he said, but the percentage of students reached is still quite small and "the quality of economic education is still rather poor."

Goldfinger praised the work of the Joint Council on Economic Education, which has been promoting both the quantity and quality of economic education since its founding in 1948. He stressed the JCEE's structure, noting it represents business, labor and farm groups as well as educators. And, he emphasized, the educators are responsible for directing the programs.

He pointed out the JCEE, in upgrading the economics training of teachers and preparing and recommending materials, "has helped to curb the inundation of our school systems with propaganda, indiscriminately presented as fact or as authoritative views."

It is labor's firm conviction, Goldfinger declared, that economics can and should be taught objectively—with ample and adequate description of alternative and opposing views. Interest groups should be able to present their views, but the educational responsibility must rest with educators, he added.

However, he said, there is backsliding at the state and local level and a heavy emphasis on business views occurs, despite JCEE principles.

He told the subcommittee of the findings of Prof. Will Scoggins in his study of textbooks used in Los Angeles high schools. Scoggins flunked the textbooks on their bias and omissions in dealing with organized labor and the world of work.

Goldfinger said the teaching of economics must include "a willingness to face controversial issues and to handle them with fairness and balance."

'Mythology' Inherited

"The study of the real economic world and its institutions . . . seems to me to be a proper function of the elementary and secondary schools," he continued. "Up to now, there has been too little of such emphasis—with resultant ignorance, bias and reliance on inherited mythology."

He urged an expansion of federal support of teacher institutes and curriculum development and said teachers of social studies should be required to take at least one college course in economics. Economics courses should be included in high school curricula, he added, and federal programs might encourage the teaching of economics.

Federal funds also should be made available for studies of the effectiveness, meaningfulness, objectivity and relevance of current public school courses in economics and social sciences, he said.

AFL-CIO Wins Reversal Of Hatch Act Discipline

The AFL-CIO won a test case involving the political rights of federal employes when the government agreed to pay a New Hampshire postal worker for the 30 days he was suspended for alleged violation of the Hatch Act.

Justice Dept. attorneys shied away from a major court battle on the issue by not contesting the AFL-CIO case. A consent judgment in the U.S. Court of Claims orders full payment of $674.62 in lost wages to Robert E. Hobart of Concord, N.H., a member of the Postal Clerks who serves on a part-time basis as secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO.

As part of his duties for the state labor federation, Hobart in the summer of 1964 sent copies of Group Research Report to a federation mailing list. Group Research keeps tabs on extremist organizations and the issue in question included a report on right-wing activity at the Republican national convention.

The Civil Service Commission ruled, 3-0, last August that Hobart had violated the Hatch Act by taking "an active part in a political campaign" and suspended him without pay for 30 days.

The AFL-CIO sharply challenged the action in a suit filed on Hobart's behalf by Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel.

The suit denied that Hobart's action violated the Hatch Act and termed the Civil Service Commission suspension "arbitrary and capricious." Furthermore, the AFL-CIO brief contended, if the Hatch Act did in fact prohibit such actions, the law would be unconstitutional.

Harris expressed regret that the government's decision to concede the case avoided a court ruling which might have dealt with "the basic citizenship rights of federal employes."

He said the Civil Service Commission has at times been "unduly rigid" in discouraging federal employes from exercising their constitutional rights. Harris said he hoped the bipartisan commission established by Congress last year to review the Hatch Act will recommend legislation "to liberalize and clarify" the law.

High Court to Review Job Rights of Strikers

The Supreme Court has agreed to review a lower court decision denying returning strikers the right to be rehired before new employes are given jobs.

In seeking review of a ruling overturning a decision by the National Labor Relations Board, the NLRB general counsel said the issue was of "critical importance" in settling disputes over the right of strikers to reinstatement. An adverse decision, he argued would open the door to refusal by any employer to rehire striking employes.

The appeal was from a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that Fleetwood Trailer Co., Inc., did not violate the Taft-Hartley Act when it hired new employes before taking back six members of the Carpenters after a 1964 strike at the house trailer firm's plant in Riverside, Calif.

Management claimed the six jobs had been abolished and no jobs were available when the strikers applied for reinstatement on Aug. 20, 1964. Between Oct. 8 and Oct. 16 that year the firm had hired six new employes and passed over the strikers in doing so. The union men were not rehired until December 1964.

An NLRB examiner, and later the board itself, upheld a union charge that the company's actions violated the strikers' rights under the act. Two of three appeals judges refused to enforce a board order against the company, stating "on the basis of the board's own policy as stated in Brown & Root, Inc. (1961), we hold that whether or not a vacancy exists must be determined at the time the strikers apply for work after the strike."

Tested by the Brown & Root standard, the record is "devoid of evidence that the jobs of the six complaining strikers were still available . . . when they applied for reinstatement," two judges agreed. The third judge dissented, saying "no other persons had replaced the striking workers" and "their jobs had not been abolished."

Right to Strike 'Precious'

"The right to strike is a precious right," Judge Walter Ely wrote in his dissent. "It is too often the workman's only weapon and his only shield against oppression."

The majority opinion, which Ely said was the result of "misapplying" previous rulings he called not pertinent, can have no other effect, he declared, "than to intimidate those who believe themselves . . . economically aggrieved, especially those who, for long tenure, have earned valuable benefits which they should not be required to expose to new risks."

In another case, the Supreme Court refused to review lower court decisions in suits by orchestra leaders against the Musicians. The action upholds rulings by a U.S. District Court judge in 1964, affirmed by the 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York City, against the band leaders' claims for $400,000 in fees and expenses.

Painters Appoint Training Director

The Painters named William A. Duval of San Jose, Calif., as director of apprentice training, succeeding the late Carl Griffin, who died recently.

Duval has been a teacher of trade training and faculty member at San Jose City College. He served also as secretary of his union's statewide apprenticeship and training committee, and consultant for the California State Division of Apprenticeship Standards. An Army veteran, he joined San Jose Painters Local 1288 in 1947 and later was elected business representative, a member of the Painters District Council and an officer of the county Building & Construction Trades Council.

Labor-Backed Plan at Stake:

Senate in New Fight Over Election Fund

The financing of presidential election campaigns hung in the balance as the Senate struggled with a tax bill loaded with unrelated amendments.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate was trying to extricate itself from a parliamentary deadlock.

At issue was whether the Senate would vote to repeal the campaign financing law it enacted last year to free major party candidates from reliance on wealthy contributors representing special interests.

The labor-backed law allows each taxpayer to indicate whether he wants $1 of his federal income tax to go into a fund to be used to pay the costs of presidential campaigns.

Opponents at one stage mustered a 48-42 majority for tacking an amendment repealing the campaign financing law to the unrelated House-passed bill restoring the 7 percent investment tax credit for business firms.

A week later, second thoughts prevailed and the Senate adopted another amendment to the tax bill which in effect continued the campaign financing law, with modifications designed to take care of some of the objections that had been raised in debate. The vote on this action was 46-42.

During the intervening week, a flood of other unrelated amendments had been tacked onto the bill, including a tax credit for college tuition expenses, an optional 60-year retirement age with reduced pension under social security, and restrictions of meat imports.

After apparently undoing its earlier action, the Senate found itself facing a new battle when Majority Leader Mike Mansfield announced he would move to send the bill back to the Finance Committee with instructions to knock out all amendments except one—an amendment repealing the presidential campaign financing law as of July 31. Mansfield said his motion would also instruct the committee to draw up a new campaign financing law for Senate consideration within six weeks.

Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.), sponsor of the original campaign financing bill and leader of the fight against its repeal, sharply protested Mansfield's proposal and warned he would filibuster against it.

Still uncertain through the weeks of debate and maneuvering, is the attitude of House conferees who would have to meet with a Senate committee to consider any changes in the House-passed investment tax bill.

As for the tax bill itself, the Senate hadn't gotten around to debating it as yet.

A high-priority labor bill, to allow on-site picketing by building trades unions, passed its first hurdle in the House.

It was referred by a subcommittee to the full House Education & Labor Committee.

The subcommittee passed up the bill "without recommendation" and the full committee is scheduled to begin consideration at its Apr. 25 meeting.

Hearings on pay raises for federal employes were scheduled to start in the House on Apr. 25, touching off a major effort by postal and other federal unions to improve the Administration bill.

The Administration has proposed a 4.5 percent raise as a step towards comparability with pay scales in private industry.

The unions, which have scheduled a series of pay raise rallies in Washington, are asking full comparability now.

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY panel questions AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on the American labor movement and collective bargaining. An audience of 600 students filled the auditorium and had a chance to join in the 90-minute program designed "to bring the issues and leaders of the country to the campus."

Meany Mourns Adenauer, Will Attend Funeral

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed labor's deep sorrow at the death of Konrad Adenauer and made plans to attend the funeral of the former German chancellor.

He sent a message of "sincerest condolences" to the Adenauer family and to "the entire German people."

His message, sent through Pres. Ludwig Rosenberg of the German Federation of Trade Unions described Adenauer as the "preeminent architect of the rebirth of German democracy and pioneer of the Federal German Republic's firm alliance with the western community of free nations."

Speaking "as one who was privileged to cooperate with this great patriot and dedicated champion of human dignity during critical postwar hours," Meany termed Adenauer's death a "grave loss not only to the German people who are still denied national reunification in freedom, but also to men and women everywhere who love liberty and loathe all dictatorships."

The two men had become personal friends over the years, stemming from American labor's early assistance in the rebuilding of a democratic trade union movement in postwar Germany.

The chancellor visited the AFL-CIO headquarters during trips to the United States and in 1959 bestowed his nation's Cross of Merit with star and ribbon on Meany for "assistance to mitigate the misery of the German people in the postwar period and to build a free and democratic Germany."

Pres. Johnson and other world leaders planned to attend the memorial services and funeral for Adenauer.

Johnson said the American people "will never forget" Adenauer's "lifelong opposition to tyranny in any form."

Machinists Hit Airline Failure To Honor Pact

New York—If there's a strike on National Airlines, air travelers will have had plenty of warning from the union.

The Machinists, in a full page advertisement in the New York Times, explained the issue to the public—the failure of National to pay the cost of increased insurance premiums.

The airlines agreed, after last year's mechanic's strike, to contract language barring an increase in premiums to employes. But after the workers returned to their jobs, National's representatives said that health and welfare provisions of the contract would not apply to National, according to the IAM.

In the interim, premiums increased by $6.08 a month for dependency coverage. National refuses to pay and the union is taking the case to arbitration under the Railway Labor Act. When this contract expires, warns the IAM in the ad, National Airlines will owe each employe $6.08 a month plus 6 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967. Until payment is made no further agreements will be signed, the union said.

our workers than any other system."

Meany said labor didn't oppose trade with Soviet Russia if "it is done in the good old-fashioned Yankee horse-trading manner." Long-term credits, he suggested, should be matched by something in return, such as tearing down the Berlin Wall.

He politely declined to agree that skilled workers shouldn't be making so much money. "They're worth it," he declared. "I never knew a union yet that priced itself out of the market."

Defends Wage Floor

In a sharp retort, Meany tore into the argument that the minimum wage increased unemployment.

From the first 25-cents-an-hour minimum to the present, he told the students, employer groups have argued that a higher minimum wage would drive firms out of business and increase unemployment. In practice, he said, whenever the wage floor is raised the nation has become more prosperous.

He discussed frankly some of the problems of the labor movement. "We haven't scratched the surface" in white collar organizing, he acknowledged. And one of the "problems of success" in raising workers' living standards is that it is hard to get members with automobiles and television sets to attend union meetings as faithfully as an early generation of workers did. But when there's trouble, such as the possibility of a strike, "they turn out," he observed.

Meany stressed the difference between voluntary arbitration, which labor supports, and compulsory arbitration, which is "bad for workers, bad for employers" and dangerous for the nation.

He acknowledged continuing problems of discrimination within some of the 60,000 local unions, but reported on the significant "progress" and the strong efforts made by AFL-CIO affiliates and the federation itself.

And the AFL-CIO president told the students how dues paid by union electricians, auto workers and machinists are financing the continuing campaign to bring decent wages and working conditions to farm workers in California and Texas. He mentioned the pioneering contracts which have been negotiated and stressed that the uphill organizing effort has forced the big factory farms to raise their wages in an effort to keep the union out.

At one point, Meany expressed bafflement at a questioner who suggested that anti-trust laws could be applied against unions without hurting workers.

How can you hurt unions without hurting workers, Meany asked? "Unions are workers. You can't separate the two."

Labor Backs Bill to Ban Wiretapping ging be permitted in criminal investigations.

There has been "massive police wiretapping" in New York, where it is permitted by state law, Harris noted, but evidence of its value is "not persuasive."

Even assuming," he added, "that wiretapping does have substantial utility in police work, we are of the view that, in general, the preservation of individual freedom should have priority."

Earlier in the hearings, Attorney Gen. Ramsey Clark told the subcommittee that the bill's strict regulations on wiretapping would not impede efforts to wipe out organized crime.

Clark said the bill should be passed because "nothing so mocks privacy as the wiretap and electronic surveillance." He termed bugging "incompatible with a free society and justified only when that society must protect itself from those who seek to destroy it."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its Feburary meeting said the Administration proposals "are fully in accord with the position long taken by the AFL-CIO."

Labor Strongly Backs Public TV Plan

Need Cited For Choice To Viewers

A non-commercial television and radio enterprise should be set up by the federal government to present programs for "public interest rather than private profit," the AFL-CIO declared in testimony at Senate hearings.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said Americans should be able to see and hear programs "that are selling nothing but their own content; programs that can experiment, that can innovate, without fear that one bad guess will cause an angry sponsor to put them off the air."

He gave labor's "unqualified support" to the Administration bill establishing an independent television and radio corporation. It would be supported in part by federal funds, but would be completely free of government control.

The airwaves, Biemiller stressed, belong "to all the people of the United States."

Even if commercial broadcasters devoted more of their programming to public interest, "there would be need for another approach" to assure program diversity, he said.

Viewers and listeners, he said, are entitled to "a wider choice than commercial television can reasonably be expected to offer."

Choice Wanted

Biemiller made it clear that labor is not seeking to supplant commercial television which is giving "millions of citizens . . . what they want."

But there is an unmet need, he stressed, for "programs that will enrich as well as amuse, edify as well as entertain."

This alternative to commercial television, he emphasized, should not be government-controlled television, which would "offer a choice only between Big Business and Big Brother."

The public board administering the federal and privately-contributed funds, Biemiller said, should include a representative from the labor movement, the "largest single group of viewers and listeners in the nation."

He said the Administration bill would be "a worthy companion . . . to the splendid series of educational measures enacted by Congress during the last several years."

His testimony before the communications subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee stressed that the educational role the AFL-CIO envisions for non-commercial television goes well beyond "instructional television" used as a teaching supplement.

He saw it undertaking programs keyed above commercial television's

39 Plants Of 3 Firms Shut Down

Akron, O. — Strikes against three of the Big 4 rubber companies moved into their second week as 50,000 members of the Rubber Workers picketed 39 plants in 36 cities for wage improvements and job protection.

The struck firms are Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal, formerly the U.S. Rubber Co. Only the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. continued to operate on a day-to-day basis, with union and management striving to reach agreement and avoid extending the strike by militant URW members.

Fruitless Talks

The union reported members at a Goodyear hose plant in North Chicago, Ill., walked off their jobs in a sympathy strike and to show their dissatisfaction over five weeks of fruitless bargaining.

URW Pres. Peter Bommarito charged that the Big 4 plus General Tire Co. had provoked the walkouts through a mutual aid pact that he called a "conspiracy that goes to the point of trying to undermine good-faith bargaining."

Under terms disclosed recently, any struck company will get help from those that have not been struck.

Bommarito said the companies "refused to approach the bargaining table realistically and with a sincere purpose to negotiate a fair and reasonable settlement."

The URW is seeking a "substantial" wage increase and a Full

Unions Charge Carrier Holdout:

Congress Weighs Rail Action As New Strike Date Looms

Congress was moving to forestall a scheduled national railroad strike, as shopcraft unions and rail management remained apart on the terms of an agreement.

Members of both the Senate Labor Committee and the House Commerce Committee made clear their intent to support emergency legislation barring a work stoppage. The key question was what form the legislation would take.

Rail management called openly—in newspaper advertisements—for compulsory arbitration.

A number of committee members from both parties indicated their choice would be government seizure of the railroads, to keep them operating while the parties continued to seek to bargain on the issues.

The strike deadline set by the six cooperating shopcraft unions, affiliates of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., is May 3.

Teachers Post Big Wins In Washington, Detroit

Emphatic election victories were scored by two locals of the American Federation of Teachers. In Washington, D.C., Local 6 won exclusive bargaining rights for 6,727 public school teachers, and in Detroit, Local 231 overwhelmed a challenge of its right to represent 11,500 teachers.

Both elections were won by the affiliates over units of the National Education Association.

In Washington, the Teachers Union got 3,540 votes to 2,119 for the D.C. Education Assn., with 74 voting for no representation. The election, conducted at 95 schools and other polling places, was called by the Board of Education to settle the disputed issue of bargaining rights between the union and non-union groups. It was the first such vote in the history of District schools, which have 193,000 pupils.

The union's choice by 61.7 percent of teachers voting means "a major change in District schools," said Local 6 Pres. William Simons. The day after the election union representatives met with Supt. Carl F. Hansen to arrange for bargaining meetings and a first contract, to take effect Sept. 1.

The local said it has a list of 200 proposed improvements it wants to discuss, including higher wages, class sizes, teacher aides, pensions, more adequate buildings, classroom supplies and equipment.

The D.C. school budget must be approved by Congress and teachers long have complained of repeated slashes in funds for new buildings and sites and teaching needs.

Simons said the union will ask the DCEA group to nominate three of its members to serve on the negotiating committee because "we want the best brains and ideas of all the teachers because we are now the official representative of them all."

In Detroit, Local 231 got 6,410 votes to 3,709 for the Detroit Education Association. The union's vote total was 62 percent, up 3 percent over that of the last previous election, in 1964. After the results were certified by the Michigan Labor Mediation Board, negotiations

Welfare Study Explodes Myth of Heavy Cheating

A government study has exploded the myth that large numbers of able-bodied men are on the welfare rolls when they could be working.

The fact is that only 50,000 of the 7.3 million persons receiving federal welfare benefits—about one out of 145—are able to work or capable of being trained for work.

The big majority are the elderly, disabled and children.

Joseph A. Califano, Jr., a special assistant to Pres. Johnson, disclosed the findings in a speech to a journalism honor fraternity.

Purpose of the study, he said, was "to answer a very simple question: How many persons capable of working are on welfare?"

Some, he noted, have claimed "many millions." But the analysis actually showed that of the 7.3 million welfare beneficiaries:

- "2.1 million, mostly women, are 65 or over, with a median age of 72.
- "700,000 are either blind or

House Unit Clears Site Picketing Bill

The House Labor Committee voted to approve the on-site picketing bill, after rejecting a Republican substitute which would have imposed new restrictions on building trades unions as the price of restoring their right to picket construction sites.

Committee endorsement of the bill, by a decisive voice vote, moved the legislation to the Rules Committee and set the stage for a showdown battle on the House floor later in the session..

The bill, a key goal of the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept., would amend the Taft-Hartley Act to specify that picketing a subcontractor at a multi-

Court Imposes 80-Day Bar To Avco Strike

New Haven, Conn. — The 10-day restraining order that halted a strike by 4,800 striking members of Auto Workers Local 1010 at the Lycoming Division of the Avco Corp. has been extended to the full 80 days under the Taft-Hartley Act by Judge William H. Timbers in U. S. District Court here.

Timbers, who handed down the temporary order, extended it on the basis of a statement by Deputy Defense Sec. Cyrus R. Vance that a strike would halt the production of helicopter engines and parts "essential to the national defense and security . . . particularly in connection with combat operations in Southeast Asia."

The 80-day period begins Apr. 17. The order also covers UAW Local 376, whose 500 clerical and laboratory worker members had threatened to walk out.

UAW Gen. Counsel Stephen I. Schlossberg, representing Local 1010, said the union had no legal opposition to the curb because the law is "certainly clear," but declared "we certainly object morally and philosophically.

"Why should a company be allowed to lag behind the wages paid elsewhere in the industry," he demanded, "and then hide under the umbrella of national defense?"

Avco's hourly wage rate averages $2.85, he said, or 55 cents less than in other major defense plants.

Union members walked out when their contract expired Apr. 15. The Justice Dept. got its 10-day temporary injunction and Pres. Johnson named a fact-finding panel. Members are the Rev. Leo C. Brown, S.J., of the Cambridge, Mass., Center for Social Studies; Prof. Clyde W. Summers of Yale University Law School and James C. Hill, Huntington, N.Y., arbiter.

Consumer Prices Rise, Wholesale Index Drops

The Consumer Price Index continued its upward climb in March by rising two-tenths of 1 percent to 115, the Labor Dept's Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Increases in household furnishings, gasoline, used cars, apparel and services more than offset a two-tenths of 1 percent drop in food — about half that expected from seasonal factors alone.

However, the BLS Wholesale Price Index declined three-tenths of 1 percent and incomplete figures for April indicate a further drop of four-tenths of 1 percent. This would bring the level slightly below that of March 1966 for the first over-the-year drop since August 1964.

In a third report, the BLS said net spendable earnings increased about 75 cents over the month to $99.30 for a factory worker with three dependents and to $91.42 for a single worker. The rise was the first this year. It was attributed to a 1-cent advance in average hourly earnings to an all-time high of $2.79, and a rise of two-tenths of an hour in the average workweek.

Over the year, single workers were getting 91 cents a week more and those with three dependents 96 cents more. The relatively small rise was due to a cut of more than an hour in the average workweek and an increase in the social security tax.

Net spendable earnings are what a worker has left after deductions for federal income taxes and social security.

"Real" spendable earnings—the buying power of take-home pay after allowance for changes in the cost of living index—increased about 50 cents to $79.50 for the single worker and $86.35 for the worker with three dependents.

Wage Comparison

The new figures compare with $80.35 in January 1967 and $80.81 in March 1966 for the single worker, and to $87.25 in January and $87.80 a year ago for the worker with three dependents.

A BLS analysis showed that in the first quarter of this year real spendable earnings averaged 1.5 percent less than in the same period of last year because of higher prices, shorter workweeks and the social security tax increase.

The CPI factors that showed increases over the month again were led by medical care services, which rose nine-tenths of 1 percent. Housekeeping and home maintenance costs increased seven-tenths of 1 percent, and personal care four-tenths of 1 percent. A slight decline was registered in mortgage interest rates.

The CPI has jumped 2.7 percent in the past year, the BLS said, with an advance of more than 5 percent in average charges for consumer services accounting for nearly two-thirds of the rise. Medical care services have gone up 9 percent since March 1966.

The change in the CPI since December will yield cost-of-living wage increases of 1 cent an hour to about 60,000 workers, most of them in the aircraft and transportation industries, the BLS reported.

Fire Fighters' Awards Honor 13 Newsmen

The Fire Fighters have announced 13 newspaper, television and radio winners of the union's second annual awards program for the best representation of the "dramatic and frequently hazardous work" of professional firemen.

Cash prizes of $500 will be awarded by union officials in each locality to the following first place winners:

- Paul Gauvin, New Bedford, Mass., Standard-Times, for a feature story telling how fire companies respond to an alarm within 40 seconds.
- John Sherlock, Syracuse, N.Y., Herald American, news photography award for a picture of a fireman carrying a child from a burning building while giving him oxygen.
- Station CBUT-TV of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., Vancouver, B.C., and producer Keith Christie for a 30-minute television documentary showing the simulated rescue of an injured man from a fast-flowing river.

Second prize winners, who will receive $250 each, are Robert Alden of the New York Times for a story on the death of 12 fire fighters Oct. 18, 1966; Joseph Young III, Indianapolis, Ind., News for a photo titled "Reflections of Fire Fighters;" Station WTAE-TV, Pittsburgh, Pa., and staff member Les Banos for a program about a heroic rescue of a fireman by his fellow fire fighters.

Winners of honorable mentions are Nancy Sharp of the Syracuse Herald-American for a story on the training of firemen; William L. Seiter of the Detroit News for a photo captioned "The Heat's Still On;" TV Station WCBS, New York, for news reports on the fire that killed 12 uniformed men; Radio Station WELI, New Haven, Conn., and News Editor William O'Sullivan for an editorial on the hazards of fire fighting.

Special citations: an advertisement by IAFF Local 338 in the Elkhart, Ind., daily Truth; a photo titled "He Plays It Cool at a Hot Spot" by Boris Spremo in the Toronto, Ont., Daily Star; a telecast by WGN-TV, Chicago, produced and directed by Richard Neville, on the need for improved financing of the Chicago Fire Dept.

IAFF Pres. William D. Buck said the annual program is meant to show appreciation for the work of news media and to improve public understanding of the "training, hazards and hard, punishing work" of those who prevent and suppress fires.

Three judges chose the winning entries—Alan E. Adams of Business Week magazine; AFL-CIO Dir. of Public Relations Albert J. Zack, and Managing Editor Warren Y. Kimball of Firemen, published by the National Fire Protection Association.

U.S. Farm Population Continues Sharp Drop

The nation's farm population has been dropping at the rate of about 5 percent a year since 1960 and on Apr. 1, 1966, stood at 11,595,000 persons — about 4 million fewer than on Apr. 1, 1960, according to the Bureau of the Census.

For Wages, Job Protection:

Rubber Strike Solid In Second Week

Employment Earnings Program (FEEP)—its version of a guaranteed annual wage or salaried status —that would give laid-off workers 92.5 percent of their regular wages.

But Bommarito said the issues that caused the triple strikes Apr. 20 are not all economic.

He said FEEP would cost only two cents an hour over the present five-cents-an-hour cost of the supplemental unemployment benefits program that gives laid-off workers 65 percent of their regular wages plus dependents' allowances.

"The major rubber companies paid in excess of $15 million for incentive bonuses to selected key executive personnel in 1966," Bommarito noted. "However," he said, "the dignity of the worker at his machine in his everyday work is of primary importance in every collective bargaining relationship."

He said extensive misapplication of contract provisions over the past two years by the companies has created dissension, distrust and unrest among URW members.

"It is absolutely necessary," he declared, "that the local unions of the URW and the Big 4 have workable relationships that will protect the job rights of the man in the shop."

Bommarito said the companies have simply not considered the skilled trades problem in the rubber industry. They must realize the shortage of craftsmen and the widespread discontent in their ranks, he suggested, but have not seen fit to do anything about it.

Similar wage inequities exist among workers paid on an hourly basis and these problems also must be recognized by the companies in present negotiations, Bommarito declared. He also accused the companies of attempting to divide URW members by proposing different wage standards for those in tire plants and those in non-tire producing factories. The URW president charged the companies with double-talk on the historic tandem relationship with auto adjustments when it suited their convenience but now, when the Rubber Workers seek to use the same formula "they refuse to budge," he said.

He pointed out that in 1961, 1963, and 1965 the companies pleaded that they could not give URW members more than workers in the auto industry. Now, he said, they refuse to match the pattern of Auto Workers' cost of living adjustments which in 1966 hit 13 cents an hour.

"The major rubber companies don't claim poverty," Bommarito observed. "They simply refuse to follow the same formula this year which they have followed for 20 years."

Talks Resumed

Negotiations with the three struck companies were suspended for five days but URW policy committees returned to the tables Apr. 26 with Firestone in Cleveland, Goodrich in Columbus and Uniroyal in Cincinnati. In Akron, Firestone lawyers went to court seeking an injunction to limit URW pickets to two at each gate. The company alleged mass picketing and entrance blocking, but police had no reports of unruly action or incidents on the picket lines.

From UAW delegates at a bargaining convention in Detroit the striking URW members received a pledge of financial support and extra pickets if they are needed.

The company-wide strikes are the first for the URW since 1965 when the Uniroyal chain was shut down for six days. The last time three companies were struck was in 1959 when the same three were closed—Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal.

Gleason Sees 'New Day' For Vietnamese Labor

Saigon, Viet Nam—The Vietnamese people, "building a nation in freedom and . . . a better country under fire," are on the threshold of a new day, Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen told the fifth national convention of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) here.

Gleason was the AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to the convention and carried with him the greetings of Pres. George Meany and the federation's membership. Earlier he had visited Viet Nam three times at the behest of the Agency for Intl. Development to help speed the flow of war materiel through that nation's overtaxed ports.

He hailed Viet Nam's new democratic constitution as a landmark of progress, but pointed out that "no document by itself, no matter how noble its ideals, can guarantee democracy or social justice."

"It is people who count most and, in the last resort, people count even more than the best programs," he declared.

"You now have an opportunity to build free democratic institutions like free trade unions of the workers on the land, in the factories and in the offices. The worker on the land and the worker in the factory or the office are all brothers. They are seeking the right to live in peace and freedom, to bring up their families, educate their children, improve their standards of living and worship as they choose.

"You can count on our help in your endeavor to achieve these great goals."

Gleason voiced the admiration and respect of freedom-loving people throughout the world for the devotion of the Vietnamese people to democracy. He cited the recent local elections and noted that no Communist terrorists, kidnapers or arsonists could prevent the people from exercising their right to vote.

Free Elections

"And these were free elections," he emphasized, "not in the style of Hanoi, not in the lineup of Peiping, not in the frauds masquerading as elections in the Soviet 'paradise.' You have a choice. Whether it be in free elections or the right to strike, you have a choice. Remember, there is one right above all others—the right to freedom of choice, which no dictatorship ever gives to the people, to the workers, to the peasants."

Gleason assured the delegates that the AFL-CIO, like the American people as a whole, "will work with you and will fight alongside you to assure your right to build a free and prosperous democracy."

Wage Hike Tops List:

UAW Parley Sets '67 Contract Goals

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—Delegates representing 1.6 million U.S. and Canadian members of the Auto Workers took two days to debate a collective bargaining program for 1967 negotiations with the auto industry, then adopted it by show of hands with less than 10 dissenting votes.

The program, departing in only two minor respects from the recommendations of the executive board and a convention committee, gave top priority to a "substantial wage and salary increase for all" and strong emphasis to 20 other contract objectives including wage parity for Canadian workers, a guaranteed annual wage patterned on that of office workers and company officials, "equal pay" for skilled trades workers, and improved working conditions.

Delegates from more than 1,000 local unions of production, skilled trades, technical, professional and office employes voted unanimously to support the current strike of 50,000 members of the Rubber Workers and passed the hat for striking farm workers.

Resolutions for changes in the bargaining program submitted by two UAW locals were defeated by margins of more than 95 percent. Ford Local 1250 proposed a 35-hour workweek resolution, and Fisher Body Local 45 offered a retirement-at-55 resolution with no reduction in benefits. Both locals are in the Cleveland, O., region.

Broad Goals

The convention supported a request by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther that union bargaining committees be given broad general goals rather than mandates for specific objectives like the 35-hour week or a spelled-out wage proposal.

On wages, the report adopted by the convention noted that wage and salary income lags behind property income "such as dividends, interest and profits." The average rate of return of the motor vehicle and equipment industry, it pointed out, was higher than the average for all other manufacturing corporations combined in 19 of the past 20 years.

"Both as a matter of equity for workers and their families, and as a necessity for the nation's economy," the report declared, "it is essential that the UAW in 1967 make a maximum contribution" toward establishing "a healthier balance in the distribution of our national income through the winning of substantial wage increases for all its members."

The program makes these other points:

- There must be "no tampering" with the cost of living wage escalator nor the improvement-factor wage increases except to improve them.
- Elimination of the wage differential between American and Canadian auto workers will be a primary goal this year. While auto makers pay their Canadian workers less than in the U. S., they charge Canadian buyers higher prices for Canadian-made and U. S.-made cars.
- The "degrading" hourly-wage system has outlived its time. The union is determined to end it and "replace it with an annual income guarantee or contract of employment."
- Corporations must end the "double standard" of lower wage rates for skilled tradesmen than for workers hired by "outside" contractors to do essentially similar work.

The convention program also calls for better supplemental unemployment benefits, improved pensions, gains for white collar workers and employes of small shops, higher pension benefits for retirees, full health-care services, better vacation and holiday provisions, an end to overtime abuses, and the right to strike when legitimate grievances over production standards are not "fairly resolved."

The delegates approved a change in the UAW constitution to allow the union's executive board to "alter the union's relationship" with the AFL-CIO "in any way it deems appropriate."

'Massive' Educational Effort Urged To Combat Poverty in Mississippi

Jackson, Miss.—Mississippi needs a "massive" adult education program as well as an expanded Head Start for young children in order to break the poverty cycle, State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay told a Senate fact-finding committee.

"Many thousands of people have been pushed off the farms and plantations in recent years by mechanization of farm equipment," Ramsay said. "Even though jobs are available, these people are unemployable because most of them have no education."

Only a large-scale federal effort can end poverty "as a way of life" in the state, Ramsay stressed. "Mississippi simply does not have the necessary resources" to do the job itself.

Ramsay spoke to the four members of the Senate subcommittee on Employment, Manpower & Poverty who came to Mississippi as part of a first-hand investigation of the nation's anti-poverty programs—chairman Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Senators Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.), Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and George Murphy (R-Calif.)

Mississippi repealed its compulsory school attendance law in 1956—and in 1964 53.9 percent of its young people failed the Armed Forces Qualification Test. Ramsay noted also that only 28.5 percent of youngsters who enroll in high school stay until graduation,

Half Illiterate

He found a direct relationship between statistics showing that nearly half the state's population is functionally illiterate and that more than one third of the population doesn't earn enough money "to purchase the necessities of life."

"We in the AFL-CIO have done our best to help initiate adult education and training programs throughout the state," Ramsay said, and "the doors to opportunity have been opened to several thousand of our unfortunate citizens."

He stressed, however, that "the surface has only been scratched" and the need is for a federally-financed "massive program."

Praising the Head Start program for young children as a "vehicle to break the vicious circle of poverty enslavement," Ramsay urged the senators to "visit and listen to the experiences" of people who for the first time have been given "hope" that their children will be able to escape from poverty.

Mistakes have been made in many of the anti-poverty programs, but progress has been made, too, Ramsay observed.

The most important byproduct of these programs, he suggested, has been "bringing whites and blacks to the conference table where they could discuss problems of mutual interest." He added:

"To me it would be a real tragedy if these programs were to be abandoned, just when we appeared to be making significant progress."

Congress Weighs Action To Bar Rail Shutdown

partment, told the Senate Labor Committee at an April 24 hearing that the railroads have "refused to engage in meaningful collective bargaining."

He charged that management's goal is to get Congress "to take away our right to strike" through a compulsory arbitration law.

The strong likelihood of congressional action, he said, has encouraged management to hold out against union contract proposals.

A special three-member presidential mediation panel contended that its recommendations—rejected by both sides—presented a basis for settlement. It would provide a 6 percent general increase in an 18-month contract, with three 5-cent raises over the contract period for skilled workers.

Pres. Johnson, in making public the report, said a strike would have "tragic consequences" and asked both sides to weigh its impact "against the narrow issues" that separate them.

Fox praised the panel's efforts, but stressed that the unions had already come down considerably on their original proposals and the skilled shopmen are "grossly underpaid," with pay scales lagging 50 cents an hour and more behind other industries.

The unions involved—the Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen, and Firemen & Oilers—"are not strike-happy," Fox said.

"We have not had a national strike in 45 years. But it takes two to negotiate. Unfortunately, the railroads have not yet begun serious negotiations with us."

Fox told the committee that "a railroad strike need not be a disaster to the nation."

He pledged that "if we are allowed to strike, we will make every arrangement possible to see that all necessary shipments—either for the military or essential to the nation's health—continue to move."

There still need not be a strike, he declared. "The prime need is for railroad management to bargain seriously with us—and give up their goal of trying to use us as Judas goats to lead you to destroy the right to strike."

Earlier Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Transportation Sec. Alan S. Boyd said in a joint statement: "The ugly fact is that collective bargaining has fallen flat on its face" in the dispute.

Deadline Near

All of the cooling off and mediation procedures of the Railway Labor Act have been exhausted in the dispute and Congress has already passed legislation postponing strike action 20 days. That extension expires May 3.

The unions' last proposal suggested a two-year contract with a 6.5 percent general pay raise plus a 12.5 cent inequity raise for skilled workers the first year, and 5 percent plus another 12.5 cents the second year.

After the Senate Labor Committee session, the two parties met for a final effort at direct bargaining, but the talks broke off after management would go no farther than a 6 percent raise over 18 months, a single 5-cent skill inequity boost and a further job study.

Teachers Post Big Wins In Washington, Detroit

that had been suspended for the balloting were resumed.

Mrs. Mary Ellen Riordan, president of the Detroit local called the vote a "clear mandate that teachers believe we are making progress and want the union to keep on representing them."

Negotiators scheduled two meetings in April and two more in May, with management counter-proposals expected May 9.

Pay Raises Asked

The DFT is asking the School Board for pay increases averaging $1,700 a year across the board, two weeks' paid vacation, a reduction in the size of classes, and a shortening in the school year from 40 weeks to the big-city average of 38.

Other union objectives in a written contract include longevity payments of $150 a year after 15 years of Detroit school service, $300 after 20 years, $450 after 25; a greater voice in the selection of textbooks and supplementary teaching materials; more substitute teachers, "professional service days" for home visits and attendance at professional meetings; board-paid tuition for further college training in areas of severe shortages; and free tuition for elementary pupils who fail a grade and must attend summer classes.

No organization had bargaining rights until 1964, when the union got 5,739 votes to the DEA's 3,848 to win recognition as the voice of the Teachers' Representation Committee.

The state law was amended in 1965 to permit an exclusive bargaining agent, and the board recognized the union as the teachers' choice.

The union won its first written contract Dec. 8, 1965, and a renewal contract July 1, 1966. That latter contract expires next July 1, by which time the union hopes it will have given way to a new pact, Mrs. Riordan said.

Two Major Areas Show Job Gains

Asheville, N.C., and Memphis, Tenn., moved in March from the moderate to the low unemployment category for the first time since the classification system was inaugurated in 1955, for 150 major man power centers. The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Employment Security said the improved employment picture in the two communities raised to 61—the number of major areas reporting less than 3 percent of the work force jobless. 3,100 Workers At Canada GE Win Pay Hikes

Toronto, Ont. — Wage increases ranging up to 87.6 cents an hour over three years have been won by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in four months of bargaining with the Canadian General Electric Co.

Covered by the agreement are more than 1,700 workers in plants in Toronto, Peterborough, Cobourg and Oakville, all in Ontario, who voted 72 percent in favor of ratification.

Two weeks earlier, 1.400 IUE members at CGE plants in Montreal accepted a similar contract that brought their rates closer to the higher Ontario scales. The settlement was reached after a four-day strike.

IUE officials said that details of new wage and salary scales varied between plants but that the settlements mean average increases of about 24 percent over the three years.

At Peterborough, they said, engineering and laboratory assistants paid on a salary basis will be getting $35 a week more by 1969. Raises for hourly-rated employes go up by as much as 87.6 cents over the same period.

Other gains include improved vacations, pensions and security, a cost-of-living escalator plan and paid half-day holidays on the eves of Christmas and New Year's Day.

OEO to Train Unionists As Local Action Leaders

About 150 New England union members will be trained in all forms of community action program development under a new federal anti-poverty project.

Dir. Sargent Shriver of the Office of Economic Opportunity announced a grant of $287,766 to the Labor Relations & Research Center of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which is sponsoring the community leadership training project in cooperation with the AFL-CIO in New England. The trainees will be nominated by central bodies in the six-state region.

The plan calls for periodic residential training and consultation for the trainees over a one-year period, with particular emphasis on urban poverty programs. The trainees, in turn, will conduct workshops in their home communities.

Directing the program will be Ben B. Seligman, professor of economics at the university and director of the Labor Relations & Research Center.

Labor Board Dismisses Band Leader's Charge

The National Labor Relation Board has dismissed a charge by an orchestra leader that a Musicians' local raised minimum wage scales and established a welfare fund for orchestra "sidemen" without giving the leader a chance to bargain on contract terms for the players he hires for single engagements.

A three-member panel of the NLRB upheld a ruling by Trial Examiner Paul Bisgyer that Musicians Local 802 in New York did not commit the unfair labor practices charged by leader Ben Cutler. The complaint alleged that the union refused to bargain after one meeting and notified Cutler that its members would not play for him during "one night stands" or single engagements unless he agreed to pay the new rates and contribute $1 per employe per engagement into the Local 802 welfare fund.

The union's right to withhold the services of its members except on payment of the new scales "can hardly be questioned," the examiner ruled. Union negotiators did meet with Cutler and it was only the latter's failure to submit further proposals that prevented further bargaining, he wrote.

The charge against Local 802 was one of a long series of actions brought by orchestra leaders in the courts and before the NLRB to test the lawfulness of union rules. AFM Pres. Herman Kenin said the NLRB action "represents another rebuff for the few orchestra leaders and former members" engaged in a "campaign of harassment" against the union. The disputants have lost every round to date, he added.

Murray-Green Award:

Dr. Sabin Honored For Polio Vaccine

New York—The AFL-CIO's community service committees played an important role in immunizing millions of Americans against the crippling polio virus, Dr. Albert B. Sabin said in accepting labor's annual Murray-Green award for outstanding service to humanity as developer of the Sabin anti-polio vaccine.

Distribution of the vaccine was one of the "most remarkable demonstrations of community service and organization" ever brought into use and "many of you were an important part of this," the Cincinnati research scientist told the 12th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services at its closing banquet here. (Photos on facing page.)

The award was presented by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, who called Sabin a "great benefactor of humanity and an outstanding citizen." Beirne is president of the Communications Workers.

The Murray-Green award is given annually to outstanding individuals and organizations whose achievements in health and welfare have inspired others to work for the common good. Established by the federation's Executive Council in 1956, it memorializes Philip Murray, late president of the former CIO, and William Green, late president of the former AFL.

Beirne told an audience of 750 at Hotel Commodore that Sabin flew from Europe to New York for the ceremony and planned to fly back the next day. In presenting the Murray-Green medallion and a $5,000 award to Dr. Sabin "as a token of the profound gratitude of the members of the AFL-CIO for contributions to their health and welfare," Beirne said the award recipients "have honored us by allowing us to honor them."

Sabin and the other winners "have not come for the medal or the check," Beirne said, because "as humanitarians themselves, they recognize the AFL-CIO as essentially a humanitarian movement."

The ultimate objective of the labor movement is to "end human suffering by giving full reality" to the "inalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," he told the award audience.

Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities introduced Beirne and presided over general sessions at the four-day conference attended by 500 delegates and staff members. Closing sessions featured Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey, wife of the Vice President and member of the President's Committee on Mental Retardation; Harold F. O'Keefe of the Food & Drug Administration's Bureau of Medicine, and Dr. Howard A. Rusk, director of New York University's Institute of Rehabilitation Medicine.

'Health Care For All'

The conference heard Perlis call for a "comprehensive program of quality health care for all" and heard reports of current problems and developments in mental health, alcoholism and medicare. After the general sessions, delegates split into smaller discussion groups at 10 workshops a day on these topics: community action against alcoholism, community mental health facilities, and implementing medicare.

At one conference session, Vice Pres. Richard Strunsky of the Intl. Labor Press Association presented ILPA contest awards to the first place winner, the Community Services Newsletter, Fort Wayne, Ind., and honorable mention recipients, Labor's Community Report, San Francisco, and Community Services Activities, Elkhart, Ind.

Mrs. Humphrey expressed her "enormous admiration" for the accomplishments of AFL-CIO Community Services committee members. She noted that nearly 6 million Americans are mentally retarded, and said retardation can be prevented at birth by a "simple medical procedure." The states that do not require testing should move to do so, she advised.

Welfare Study Explodes Myth of Heavy Cheating

so severely handicapped that their work potential, if any, is extremely limited.

- "3.5 million are children whose parents cannot support them.
- "The remaining 1 million are the parents of those children: about 900,000 mothers and 150,000 fathers.

"Two-thirds of the 150,000 fathers on welfare are incapacitated. Only some 50,000 are capable of being given job skills and training that will make them self-sufficient."

Califano cited the analysis as the first step in a four-stage procedure the Johnson Administration is using to identify problems and develop solutions.

The study, he said, raises the problem of how to reach and motivate this group of 50,000 employable fathers to make them self-sufficient. It also raises the question of whether special child-care centers and training programs would help mothers move off the welfare rolls, along with the issue of whether it is desirable to take mothers away from small children.

"Perhaps most important," he said, "we must determine whether past mistakes put almost 1 million mothers and 3.5 million children on welfare—and correct these mistakes."

With the problem defined, Califano added, alternative means of overcoming them must be developed and evaluated so that the President can choose the solution which will bring the greatest benefits in relation to costs.

In developing a "total approach" to the nation's problems, Califano said, "we cannot content ourselves with putting new legislation on the books. We must constantly ask what we are trying to do and whether we are doing it well enough."

He cited as examples efforts to find the answers to questions such as these:

"While one out of every six college students is now receiving federal aid, how many potential college students have not even been identified?

"While Head Start is reaching a half-million preschoolers, how many other needy children have not yet felt the excitement of learning?

"While the overall unemployment rate is down to 3.6 percent, how do we reach the 12 percent of our teenage Americans who were without jobs in 1966?"

The test of government, Califano suggested, "is its capacity to respond to the needs of the people it serves."

May Day Pledge Issued by ORIT

The May Day message to workers in the hemisphere from the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) pledged a continuing struggle for better contracts, higher wages and improved conditions.

The message, signed by Pres. Alfonso Sanchez Madariaga and Sec.-Gen. Arturo Jauregui H., noted that since the first May Day observance in 1886, in the Western Hemisphere "trade unionism has been strengthened everywhere, claiming with ever stronger energy an active participation in the orientation and direction of the economic and social affairs of the modern world."

But poverty and injustice "still sadden the lives of millions of human beings in vast regions," it continued, and labor will continue the effort to eradicate them.

Reiser Re-Elected By Glass Workers

Columbus, O. — The Glass & Ceramic Workers returned Pres. Ralph Reiser to office for his sixth term and Sec.-Treas. Lewis McCracken for his 14th in an election by members. All six district presidents also were re-elected.

First Vice Pres. H. Wayne Jarman beat challenger Henry J. Augistine of Ford City, Pa. Second Vice Pres. Enoch R. Rust will face challenger Everett Lee Kanatzar of Cincinnati, O., in a runoff election May 9.

Shriver Spurs Unions to Step Up Sponsorship of Poverty Projects

Baton Rouge, La.—An appeal for expansion of union-sponsored programs in the war against poverty was voiced by Dir. Sargent Shriver of the Office of Economic Opportunity in a major address at the 12th convention of the Louisiana AFL-CIO.

The convention, traditionally attended by leaders from all sectors of society, was the largest in the central body's history with 5,229 persons registered—503 more than last year. Local unions and area councils sent 904 delegates.

Shriver hailed the labor movement for its support of the fight to wipe out poverty. He particularly commended its direct involvement in many phases of the Job Corps, VISTA Volunteers, job training and community action programs.

He cited the AFL-CIO's historic recognition of the similarity between the goals of organized labor and of the OEO and warmly praised the strong statement of support the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted at its February meeting.

"I would like to add my voice to that of the Executive Council in urging more direct union participation," Shriver said. "We would like to have every union member in the country visit local Job Corps centers. We need your advice and counsel as we prepare the Job Corps for the world of work. We would like to see the 'Helping Hand' Job Corps adoption program expanded throughout the nation."

Under the "Helping Hand" program, AFL-CIO central bodies near Job Corps centers send resumes of the skills and training of graduating corpsmen to central bodies in their home towns for help in getting him a job.

"Labor should have a voice and an active role in the development and operation of local anti-poverty programs," Shriver declared. "Where labor is a significant part of the community, its selected representative should serve on the local community action board."

The convention adopted a resolution strongly endorsing the anti-poverty program and urging affiliates to become active in it.

In a companion resolution, the delegates called on each affiliate—both local unions and local central bodies—to set up committees to spur active support for the national AFL-CIO minimum wage goal of $2 an hour.

Other resolutions backed the Johnson Administration's policies in Viet Nam and its proposals for improved social security benefits. The convention also called for a broad program of consumer protection and education after an address by Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's outgoing adviser on consumer affairs.

On the state level, the convention approved a demand for a study to develop a new and more logical basis for auto insurance rates.

Other speakers included Gov. John R. McKeithen (D), Sen. Russell B. Long (D), Rep. Hale Boggs (D), Dr. James Goddard, of the Food & Drug Administration; Dr. Bertram Brown, deputy director of the National Institutes for Mental Health, and Malvin R. Good, program director of the ABC news bureau at the United Nations.

Pres. Victor Bussie and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Sr., were re-elected without opposition.

AFL-CIO AWARD for service to humanity climaxed labor's 12th annual Conference on Community Services. Committee Chairman Joseph A. Beirne is shown presiding at banquet honoring Dr. Albert B. Sabin, developer of oral polio vaccine.

CSA Conference: Focus on Health Care

CONFERENCE DELEGATES got reports from 25 speakers including AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan (left), Social Security Administration Deputy Dir. Arthur E. Hess, and Federation CSA Dir. Leo Perlis (right).

MENTAL HEALTH facilities for community care were reported on by Executive Dir. Brian O'Connell of National Association for Mental Health (top). Speaker on labor-management cooperation for mental health was Dr. Maxwell N. Weisman (lower photo), psychiatric services director for Maryland State Mental Hygiene Dept.

MRS. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, wife of the Vice President, got thanks from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Jennings for report to conference delegates as a member of the President's Committee on Mental Retardation.

WORKSHOP SESSIONS like this one, conducted by William Davies, CSA field representative (fifth from right), permitted delegates to ask questions of experts and voice opinions. Subjects included alcoholism, mental health, medicare.

Collective Bargaining

I HAVE NO FEAR that the institution of collective bargaining is going to get to the point where it controls men's lives to their detriment. Now, if the institution of collective bargaining is bringing benefits to workers, and it has, why should they tear it down? Because it doesn't work perfectly in all cases? That's no reason to tear it down, and I have no fear of collective bargaining working to the detriment of the individual worker.

When you look at the American scene—look at the whole American economic picture—and you realize the gigantic corporations that have evolved under our system, their tremendous wealth and their power and so on and so forth, actually it reinforces your belief in collective bargaining as an institution.

Now, it's all right to say in theory that everybody is free. And in theory, the fellow who runs an elevator in the General Motors building in Detroit is free. He's free to bargain with the General Motors Co. for whatever services he gives in return for his salary. But in practice he can't bargain with them unless he joins with other workers and presents a collective front.

That's what collective bargaining means. It means the exercise collectively of the right that each individual has. Each individual has a right to sell his services. He has a right not to work; he has a right to stay home if he wants to; he has a right to quit; he has a right to go on strike. That's a constitutional right. Now what we do here is exercise it collectively.

I have no fear of the institution of collective bargaining getting out of hand. We have a number of instances, more in the last year or two, where the officers of a union would make what they thought was a good settlement and then, when the matter went to the members of the union for a vote, they turned it down. This type of case has cropped up quite frequently in the last few years.

But I have no fear of the institution. If you were to wipe out the institution of collective bargaining, if you were to wipe out unions in this country by law tomorrow, the very minute you wiped them out you would have to turn around and set up something in their place.

The dictator countries proved this. The dictator countries can't stand a free union, because you can't dictate if workers are free, you can't control the means of production. If you are going to dictate, you have got to govern, you have got to rule with an iron hand and you can't rule with an iron hand if workers are free to quit work.

So what do you do? You wipe out unions. But in order to keep the economy moving, you have got to promptly set up something in their place. Hitler set up the so-called Labor Front. Khrushchev told Pres. Kennedy in 1962 that they solved their union problem back in 1921. Kennedy asked how he did that and Khrushchev said, "Well, we shot the union leaders."

But they only shot the union leaders who believed in free unions. They promptly set up in Russia the largest union in the world. They called it a union, but we don't recognize it as a union, the so-called All-Soviet Council of Trade Unions. It controls the lives of the Russian workers. Everybody belongs. There is no problem about organizing; no problem about recruiting members. And everybody is under control. What does that union do? It does nothing in regard to wages and hours. Nothing. What is their business? Their business is to control workers.

I have no fear that we are going to do away with either unions or with collective bargaining.

Putting Down Roots

'Get Out the Vote':

COPE'S '66 Election Analysis Spotlights Labor's Task in '68

The following is excerpted from the Apr. 17, 1967, issue of Memo from COPE, the biweekly publication of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

ONE OF THE IRONIES of 1966 was that widespread defeat of liberals came in a year when COPE performed better than ever. It brought home the lesson—by no means a new one—that COPE, though a significant factor, is but one factor in an election. Labor can never account for more than a minority of votes.

Two major factors helped stem what could have been a more far-reaching electoral defeat:

- COPE was provided with more assistance than ever before from Pres. Meany and the Executive Council to the ranks of state and local central bodies and from the international unions. From all, COPE had more cooperation, more manpower, membership lists for data processing pilot projects and more coordination of campaign contributions. This produced the best organizational effort ever mounted by COPE.
- Planning and organizing for the 1966 elections began early in 1965 and continued through the campaign.

The accomplishments, however, cannot obscure the disturbing problems, the failure of many of our members to vote in spite of our best efforts, and the susceptibility of our own members to racist arguments on civil rights issues.

Both problems can be simply phrased but not easily met. Answers perhaps can be found within the framework of the following known facts:

1. As the average age of the population decreases, so does the average age of union members.

In the next five years, 26 million new voters between the ages of 21 and 23 will be added to the electorate. As new voters, they will have no historical memory of Franklin Roosevelt, the depression or World War II. Many of them will be new union members.

2. More and more, our white members, with the rest of the white population, will live in suburbs.

Between 1960 and 1965 the white population in all cities, large and small, dropped by more than 250,000. Given the normal growth of a stable population, it should have increased by 4.5 million. Instead, these and more joined the people moving from rural areas and young people starting new families to swell the suburban population by 9.25 million over the same five-year period.

Our organizational structure is traditionally based in central cities. Our problem arises in organizing and educating members who live far beyond the jurisdiction of the local central body.

3. Cities are increasingly becoming Negro ghettos. Between 1960 and 1965, the Negro population in cities increased 2 million, and, in the suburbs, only 400,000.

Our concern relates not only to our own Negro members in their urban community, but to the larger problems of maintaining lines of political communication between all sectors of our organization and our natural allies.

To meet these new circumstances the following approaches seem worth considering.

- Intensified political education through existing national and state AFL-CIO machinery and in international unions, with special appeals to our younger members.
- Development of local COPEs on a community basis in order to "go where our members live," which, increasingly, will be in the suburbs.

THERE IS NO DOUBT that 1968 will not be an easy year. According to polls, the President's popularity has slipped despite an unmatched record of domestic achievements. The Republicans are unlikely to kick the election away as in 1964.

The potential effect of large numbers sitting out the 1968 elections can best be understood by examining two Senate races of 1962 won by liberals by close margins. The same senators—Joseph Clark, Pa., and Gaylord Nelson, Wis.—will be candidates again in 1968.

In Pennsylvania, the GOP vote in a statewide campaign actually declined by 34,300 from 1962 to 1966. But the defeat of COPE-endorsed Milton Shapp is clearly traced to the stay-at-home liberal vote. The Democratic vote declined by 369,664 from 1962 to 1966.

In Wisconsin, the GOP vote gained only 505 from 1962 to 1966, but the Democratic vote declined by 98,233. Here, too, the clear difference was in the large numbers of stay-at-home voters.

Sen. Clark won with only 51.1 percent of the vote in 1962, Sen. Nelson with only 52.6 percent. Failure of a substantial number of liberals to vote in 1968—as was the case in 1966—could doom their re-election chances.

In addition to these and other senators, more than a score of marginal liberals in the House will rely for re-election on the heaviest possible turnout among union members and their families.

Morgan Says:

If Redwood Trees Are Spared Maybe We Can See the Forest

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

A TREE—who needs one? Especially since as the present governor of California once reputedly observed, when you've seen one, you've seen 'em all.

It is impossible to measure at this point how much facetiousness—if any—was at the root of that remark by Ronald Reagan. To approach the subject of trees from a still less poetic angle, it would not be too facetious to say that if the demographers are right, impending generations will be lucky if they do see one. Theoretically, all the rest will have been cut down either to build houses for the exploding population or just to give the hordes of people still unborn standing room, so crowded will the planet become if humans continue to multiply at present rates.

Morgan

If we are to avoid, at any rate, the extremes of too many people and too few trees to shade them, we are going to have to reach some intelligent compromises, and rather quickly, in both departments.

As it has for years past, the question of establishing a Redwoods National Park in California has come before Congress again. Delay after distressing delay has beset this invaluable project. Conservation groups have quarreled among themselves and with the National Park Service over the size and the site of the park to protect these rare trees, some of which started to grow before Christ was born.

The Park Service's parent, the Dept. of the Interior, has wavered in its assessments of the project under the pressure of politicians who, in turn, have been under pressure by lumber interests, their stubbornness stiffened by the advent of the new Republican regime in Sacramento.

To Reagan, obviously the adjective "conservative" does not necessarily derive from the noun "conservation," and vice versa. If the issue of a park were to be caught in such a frightful thicket of controversy much longer, God Himself would be hard put to make a tree, especially a redwood, to inspire Joyce Kilmer or any other mortal fool enough to think the poetry of nature is important in our modern materialistic fairylands of asphalt, discarded beer cans, coke bottles and automobile junkyards.

But a faint breeze of hope, a timid zephyr of encouragement, is stirring through the petrified forest on Capitol Hill. The save-the-redwoods campaign has shaken down to three principal alternatives and the Johnson Administration, unsurprisingly, has decided to push for the middle-sized one as the most satisfactory compromise.

It has termed "wholly unacceptable" a plan favored by Reagan and sponsored by Califorina GOP Rep. Don Clausen. This in effect would do little more than link existing state park units in a regional conservation plan fancily called Redwoods-to-the-Sea—conveniently leaving virtually untouched the timber industry's stands of redwoods, except as the lumbermen chose to touch them with axe and saw.

The Administration apparently considered too unconservative, so to speak, the more ambitious plan of the Sierra Club, a dogged and nationally distinguished band of nature lovers, to set aside 91,000 of the choicest acres of redwoods for the park. It embraced instead the proposal of California's senior senator, liberal Republican Thomas Kuchel, for a 43,500-acre park at the northernmost end of California.

AT ONE POINT in the proceedings after a magnificent stand of the tallest redwoods has been discovered, the National Geographic Society tried to buy, for conversion to public use, some of this acreage but the lumber interests insultingly spurned even discussion of the bid.

It may be that their arrogance was more eloquent than any other voice in persuading the disputing parties toward a compromise. It became clear that the longer the disagreement the fewer trees the milling companies would leave standing.

When hearings reopened before a Senate Interior subcommittee, all sides appeared to have softened their stands a little, including the lumbermen. They had been observing a moratorium of sorts against cutting in prospective park areas. Admittedly the timber industry has played a big role in the economy of the region. But as too often happens where profits in natural resources are involved, the short-term prevailed over the long-term view.

In his testimony, Interior Sec. Udall revealed that Laurance S. Rockefeller, himself one of the country's leading conservationists, had emerged as a mediator. He conducted "delicate and careful" negotiations which apparently succeeded, among other things, in getting Reagan to send to the committee a more "flexible" statement on the park issue. Udall said the cost of acquiring private redwood lands involved—$60 million—was manageable. And he emphasized the negative economic impact would be minimal, that jobs lost in timber cutting could be replaced by new jobs and revenue in park construction and, later, expanded tourism.

Nowhere else in the world, the secretary said, do such redwood forests grow. We indeed will have to worry about seeing these forests if too few of their trees are spared to be seen.

'Super-Effort' Demanded:

Full Funds Urged for Attack On Urban School Problems

SOLVING AMERICA'S urban school problems demands a "super-effort," an AFL-CIO spokesman declared as he urged Congress to appropriate funds already authorized for programs now on the books.

Project Head Start and the National Teacher Corps have proved effective "in dealing with the total problem facing the ghetto student" and merit full congressional support, Dir. Walter G. Davis of the the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education said.

Such programs, which help meet students' problems in the classroom and in the home, will "break the wall somewhere and allow some of these people to get out of the ghetto—give them new hope to go on—and really motivate them to take full part in our society," Davis said. He made the statements during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast each Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

DAVIS ALSO praised the More Effective Schools Program of the American Federation of Teachers, aimed at such basic problems as overcrowding and lack of emphasis on reading ability.

He said teachers themselves are "very excited about this," and many who had moved to the suburbs to avoid the socio-economic problems of ghetto schools are returning to the pilot schools, "because other things that are being tried there are exciting and new and a challenge to them."

Reporters questioning Davis on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Marjorie Hunter of the New York Times' Washington Bureau and William Steif of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IT ALL STARTED back in 1964 when the Civil Rights Act was being debated in Congress. Featured were two personalities no longer on the Washington scene.

Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), the adroit veteran chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee, appeared on a national television program. Among the interviewers was May Craig, the snappish little woman with the fancy hats who was Washington correspondent for the Portland (Me.) Press-Herald.

Mrs. Craig threw this deceptively mild question at Judge Smith: Why were women not included in the act's Title VII which prohibits discrimination in employment?

Smith, who was defeated in his campaign for re-election in 1966, was a bitter opponent of the Civil Rights bill. He apparently reasoned that such an amendment could well kill the bill entirely. So, he introduced it, but the amendment passed and so did Title VII and the bill itself.

The legacy of this by-play is now being felt in state legislatures, in the courts, in the Dept. of Labor and in the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission. Protective labor standards for women, some are saying, violate the Civil Rights Act.

Most states now have some legislation on wages, hours, rest periods, safety and other employment conditions to protect some 27 million women now in the labor force. The weekly hour limits are as low as 44 and as high as 60. Daily hours vary from eight to 10.

Twelve states have laws prescribing the maximum weights women should be asked to lift. Other laws cover rest periods and night work.

When the Civil Rights Act became law the rest period issue was the easiest resolved. Men were given as many rest periods as women.

The real dilemma is posed by the hours laws.

In its 1965 convention the AFL-CIO took the position that "state labor standards legislation for women workers . . . and appropriate safeguards under such laws are not inconsistent with equality of employment opportunities for women." It called upon affiliates to push more adequate enforcement of such laws and revisions to meet present-day needs.

The other side is seen in a federal court case now in progress in California. It involves three women members of the Auto Workers in a defense plant, acting as individuals, who are asking that the state standards be struck down as discriminatory since they limit their hours of work and deny them opportunities for promotion.

The California AFL-CIO is asking the court to rule against them.

SUPPORTERS of state standards point out that these limitations on hours actually provide married women with the freedom to work since it gives them time to cook meals for their families, care for their children and maintain their homes.

This affects most women workers since 60 percent are married and 20 percent more are either widowed or divorced.

On May 2 the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, set up by Title VII, will conduct open hearings on state protective legislation. To date, EEOC has avoided the fundamental issue. It stated on Aug. 19, 1966, that when it appears an employer cannot comply with Title VII without violating state legislation, the commission would make no determination as to the complaint but would leave it up to the charging party to seek relief in court.

Efforts are underway in some state legislatures—Illinois is one example—to repeal the protective laws as violating the Civil Rights Act. These moves are led by anti-labor groups.

There are some who believe that strong overtime laws (time and one-half and double time) would deter moves to make women work longer hours, but with so much overtime being worked these days this is open to question.

There is a strong feeling that time is needed to work out protection that would not conflict with the Civil Rights Act.

A "SUPER-EFFORT" is needed to meet the nation's urban school problems, declared AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis (center) on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference. Questioning Davis on the weekly Mutual Radio Network program were William Steif of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Marjorie Hunter of the New York Times.

How to Buy:

Multi-Product Companies Use Advertising to Shore Up Prices

By Sidney Margolius

EVEN THE $17 BILLION a year now spent on advertising no longer is the only reason for the high prices the public pays for heavily-advertised goods.

Of increasing concern is the fact that advertising, in the hands of large multi-product corporations, is becoming a powerful substitute for price competition. The traditional claim that mass advertising enables cost reductions is in serious question. In many instances the exact opposite is true.

For example, in ordering Procter & Gamble to dispose of the Clorox Co. (later overruled in the courts), the Federal Trade Commission declared that the mass advertising for Clorox had served (1) to dominate the bleach market and impair competition, and (2) to keep the price high.

Similarly, the five leading manufacturers of aspirin tablets spend approximately $56 million a year on TV advertising alone. In every case, their brands cost you three to six times more than stores' private brands. But the advertised brands are the leading sellers, taking 75 percent of the $400 million a year Americans spend just for aspirin, even though all aspirin must meet the same basic standard.

The Borden Co. even tried to justify charging more for canned milk sold under the Borden name than for milk of the same quality which the company sold to retailers for resale under stores' own names. The Borden name altered the "grade and quality," the company argued. But the FTC and ultimately the U.S. Supreme Court, refused to accept this mystical explanation.

In the face of mass TV advertising, the public itself often has responded like so many puppets. Despite the fact that Clorox contains the same active ingredient and in the same amount as all other chlorine bleaches, and the exact ingredients are listed on the labels of all brands, consumers buy more under the Clorox name even though they pay up to 30 percent more.

Crest sells five times as much as the three other fluoride toothpastes recognized by the American Dental Association put together, although all have the same limited approval. All of the advertised fluoride toothpastes sell at almost exactly the same price—two to four times as much as the private-brand fluoride toothpastes many stores sell.

The dental association's action in approving a few high-price fluoride toothpastes without making a survey of all of them, and then permitting the advertising exploitation of its name, itself is dubious.

The reason the largest companies are able to charge more even when their brands are much the same as competing brands is that they usually are able to dominate the advertising, and especially the TV screen. For example, Advertising Age, a trade magazine, reports that the three leading soap and toiletries companies alone spend $430 million a year on advertising.

The FTC found that P & G, by taking over Clorox, was able to get 33 percent more TV time for the same expenditure, and discounts of 15-17 percent on magazine space.

IN ALMOST every industry the ability to finance network television has enabled the largest companies to increase their domination, a study by Dr. John M. Blair, chief economist of the Senate Antitrust & Monopoly subcommittee, shows. In the beer industry, the largest users of TV advertising increased their market share by 13 percentage points while more than 200 local and regional brewers, "unable to match the national advertising campaigns of the largest firms, were acquired or went out of business," Blair reported.

In cigars, cereals, paper products, coffee, household appliances, textiles, pet food—almost any industry you can name—Batman, Fred Flintstone, Lassie and Porky Pig and their TV colleagues have shown a magical ability to influence what consumers buy, and to make large companies bigger and small ones disappear.

More and more campanies are latching on to this technique of buying up small companies in other lines of business, and putting their products under their own big advertising umbrellas.

To name just a few, a big drug company like Bristol-Myers takes over household products like O'Cedar mops to promote along with Clairol and Bufferin; soap-maker Procter & Gamble acquires Folger's Coffee; Camel cigarette now sells Hawaiian Punch on the side; Litton Industries, big office-machine manufacturer, now is cooking Stouffer's foods, and John Robert Powers, the cosmetics salesman, is really the Borden Co. in disguise.

10,000 A Week:

Magazine Assails 'Hate' Broadcasters

A NATIONAL TELEVISION MAGAZINE has assailed America's radical right broadcasters as false patriots who voice "gloom, doom, hatred and fear."

A feature story in TV Guide (April 15-21) reported that self-appointed "superpatriots" are peddling fear as "their most important product, as well as hatred, suspicion and a fine sense of conspiracy" in more than 10,000 broadcasts each week.

The article by Neil Hickey reported that an estimated $20 million is spent yearly on broadcasts that seek to develop programs that would emasculate labor unions, abolish the United Nations, impeach Chief Justice Earl Warren, abolish all social-welfare programs and promote a host of other schemes of the far-out right.

"Whole sections of the nation are awash with a brand of vitriol which is neither rational political dissent nor the constructive goading of responsible reformers," the article stated.

Specifically identified as rightwing broadcasters are the same individuals that the AFL-CIO has been warning its affiliates about for more than four years:

- Billy James Hargis's Christian Crusade, heard on 250 radio stations.
- The Dan Smoot Report, aired on 25 TV and 64 radio stations.
- Twentieth Century Reformation Hour, operated by the Rev. Carl McIntire and heard five times a week on 635 radio stations.
- The Manion Forum, a sounding board for Clarence Manion, on 12 TV and 200 radio stations.
- H. L. Hunt's Life Line, heard on 440 radio stations.

The article noted that Rev. McIntire, for example, has long attacked fair employment practices legislation as being "a vital part of the Communist program" and that he has condemned all UN activity, including the sale of UNICEF cards to aid starving children.

ONE OF THE MOTIVES for the growing number of radical right broadcasters, suggested the article, is the sizable financial return. Some broadcasters are financed by tax-exempt foundations, business corporations and wealthy individuals. Others are fed by hundreds of thousands of citizens who, frightened by the propaganda, diligently and regularly mail in $1 to $5 contributions.

The Dallas News editorially raised the question of "whether a man is out to make a fast buck or to serve the country."

In criticism directed at Dan Smoot, whose broadcasts have attacked integration as "an American tragedy" created by Communist infiltration of the South, the News said, "patriotism for profit is just suspect. . . . If Mr. Smoot has not yet been around long enough to encounter it, the News has." Smoot, the newspaper declared, is among those "professionals for profit who have found a remunerative field" in opposition to communism.

The article noted that the AFL-CIO, the National Council of Churches, the Anti-Defamation League and the United Church of Christ "have begun the arduous task of fighting back against broadcast extremists."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, it said, has alerted affiliated organizations to "the continued flooding of the airwaves" with radical right propaganda and has pointed out to unions that use of the Federal Communications Commission fairness doctrine can provide the means for obtaining air time in which to answer radical right attacks.

"Station owners would be less willing to sell time to extremists if they knew they'd be required—as the law provides—to make free time available for rebuttal," the article reported.

What is at stake is not an infringement of free speech, the article stated, despite the radical right's howls of censorship. The issue is the "fair use of a natural resource—the broadcast spectrum—and the public's right to full, open and balanced discussion of the day's most pertinent issues."

From Soup to Nonsense:

The Dear, Dusty Past Lives On In Annals of Cancelled Checks

By Jane Goodsell

HOW IS A FAMILY to keep track of its history in this unsentimental age?

Unlike our grandmothers, who saved old letters, locks of hair, baby shoes, pressed flowers, we pride ourselves on getting rid of things and keeping our lives and our houses uncluttered. Keepsakes have disappeared, along with the old-fashioned attic where they used to be kept. Hardly anybody keeps a diary or journal to record events and occasions as they zip past, and it's a rare scrapbook that has more than three of its pages filled.

Have we stripped ourselves so free of memorabilia that we have nothing but our memories and a few snapshots to remind us of our pasts? Have we no records of where we've been and what we've done?

On the contrary. The daily events of our lives are better documented than our grandmothers' were, living as they did in a cash-and-carry age. Our cancelled checks are our archives.

As souvenirs, a packet of cancelled checks may not have the heart-tugging appeal of bronzed baby shoes and faded letters tied with blue ribbons, but they are far more effective memory-joggers. True, we keep them not because of sentimental attachment but because we jolly well have to—in case the Bureau of Internal Revenue should awaken some morning with a sudden urge to investigate our 1962 tax returns.

Browsing through old cancelled checks can be a poignant experience:

LOOK, here's one for $15 to the ABC Towing Co.! Remember? Mother parked the car in a No Parking from 4-6 zone, and then forgot where she'd left it. . . .

Whatever did we buy at the Oriental Motif Shop for $9.95? Hey, wasn't that the place where Jimmy picked up the china Buddha and dropped it, so we had to buy it. . . . .

And how about this one to Amy Wimple for $23.75? Who's Amy Wimple? Hey, I know—she's the lady who kept house for us when Mother went to the hospital, and she put the broccoli left over from dinner into the scrambled eggs at breakfast, and . . .

Your cancelled checks are more than dry records of deductible expenses, and they aren't merely proof of the futility of trying to make ends meet.

They are poignant rembrances of times past. They are your family annals, the archives of your yesterdays.

LID Award:

Farm Union Cited On Pioneering Gains

New York—The League for Industrial Democracy presented its annual award to the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee for "its impressive accomplishments in bringing dignity and respect to farm workers." Acceptance of the award by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez highlighted the LID's 62nd annual conference here.

In presenting the award at the league's luncheon, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO praised Chavez and his union for "transforming the grapes of wrath into the sweet wine of social justice."

The luncheon, attended by 600 persons, capped the LID's 2-day conference on "Poverty, Civil Rights & the Freedom Budget."

"When we speak of liberty and justice for all, do we mean it to include the agricultural workers and other unorganized workers in the most exploited sector of the economy?" Van Arsdale asked in presenting the award. "Let's prove that we do by aiding their just cause."

Chavez, UFWOC director, thanked labor, civil rights and liberal spokesmen present for their support of his union and said:

"There is much work left to be done. We must rally public support against huge wealth and power to organize the majority of farm workers and get them the same rights most other workers have achieved through the labor movement."

In a telegram AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the LID "could not have made a more appropriate choice" for its award than Chavez. He continued:

"No movement in America today is more relevant to the issues of poverty and civil rights than the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee of the AFL-CIO, which Brother Chavez serves so effectively. We in the AFL-CIO are proud of our part in this fight, which will continue unabated until farm workers achieve their rights as workers, as citizens, and as human beings."

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger joined Pres. Vivian Henderson of Clark College and Mitchel Sviridoff, director of New York City's Human Resources Administration, in the opening session.

Goldfinger asserted that current war on poverty programs, while important and useful, could not take the place of broad social and economic programs to achieve full employment and a more democratic distribution of income.

"More than 50 percent of America's poverty," he said, "is related to lack of jobs or employment at substandard wages. The key to any real war on poverty is planned government action for a full employment economy—jobs at decent wages for all who are ready and willing to work."

Henderson, also an economist, agreed with the emphasis on full employment and said that "problems of Negroes would be alleviated much faster" if the U.S. adopted the policies suggested by Goldfinger and the AFL-CIO.

Bolder Concepts Urged

Sviridoff called for bolder concepts of social planning in order to marshal the human and economic resources required to end poverty and deprivation.

At the luncheon honoring Chavez, LID Chairman Michael Harrington said: "The presentation of the award to Chavez symbolizes the unity of the classical forces of organized labor — the most successful anti-poverty institution in America—with the newly organized farm workers."

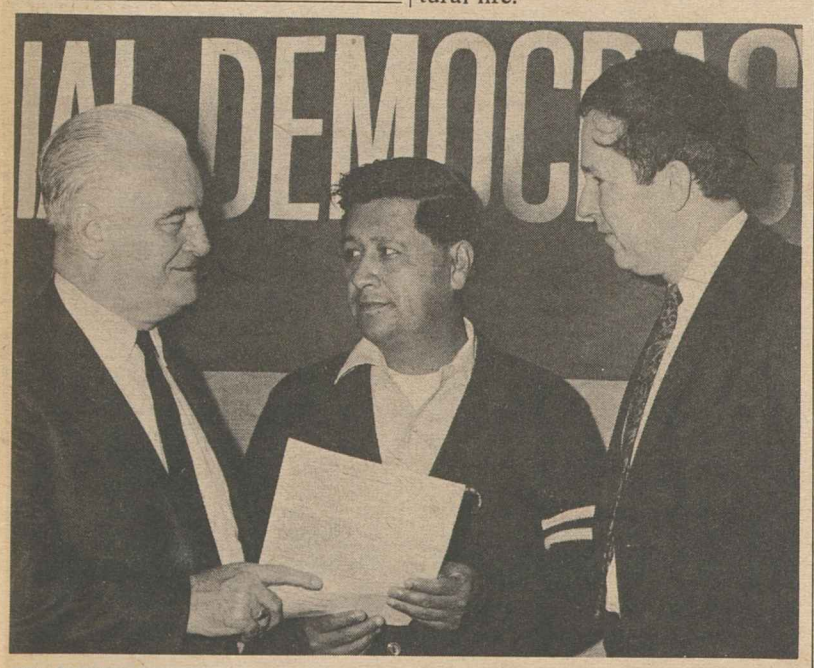
Tom Kahn, LID executive director, reported that the organization had completed its most successful year of activity in over a decade.

"We are especially grateful, Kahn said, "for the cooperation we have received from many trade unions and from the AFL-CIO, with whose help we are expanding our activities and increasing our membership."

The LID—founded in 1905 by Clarence Darrow, Upton Sinclair and Jack London—is an educational membership organization dedicated to "increasing democracy in our economic, political and cultural life."

Ohio Labor Issues New Publication

Columbus, O.—The first issue of Focus, new monthly publication of the Ohio AFL-CIO, is off the press. The publication will analyze political and legislative matters of concern to Ohio union members. News & Views, weekly central body publication, henceforth will be issued three times a month, skipping the week in which Focus comes out, Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith announced.



IN RECOGNITION of "impressive accomplishments in bringing dignity and respect to farm workers," the League for Industrial Democracy presented its 1967 annual award to the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. The presentation was made at the annual LID conference in New York, with Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. (left), of the New York City AFL-CIO acting for the LID and UFWOC Chairman Cesar Chavez (center) for the recipient. Looking on is Michael Harrington, writer and LID board chairman.

Labor, Liberal Drive Seen Vital To Broad Application of Medicaid

Labor, liberal and anti-poverty organizations must mobilize their political forces on state and national levels if the new Medicaid program is to achieve broad success, according to an AFL-CIO spokesman.

Assistant Dir. Richard E. Shoemaker of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, writing in the April issue of the American Federationist, notes that the Medicaid program was among the 1965 amendments to the Social Security Act and provides protection against the cost of illness for low-income persons. It is financed by joint federal and state appropriations, but depends on state action for implementation. It was designed to replace the separate medical assistance plans that formerly supplemented cash public assistance programs, Shoemaker writes.

Twenty-seven states have submitted Medicaid programs which the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has approved.

To participate, the states must agree to provide medical assistance at least to the "categorically needy," or those who were eligible for cash assistance under four programs—aid to the blind, old age assistance, aid to permanently and totally disabled, and aid to families with dependent children.

'Medically Needy' Defined

States may also extend the program to the "medically needy," whom Shoemaker describes as "those who have incomes above state standards for cash assistance, but below a higher level of income established by each state as the upper limit of eligibility for medical assistance."

But federal matching funds are available only for those "medically needy" who fit into one of the categorical "slots" of aged, blind, disabled or families with dependent children.

"While the ultimate goal of the program is to cover everyone below a given income and resource level as determined by each state," Shoemaker points out, "the possibility of accomplishing this goal in the near future is hampered by the fact that very little federal matching money is provided for the medically needy between the ages of 21 and 65."

Because of the dearth of U.S. funds, he writes, only New York, Maryland, the state of Washington and the Virgin Islands provide medical care to those who meet a simple income and resource test.

"On the federal level," Shoemaker observes, "it is particularly important to amend the law to provide federal matching funds for all persons between the ages of 21 and 65."

It also may be important to press for even more generous federal matching, he said adding:

"On the state level, it is important that those states which have not covered the medically needy as well as the categorically needy should move promptly to do so with liberal income and resource standards applicable to all people in need of medical care."

States whose programs have been approved have set net income maximums for the medically needy at levels ranging from $1,200 in Utah to $2,900 in New York for single persons, and from $2,448 in Oklahoma to $6,000 in New York for a family of four.

Hawaii allows virtually no cash resources for either a single person or a family. Rhode Island sets the limit at $4,000 for a single person and $6,200 for a family of four.

Nevertheless, the concept that comprehensive health services should be made available to everybody who meets a "relatively simple" income and resource test, Shoemaker says, is a "very significant step forward" from the former categorical approach.

"It applies the same principle to medical care as was recommended by the national Advisory Council on Public Welfare for cash payments," he explains; "that is, there should be only one eligibility requirement—need.

"The comprehensive scope of benefits contemplated in Title XIX [Medicaid] should be a stimulant to greater coordination between the many specialties of medicine as well as between physicians, medical technicians of all types, nurses, etc."

Emphasis on Quality

Shoemaker emphasizes the requirement in the amendment that the medical services furnished must be of "high quality," and points out that proper implementation of the regulations established by HEW's Welfare Administration "would eventually eliminate the double standard of medical care that now exists."

"Every low-income person would have his own physician instead of having to take the one assigned to him by the hospital," he continued. "In fact, under the Medicaid program many city and county 'charity' hospitals are already being converted into community hospitals because welfare patients can now have their own doctors."

But in order to provide low-income families with "complete, continuous, family-centered" medical care of high quality, he says, the states must promote cooperation and coordination between the medical specialties and the autonomous health agencies and programs.

"The major task for each state," he concludes, "will be to create the necessary administrative machinery to assure high standards, efficiency and economy. It is important, therefore, that labor and other consumers of health services actively participate in the various state Medicaid programs."

Airliner Film Technicians Win 12% Hike

New York — Wage increases of approximately 12 percent over three years have been won by the Theatrical Stage Employes for projection technicians who prepare films for airline passengers.

The agreement, retroactive to Jan. 1, builds up to $174.50 a week in the third year for full-time workers. The contract covers employes of Inflight Motion Pictures, Inc., which services Trans-World Airlines and United Air Lines, and Bell & Howell, which has taken over operations for American Airlines. Employes working on call will receive $9 per flight or $15.50 if not more than one flight is handled within a three-hour period.

The technicians covered by the contracts are based at airports in Boston, New York, Newark, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago, Oklahoma City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Montreal and Honolulu.

The same terms were reached in a separate contract with In-transit Motion Pictures, Inc., which prepares films for showing on Baltimore & Ohio and Chesapeake & Ohio railroad trains. Inflight and Intransit are both headed by David Flexer.

Winnipeg School Named For Veteran Unionist

Winnipeg, Man. — The cornerstone has been laid for a junior vocational school in North Winnipeg named in honor of R. B. Russell, veteran labor leader who was business agent of Machinists Local 2 in the late 'Teens, a leader in the famous general strike of 1919, and general secretary of the One Big Union from 1922 until its merger with the Canadian Labor Congress in 1956.

FREEDOM SHARE SAVINGS NOTE shown above in facsimile will be put on sale May 1 by the Treasury and can be bought only in conjunction with purchases of Series E Bonds. The notes will have a face value at maturity—four years, six months after date of issue—of $25, $50, $75 or $100.

Parks Guide Issued For Handicapped

The President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped has just issued a "Guide to the National Parks and Monuments for Handicapped Tourists"—a directory of 200 tourist attractions in the national park system.

The book tells whether parks and monuments are accessible to those who have difficulty in walking. It tells those in wheelchairs whether they can expect steps, narrow doorways, inaccessible toilets and other barriers. Cardiac patients, and those affected by high altitudes, are given elevations and trail grades.

Single free copies are available from the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, Washington, D.C. 20210.

New Freedom Shares On Sale to Public May 1

The Treasury Dept. has announced the terms and conditions of the new Freedom Share U.S. Savings Notes, which go on sale May 1 with the strong endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The notes may be purchased only by individuals and only with the simultaneous purchase of Series E Bonds on payroll savings or bond-a-month plans. They mature in four years, six months from the issue date.

If held to maturity, they yield approximately 4.74 percent interest compounded semi-annually. They may be redeemed any time after the first year with lower rates of interest.

The issue price is 81 percent of the face value. The notes come in denominations of $25, $50, $75 and $100 at maturity and are sold, respectively, at 20.25, $40.50, $60.75 and $81.

Freedom Shares must be bought in conjunction with purchases of Series E Bonds of the same or larger face values—for example $25 note and a $25 bond. The total cost for such a unit would be $39—$20.25 for the Freedom Share and $18.75 for the bond.

On a payroll savings plan, Freedom Share deductions are limited to $20.25 a weekly pay period, or $40.50 a biweekly or semi-monthly period. On a bond-a-month plan at a bank, the limit on deductions for the notes is $81 a month. There also is an annual limit of $1,350 face value on the shares that may be issued to any one person in a calendar year.

The Freedom Shares and E Bonds bought in combination must have identical registration. There are three choices—a single individual, two persons as co-owners, or an individual owner with another as beneficiary.

The interest on the notes, like that on the bonds, is subject to federal income tax, but not to state or local income taxes. The federal tax may be deferred until maturity, redemption or other disposition, whichever comes first.

The Treasury's drive to push up the sales of savings bonds was given "unqualified support" by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council emphasized the payroll deduction plan, cited the security of the bonds as an investment, and pointed out that they encourage long-term savings against anticipated major spending.

"But more important than all these considerations is that of simple patriotism," the council declared. "The U.S. is engaged in a painful war in defense of freedom—the freedom of a nation to seek its own destiny, secure against aggression. Each day Americans give their lives to that cause. By supporting the bond drive with dollars, we at home can demonstrate in at least a small way our willingness to do our part."

Priority Goals Urged to Plan Future Growth

The nation needs a set of guides and priorities to sustain full employment and economic growth if the country's military needs decline in relation to the fighting in Viet Nam, the AFL-CIO declared.

Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger told the Joint Economic Committee that advance planning is vital "in terms of future needs for facilities and services in order to provide a sound base for sustained full-employment growth."

If military expenditures are reduced in the future, Goldfinger advocated tax cuts for low and moderate income families and elimination of any remaining tax burden on the poor.

He proposed also a "complete overhaul of our woefully inadequate public assistance system," stepped-up federal investment in job-creating measures and "increasing investment in human and material resources."

IUE Wins Vote At Tung-Sol Plants

Newark, N. J. — Workers at two plants of the Tung-Sol division of the Wagner Electric Co. here and in Bloomfield, N. J., voted 576-491 to replace their long-time unaffiliated union with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, AFL-CIO.

IUE organizing efforts at Tung-Sol had produced three previous National Labor Relations Board elections, the last one in 1961. A new contract with the St. Louis plant of the same firm, achieved 10 days before the election here, made the difference, said IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, who declared "They liked what they saw in IUE."

The election victory also achieved a long-time goal of IUE Vice Pres. Milton Weihrauch, president of the union's New Jersey-New York dis-

Robert McGlotten Joins Rights Staff

Robert M. McGlotten, national labor specialist for Opportunities Industrialization Center, a job training program located in 12 major cities, has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights as a staff representative.

A vice president of the Negro Trade Union Leadership Council and a former public relations representative of Transport Workers Local 234 in Philadelphia, McGlotten has had wide experience in building a positive relationship between organized labor and minority groups.

He has been active in civil rights and community work in Philadelphia and in bringing about cooperation between the minority groups and the Philadelphia AFL-CIO.

McGlotten has attended the University of Pennsylvania, St. Joseph's College for Industrial & Labor Management and the Pennsylvania State Labor Education Center.

Enforcement Drive Pushed:

Central Bodies Get Wage Law Briefing

San Francisco—Representatives of state and local AFL-CIO central bodies from 13 western states were briefed here on techniques for aiding enforcement of expanded federal minimum wage coverage.

The session was one of five regional meetings held by the AFL-CIO. Others were in Cleveland, St. Louis, New York and Houston.

Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies, urged the councils to set up watchdog committees to aid in policing the Fair Labor Standards Act. Smith particularly urged use of the AFL-CIO's new wage-hour complaint form which holds in confidence the names of workers originating complaints.

He was joined in the appeal for help by Frank J. Muench, regional director of the U.S. Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division and two other top regional officers.

While the federal officials stressed the government policy of strict confidentiality on the original complainants, it developed that in some areas that policy may not have trickled down to lower levels of the Wage & Hour Division.

Two labor representatives, from southern California and New Mexico, charged that local wage-hour officials had asked for names of complainants when their councils had sought action on suspected violations.

Muench said later that as a result of such disclosures at the meeting, he planned to send a memo to lower levels of the region, reemphasizing the policy of confidentiality.

He suggested to those who complained at the meeting that if they used the AFL-CIO's complaint form they could avoid "this type of discussion on a lower level."

"We will immediately process complaints on the union form," he assured the delegates.

Muench noted that the 1966 wage-hour law amendments extended protection to an additional 9 million workers effective last Feb. 1.

With little additional staff, he said, the division must "spread the law's effectiveness to embrace these 9 million new workers and still not neglect those within the previously covered 32.5 million who are not being paid the standards applicable to them."

At present, he said, one-third of the division's investigations are based on complaints and about 25 percent more on informed leads.

"This leaves a gap of 40 percent for general programming," he said. "With the help of your widespread membership, we should pretty closely fill that gap" and "reduce sterile plant visits to a minimum."

Smith urged the councils in setting up watchdog committees to let workers in unorganized shops know that there is a place to which to complain.

What To Do

"Then file your information with the proper body," he said, "and if you get a runaround send the information directly to us."

Stressing that local and state councils are vital in AFL-CIO political activities, Smith told the meeting that "there has been some progress in strengthening the councils—and there is more progress to be made."

When the 1965 AFL-CIO convention established an award for international unions with 80 percent affiliation with central bodies, he recalled, 12 international unions qualified. A 1966 survey found another 10 had hit 80 percent and that most other internationals had improved their affiliation to some degree.

While this is encouraging, "we are very far from licking our affiliation problem," he warned.

Wage-Hour Complaints Up Sharply Since Higher Rates Took Effect

Complaints of employer violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act increased substantially in February and March, the first two months of the higher minimum wages and broader coverage provided by the 1966 amendments to the act, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Complaints filed in February were up 36 percent over the filings for the same month of 1966—from 1,885 to 2,572. March complaints rose 48 percent—from 2,216 in March 1966 to 3,275 this year. For the two months, the increase was from 4,101 complaints to 5,847 for an over-all rise of 43 percent.

The rising number of complaints coincides with a nationwide drive by the AFL-CIO for full enforcement of the law.

In a letter to federation central bodies, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out that the Labor Dept. "has never had enough inspectors to do the job" and "it is up to us to help."

Meany called on every central body to set up a wage-hour enforcement committee, offer its services to all workers especially the unorganized, help them bring their complaints to wage-hour investigators and press for prompt action, keep tabs on the outcome of all cases, and be alert to unnecessary compromises that give the worker only a portion of the wages due him.

The FLSA amendments, effective last Feb. 1, gave protection to 9 million additional workers for the first time and provided higher minimums at stated intervals for 41.4 million workers in 1.9 million U.S. business establishments.

Newly covered workers must be paid at least $1 an hour and 1.5 times their regular rate of pay for more than 44 hours of work a week, unless specifically exempted. Next Feb. 1 the minimum rises to $1.15 an hour, with overtime pay required after 42 hours of work a week. Thereafter it goes up 15 cents a year until farm workers reach $1.30 and other workers $1.60.

$1.40 Now

Workers covered by the law before Feb. 1 now must be paid at least $1.40 an hour, plus overtime for work beyond 40 hours a week. Their minimum will rise to $1.60 an hour beginning Feb. 1, 1968.

Some 11 million workers still are not protected by the law. These include most farm workers, domestics, and those in firms with annual sales of less than $250,000.

The inclusion of state school and hospital employes has been challenged in court tests brought by Maryland and other states.

The AFL-CIO asked a three-judge panel of U.S. District Court in Baltimore to throw out Maryland's suit, designed to prevent enforcement of federal standards as they apply to state and city employes. Twenty-three other states joined Maryland in its attack on the 1966 amendments.

The AFL-CIO brief noted that the courts have repeatedly held that regulation of wages and hours may be applied to so-called "local" employers, including retail and service industries.

The brief also cited a declaration of policy in the wage-hour law holding that "labor conditions detrimental" to minimum standards "necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being" may spread and perpetuate such conditions in several states and lead to "labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce."

House Group Clears Site Picketing Bill

employer construction site is not an illegal secondary boycott.

One change in the bill—proposed by its sponsor, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), with the support of the building trades unions—was made by the committee. It spelled out the fact that a union can't picket to seek the exclusion or removal of any worker "on the ground of race, creed, color or national origin."

The committee, however, turned down by a vote reported as 19-12 a substitute bill introduced by Rep. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.). Among other provisions, the Goodell proposal would have overturned a recent Supreme Court decision that permits a union to strike if an employer violates an agreement not to use prefabricated materials that would eliminate jobs at the worksite.

On the other side of the Capitol, a Senate Labor subcommittee approved a revised version of the Administration's bill to outlaw discrimination in employment because of age. It applies generally to persons between the ages of 45 and 65.

The subcommittee assigned administration of the law to the Labor Dept.'s wage-hour administrator. However, states which have anti-discrimination agencies would be given 60 days to resolve complaints before the federal government stepped in. It also amended the bill to provide in effect that an older worker would not have to be included in an existing retirement or pension plan, but the existence of such a plan couldn't be used as an excuse for not hiring an older worker.

Left for the full committee to resolve was the decision on whether to include airline stewardesses under the bill's protection.

Campaign Fund Debated

The Senate was bogged down in the fourth week of a battle over whether to tack an amendment repealing the presidential campaign financing law on the House-passed bill restoring the 7 percent investment tax credit for business and industry.

The Senate initially voted 48-42 to repeal the labor-backed law enabling taxpayers to earmark $1 of their federal income tax for a fund to finance presidential campaigns.

But two subsequent votes indicated a change of mind. Supporters of the campaign law, led by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), won a 46-42 test vote on April 20, and another by a 43-41 vote on April 25.

Between the votes was a three-way misunderstanding over the terms of a "gentlemen's agreement" on handling the bill, with Majority Leader Mike Mansfield in the middle. The situation as the AFL-CIO News went to press was this:

- The tax bill had been stripped of all amendments, including a lower social security retirement age and college tuition tax credits, except one—a repealer of the campaign financing law.
- The Senate was scheduled to vote on May 2 on a motion by Long to strip the repealer from the bill.

The six-member Senate Ethics Committee filed a unanimous report calling for censure of Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn.). It termed his conduct as a senator "contrary to accepted morals" and said it "tends to bring the Senate into dishonor and disrepute." The resolution still has to be acted on by the full Senate.

House leaders, meanwhile, were struggling with the problem of what to do with the certificate of election New York State is scheduled to send in certifying Adam C. Powell as the winner in the special congressional election in the Harlem district he has represented since 1945.

School Aid Battle

On deck—although floor action has been put off while Democratic leaders seek to round up votes—is a close battle over federal aid to elementary and secondary schools.

Republicans are seeking to junk the entire system of allocation of federal funds and substitute block grants to states, with few strings as to how and where the money is to be used.

One effect of the GOP plan would be to put in question the indirect aid now given to students in poor neighborhoods attending church schools—an issue which threatens to revive the conflict that stymied federal school aid bills for years until a compromise was worked out early in the 89th Congress.

Both sides were working hard for votes, with Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.), author of the Republican substitute, making frequent changes in his bill in an effort to overcome objections.

The showdown is expected to be a major test of Administration strength in the House versus an enlarged Republican-Dixiecrat coalition.

Variety Artists Move To New Headquarters

New York—The Variety Artists have moved to new quarters at 1540 Broadway and appointed Miss Penny Singleton, past president, as acting administrative secretary succeeding Richard J. Jones. The union's new telephone number is 765-0800.

VICE PRES. HUMPHREY responds to an ovation from delegates to the Letter Carriers' pay rally. The union says the 4.5 percent raise proposed by the Administration isn't nearly enough. Humphrey assured the delegates that the door is still open to further discussion of pay legislation. Congressmen and senators from both parties addressed the rally.

Nationwide Letter Carrier Rally Backs Job Upgrading, Pay Hikes

More than 3,500 letter carriers from every state in the nation rallied in Washington to deliver a massive push to legislation calling for job upgrading and pay raises for postal employes.

Their cheers echoed through the biggest hotel ballroom they could get and through an overflow hall where another standing room only crowd followed the proceedings on closed circuit television. The cheers were for the dozens of congressmen and senators—including a majority of both the House and Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committees—who came to pledge support.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) spoke for his colleagues when he told the NALC delegates they were "the biggest, the most enthusiastic, fightingest group I have ever seen."

They swarmed over Capitol Hill visiting their congressmen and senators, held a band concert on the steps of the House of Representatives with House Speaker John W. McCormack taking a turn as guest conductor, and wore their big "Level 5" buttons at a mammoth reception given by the postmaster general.

Level 5 is the postal job grade the letter carriers and postal clerks want. They're now in Level 4, lower down on the pay scale. And they say that the 4.5 percent "step towards comparability" pay raise the Administration has proposed won't even come near adequate pay for the job they're doing.

NALC Pres. Jerome J. Keating testified at House hearings on government pay on the first day of the rally and described the 4.5 percent as "puny."

"We are as frustrated as the Washington Senator fans," he told the committee. All we have been hearing is 'wait until next year.' We have had inadequate adjustments for the past 12 years."

Carrying on the baseball analogy, Keating said "percentages have a meaning when you are dealing with batting averages," but when computed on "an anemic pay schedule," the Administration proposal comes out to little more than $4 a week in take-home pay. And that, he said, at a time when the Post Office Dept. is unable to fill its job vacancies with qualified employes and was able to retain only 80,000 out of 180,000 new employes hired last year.

On the opening day alone, rally speakers included five of the eight democratic members of the Senate committee—Jennings Randolph (W. Va.), Daniel B. Brewster (Md.), Vance Hartke (Ind.) Ernest F. Hollings (S.C.), and Yarborough—along with three of the four Republican members, Frank Carlson (Kan.), Hiram L. Fong (Hawaii), and J. Caleb Boggs (Del.).

Sponsors Added

House members shuttled in a steady stream to the conference, greeted by standing ovations. Many of them joined in sponsoring the union-backed pay bill, which carried 68 signatures by the close of the first day of the three-day rally.

There was a warm welcome, too, for Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey. He reminded the delegates that Pres. Johnson had recommended a pay raise every year and said the Administration's door was "still open" for discussion of the legislation.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller voiced the federation's strong support of the pay goals and stressed the difficulty of trying to apply an "arbitrary yardstick" of classification and pay to postal workers "because there is no employer of your size or comparable occupation in the country."

Other government unions are planning similar rallies later this spring to keep the nationwide drive going at every stage of congressional action. The Postal Clerks will hold their national legislative conference in mid-May and the Government Employes will bring members in for a June rally.

95 Youngsters Gain Job Foothold As Newark Painters Aid Training

Newark, N. J.—Ninety-five young men, most of them from minority group families of disadvantaged background, have been guided toward a lifetime of steady work with good wages as a result of action by Painters District Council 10.

They have just passed a civil service qualifying examination for the comparatively new post of apprentice painter. The examination was conducted by the Newark Housing Authority under a program developed by the authority and other public agencies, the New Jersey Civil Service, the district council and the Paint Trade Joint Committee, made up of union and employer representatives.

Within a few weeks about 40 of the youths are expected to be started on the four-year apprenticeship program—supervised by the Labor Dept's Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training — that will lead step by step to the status of journeyman and a place on employment lists subject to civil service regulations. Pres. Peter Yablonsky of District Council No. 10 is confident that all will be started on the way up by the end of a year.

The apprenticeship training program grew out of an earlier pre-apprenticeship project started by the district council and some employers in 1964 and completed last summer.

Assistance Given

Its primary goal was to determine the fitness of unqualified youth to enter a skilled trade and, where aptitude was demonstrated, to prepare them to initiate apprenticeships by instilling good work habits and helping to correct educational deficiencies.

Applicants were recruited through the State Employment Service's Youth Opportunity Center, in low-cost housing projects and by word of mouth "promotion" by the trainees themselves. The only requirement was an aptitude test given at the Youth Opportunity Center.

About 90 percent were Negroes with formal schooling ranging from the 8th grade through the 12th grade. After the tests the Paint Trade Joint Committee assigned each applicant to a construction project under the supervision of a journeyman instructor.

The trainees saw that by observing union regulations they could acquire self-respect and a decent standard of living, and for the most part stuck through the full two years of training. Those who completed the work entered upon formal apprenticeships, are now earning $3 to $4 an hour and are covered by welfare fund protections under union contracts.

For the new apprenticeship training program, 154 young men 17 to 25 years old took the civil service test. They were attracted in part by Housing Authority publicity that promised them:

- "You will receive more than $9,000 per year at the end of your apprenticeship.
- "You will have permanent title as painter, Newark Housing Authority, under civil service rules at the end of your apprenticeship.
- "You will earn money at once and receive raises every six months.
- "You will work only under union standards.
- "You will become a member of a painter's union.
- "You will earn a journeyman's card with which you can work anywhere in the USA under union standards and at union rates."

The Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, which had worked closely with the pre-apprenticeship program, has made a grant of $18,000 to the apprenticeship training project to pay the salaries of two instructors for the first nine months and for office expenses.

The apprentices' starting wage is $1.50 an hour. It goes to $1.75 in three months and to $2 in another three months, and then becomes a proportion of the journeyman's current rate, increasing every six months. They will be covered throughout by the union contract.

Yablonsky said the district council has pledged itself to cooperate in all phases of the program, including the 144 hours of supplementary instruction to be given outside working hours.

It will furnish textbooks recommended by the National Joint Board of Apprentices & Training, sponsor classes in related work, and admit apprentices to the union without initiation fees at the conclusion of the first six months.

Workers' Needs Cited:

More Funds Sought For Aid to Colleges

A stepped-up program of federal aid to colleges and junior colleges was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO as in the interest of both the nation and the millions of workers who want their children to have a chance for higher education.

Walter G. Davis, AFL-CIO director of education, told members of a House Education & Labor subcommittee that without federal aid programs "most working people would find it an unmanageable burden to send their children on to college."

The federal programs begun in recent years have "opened the gate to higher education for hundreds of thousands of young people," he said, and should be continued and expanded.

Davis gave a strong endorsement to legislation extending federal college aid programs, including provisions of the 1965 Higher Education Act and the National Defense Education Act.

At the same time, he expressed labor's grave concern that 1968 budget requests for all higher education programs are less than 50 percent of the amounts previously authorized by Congress.

While the Education & Labor Committee does not deal with budget requests, Davis urged that it "exert every possible influence to encourage the House Appropriations Committee to provide federal funding to the full authorization permitted."

On the legislation before the education subcommittee, he said the AFL-CIO "particularly welcomes the extension of the student aid programs."

He urged that a provision of the National Defense Education Act which "forgives" repayment of loans by college students who become teachers in public schools be extended also to those who become teachers in non-profit private schools.

Work-Study Backed

"We welcome too the extension of the college work-study program," Davis added. "This program is one of the most useful forms of student aid for young people from low income and minority families. These young people have usually been too educationally disadvantaged to come out well in the tight competition for scholarships and the level of their family income makes it difficult for them — and in most cases unwise for them — to obtain loans to pay for higher education."

Davis expressed distress, however, that the proposed budget for this program is $60 million under the amount authorized. "If Congress were to cut funds for the work-study program," he warned, "it would make higher education that much more difficult for low income students."

He urged on Congress "the goal of a system of education in which neither financial need nor lack of adequate facilities will ever deprive young people of continuing their education as far as they are able and as far as they desire."

Support Given New Approach Of Public TV

"lowest denominator in terms of taste and intellectual content."

If it does this, Biemiller suggested, it "could well be the most effective stride ever taken toward adult education — toward a better-informed citizenry, and even toward the improvement of public taste."

He concluded his testimony with this comment:

"We in the AFL-CIO are keenly conscious of the great impact of television and its immense potential for good or evil. To those who see only evil in it now, we say that a far greater evil would have been its perversion to the service of the state. Yet to realize its potential for good, viewers must have a better and freer choice."

The Administration bill would increase federal funds for construction of educational television and radio facilities to $10.5 million, more than three times the current appropriation. It would provide $9 million for initial funding of the proposed new corporation and Pres. Johnson said he will recommend next year proposals for long-term financing of the program.

Law Professor to Spend Year on Zagoria's Staff

Member Sam Zagoria of the National Labor Relations Board has named Alvin L. Goldman, assistant professor of labor and constitutional law at the University of Kentucky College of Law, to serve for a year, beginning in September, as professor in residence on Zagoria's legal staff.

Goldman, 29, was in private law practice, specializing in labor law, in New York City before joining the Kentucky faculty. He is also a labor arbitrator for the American Arbitration Association.

Local Draws Praise For Viet Nam Stand

A telegram from a Beaumont, Tex., local of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters supporting Pres. Johnson's policy in Viet Nam was praised in Congress by Rep. Jack Brooks (D-Tex.)

Brooks said the members of Local 195 reflect the views of "quiet Americans who are ready and willing to do what is necessary to support their country in a time of need."

The local voted unanimously to send a telegram to the President pledging "our help to you and our fighting men in Viet Nam in any way that we can."

CWA Urges Broader Ban On Wiretaps

A union representing "the largest group of practical experts in the wiretapping and eavesdropping area" called on Congress to outlaw all types of "bugging."

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne termed eavesdropping and wiretapping "one of the most insidious evils" in society.

He told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee that the CWA supports the Administration bill barring most forms of electronic eavesdropping, but wants it to go one step further.

As presently written, the bill exempts telephone companies which monitor conversations as a means of checking on service.

Beirne said there is no legitimate need for such monitoring, since the industry has automated means for checking on its equipment.

He said interception of phone conversations has been used to check up on telephone company employes. At the same time, employes who have been ordered to monitor conversations between subscribers have been put to an unnecessary moral test of resisting "temptation" to abuse the confidence of the intercepted conversation.

Beirne said there are indications that telephone companies are gradually cutting down on the "antiquated systems of service and monitoring observing."

The process should be hastened, he said, by eliminating the exemption proposed for the telephone industry. "Third party listening, no matter how called, is still eavesdropping," he said.

And as for listening in on telephone operators, Beirne said the employes of the telephone company have as much right to privacy as anyone else. He charged that "surveillance by virtue of eavesdropping" is an assault on "human dignity."

Labor Opposes Increase In FHA Mortgage Rates

Administration proposals for new housing and urban development legislation were both praised and criticized by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller at House hearings.

Biemiller strongly endorsed a proposed new rat extermination program, allocating $20 million in first-year federal grants to pay up to two-thirds of the cost of local rat control programs.

He urged prompt action by Congress to help eradicate "a menace that affects not only those of our citizens who inhabit America's slums, but which also threatens the health of every citizen of the community."

Another section of the omnibus bill, however, was opposed by the AFL-CIO. It would raise to 6 percent the interest ceiling on FHA-insured mortgages for rental housing, cooperative housing and condominiums—now under a 5.25 percent ceiling—and to housing for the elderly, presently limited to 5.5 percent interest.

The new maximum would soon become the minimum, Biemiller noted, "just at the very time when the money market seems to be easing."

Deletion Asked

He urged the committee to delete that provision of the bill, or "at an absolute minimum" to block any retroactive increase in interest rates on projects already approved by the FHA at lower interest.

The AFL-CIO endorsed a section of the bill providing government-insured mortgages for improvements to nursing homes, but urged that preference under the program be given to non-profit nursing homes and to those certified to provide care under federal health programs.

Biemiller warned of "a fatal flaw" in a provision for planning funds for rural community development. As presently written, he said, "it does not provide adequate protections against plant piracy, and thus could easily be used to establish new industries under non-union conditions in rural areas."

He submitted to the subcommittee, a unit of the House Banking & Currency Committee, suggested language to close the loophole. "With such protection," he said, "this section will have our full support."

Biemiller endorsed a number of other provisions of the bill, including appointment of an additional assistant secretary in the Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs to upgrade research into urban problems.

He urged the committee also to authorize immediate release of $750 million in urban renewal funds, which under present law could not be committed until July 1, 1968. It would not have any immediate budget impact, he assured the subcommittee, because of the necessary time lag between planning and construction of urban renewal projects.

NBC Radio to Air Drama on Gompers

A radio version of the widely-acclaimed television drama, "The Liquid Fire," will be broadcast over the NBC network at 12:30 p.m., EDT, Sunday, May 21, it was announced by Treas. Joseph D. Keenan of the George Meany Foundation.

The foundation, an arm of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute, each year underwrites the production of a program for the Eternal Light series, presented weekly by NBC and the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

"The Liquid Fire," written by John Vlahos, was first seen on NBC-TV last December 11, and drew enthusiastic reviews, Keenan said. The radio presentation will use the same performers: Leon Janney in the role of Samuel Gompers and Douglas Watson as his associate and narrator.

The play, sixth produced by the foundation for the series, deals with the efforts of Gompers in behalf of Latin American workers and international labor relations.

Local radio schedules should be consulted in areas outside New York City.

Meany Scores 'Compulsion' In Move to Bar Rail Strike

First Batch Of Petitions Given Mills

By David L. Perlman

"We, the undersigned, support Pres. Johnson's request to the Congress of the United States to raise social security benefits to a level that will more nearly equal needs . . ."

The "undersigned" were more than 150,000 men and women from all parts of the nation, whose petitions were presented to the House Ways & Means Committee as a "first installment," with assurances of more to come.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and a delegation of city central body leaders brought the stacks of signatures to Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.). He accepted them in a ceremony in the committee hearing room, where the 15 Democratic and 10 Republican members have been meeting in closed session considering the legislation.

The nationwide campaign to demonstrate public support for the Administration's social security bill was mounted earlier this spring by the AFL-CIO and senior citizen organizations. Mass rallies in principal cities opened the drive. And even as the presentation ceremony

Meany, Wirtz Testify:

Farm Worker Union Rights Pressed As 'Simple Justice'

"Simple justice" calls for giving farm workers the same right other workers have to organize and bargain with their employers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Congress.

Meany said farm workers have faced "firings, blacklists, yellowdog contracts, even arrest on trumped-up charges" when they have tried to organize.

He and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz urged a House Labor subcommittee to bring agricultural workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

Wirtz testified that the nation has "paid a high price" for excluding farm labor from collective bargaining laws.

"It has meant the consignment of millions of people to poverty," the secretary declared. He called on Congress to take the "proud step" of giving the right of union representation through NLRB procedures to "those who need it most."

Meany stressed that the bitter farm worker strikes of the past year have been primarily "for the fundamental right to bargain collectively." And he reminded the congressmen that no other group of workers in interstate commerce has had to strike for this right since 1935.

Meany and Wirtz endorsed legislation by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) which would make the Taft-Hartley Act applicable to agriculture and authorize the same form of pre-hire agreements presently permitted in the construction industry.

Meany told the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), that it is "just as un-American" to discriminate against workers because of their occupation as it is to discriminate because of race.

Yet this is what has been done, he declared.

"The men, women and children who work for wages on American farms have been excluded from the whole range of social reforms achieved in this country over two generations."

He pointed out that farm workers "suffer more than any other group from recurring unemployment," but are eligible for jobless benefits only in Hawaii and Puerto Rico. They work in one of "the most hazardous occupations," but are not covered by workmen's compensation in most states. Their wages are "the lowest of any group," but fewer than 30 percent are included under the wage-hour law and their wage floor will be 30 cents an hour lower than that of non-farm workers. They are largely outside the scope of social security, even though "they have no other means to provide against old age."

All these abuses, Meany declared,

Steel, Aluminum Unions Reach Mutual Aid Pact

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Steelworkers and the Aluminum Workers have signed a mutual assistance pact aimed at avoiding organizing conflicts and expanding cooperation between the two unions.

The agreement establishes a Joint Committee on Cooperation to carry out its provisions.

Citing "wasteful disputes and contests" on past occasions because of over-lapping jurisdictions within the aluminum industry, the unions pledged to "protect the established bargaining relationships of each union, and to implement and increase" their cooperation.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel and AWIU Pres. Eddie R. Stahl headed the teams that worked out the compact. Under its terms, the two unions agree to refrain, directly or indirectly, from organizing or representing employes for whom the other union "has an established bargaining relationship," to protect and defend each other against "raids or interference," to seek to avoid conflicts or competition in organizing and to exchange information and advice.

The agreement affirmed a previous understanding that AWIU will seek to organize the New Johnsonville, Tenn., plant of Consolidated Aluminum Corp., and USWA will seek to organize the Lewisport, Ky., plant of Harvey Aluminum.

Seizure Bill Urged As Alternative

By Eugene A. Kelly

The AFL-CIO will "vigorously oppose" Pres. Johnson's latest proposal for forced mediation of the railroad shopcraft dispute under a two-year no-strike law, Federation Pres. George Meany said.

The President asked Congress to prohibit a strike or a lockout while a five-member special board tries to settle the wage dispute over a 90-day period. If a settlement is not achieved voluntarily in that period, mandatory terms would then be imposed for at least two years.

In the final analysis, Meany said, the legislative proposal contained in the President's message "terminates in compulsory arbitration."

Declaring that the AFL-CIO is "steadfastly opposed" to the denial of the right to strike by the "imposition of otherwise unacceptable terms" of employment, Meany said "we shall therefore vigorously oppose this as well as any other legislative proposal" calling for compulsory arbitration.

"The workers involved in this dispute," he declared, are "simply seeking to exercise the rights assured them under the present law. If there is a paramount public in-

Printers Win Breakthrough At N.Y. News

New York — Union printers came to terms with the New York Daily News on major contract improvements they called "the best since 1946." The gains included pay increases totalling 20 percent over three years, a cost-of-living adjustment clause, a shorter workweek for night shifts and improved fringe benefits.

The agreement, subject to a membership vote at the end of 1967 negotiations here, was the first since 10 unions started talks with five daily newspaper companies four months ago, but a mediator cautioned "we're not home yet."

AMERICAN LABOR refuses to believe that world problems can be solved by appeasement. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 46th annual luncheon of the New York Building Congress.

Meany Opposes Moves To Appease Aggressors

New York—The American labor movement still will not buy the idea that the problems of the world can be solved through appeasement, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared here.

Speaking at the 46th annual luncheon of the New York Building Congress upon his return from the funeral of Konrad Adenauer in Bonn, Meany linked the late West German Chancellor's role in history with the United States commitment to freedom.

"Konrad Adenauer brought Germany back from the depths of despair to a new life," he observed. He pointed out that the German labor movement was rebuilt with American labor's help after World War II when "their country was flat on its back."

Post-War Aid

He hailed the role of the Marshall Plan as a measure which helped the Germans rebuild their nation, asserting that "there is nothing in history to compare with it." He characterized the German trade union movement as "strongest in the world outside the U.S."

"Why all this interest in Germany, France, Italy, Africa and other nations?" he asked. "The answer is simple. We have a selfish interest because we have a selfish interest in American life. Under our system we have been able to do more for those who work for wages than under any other system in the world. And we insist that the movement we help—whether it is in Africa or Cuba or anywhere else in the world—must be a free movement."

Meany scored those who would give the USSR extensive credit and cash loans. He asserted that the Soviet Union "has failed, and they need to be bailed out, but not by us for nothing."

"Let the Communists tear down the Wall of Shame that keeps 22 million people prisoners in Germany," he said. "Let them help build a united nation in Germany."

Meany was introduced by Peter J. Brennan, president of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council, who called him "one of the outstanding champions of the free world and organized labor's first international statesman."

Robert W. Cutler, a partner in the architectural firm of Skidmore, Owings and Merrill, was re-elected president of the Congress.

A highlight of the luncheon was the presentation of a certificate of appreciation to Mechanics Institute in recognition of having trained more than 150,000 men to become more proficient in their trade. The Congress also contributed a $1,000 check to the institute, which is the oldest free technical school in the United States.

New Zealand Union Waves a Greeting

Wellington, N. Z.—The American flag, flying from the Wellington Harbor headquarters of the Laborers Union of New Zealand, greeted U.S. Ambassador John F. Henning when he arrived here to take up his post.

The American embassy is directly across the harbor from the union's headquarters. Gen. Sec. Peter Butler of the union said the display was intended to honor the former U.S. under secretary of labor on his arrival.

Social Agency Union Seeking Recognition

New York—The employes of a private social agency who each year give aid to thousands of needy families have appealed to the city government to help them win recognition for their union.

The union is Community & Social Agency Employes Local 1707, whose executive director, Benjamin Bially, charged the plight of the members is due to "the utter shortsightedness of our state legislators in excluding non-profit workers from protection of the State Labor Act."

The employer is the non-profit Association for Homemaker Service, Inc., which provides housekeeper services to families whose head is indisposed. Bially says management refuses even to discuss recognition with the union even though nearly 100 percent of the 160 housekeepers, professional social workers and clerks have signed authorization cards.

The union is asking the city to intervene "in this completely wanton conflict" because it provides a large part of the agency's funds, he added. Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) has been urged also to issue "an executive order defining policy with respect to labor obligations of non-profit organizations supported by public funds."

"With the homemakers earning $1.50 an hour and other workers far below accepted standards," Bially said, "they are convinced that union recognition is the only way they can improve their conditions."

'Realistic, Logical':

URW Vows Fight For Contract Goals

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers, on strike against three of the Big 4 rubber companies at 39 plants in 36 cities, have a bargaining program that is "realistic, logical and attainable" and the union will continue to fight to get it, URW Pres. Peter Bommarito said here.

Contract talks continued as 50,000 pickets kept marching at plants of Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal, formerly the U.S. Rubber Co., but no immediate settlement seemed in sight, the union reported.

The strikes started Apr. 21. Employes of Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., fourth major tire firm, continued to work on a day-to-day basis without a contract. Workers at a Goodyear hose plant in North Chicago, Ill., struck briefly, but returned to their jobs after visiting other Goodyear locations.

Meanwhile, a Goodyear progress report to company executives on the negotiations was made public. It said the company had offered a two-year package of 23.5 cents an hour for tire plant workers, 18 cents for others.

Firestone and Uniroyal acknowledged that they had made similar offers.

Bommarito had said previously, without spelling out the terms, that the wage offer was inadequate. He called the lower offer for non-tire employes "an attempt to divide the union."

The Goodrich report said the firm had offered "liberal" improvements in the supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) program, but Bommarito said the "offer" was in the area of a fraction of a cent.

The URW has asked the Big 4 firms to make the SUB program the base for a new Full Employment Earnings Program (FEEP) giving laid-off workers 92.5 percent of their regular wages. Bommarito put the cost of FEEP at 2 to 3 cents an hour.

Goodrich said it offered to give one-year employes two weeks of vacation. It now takes three years of work to get two weeks of vacation.

Management said it offered to make numerous changes in contract language, but Bommarito said satisfactory working conditions are a major objective of the strikers—perhaps more important than substantial wage increases, with neither yet achieved.

Talks have started between the URW and the General Tire Co., fifth major firm. The contract deadline is May 15 but no progress was reported there, either.

The companywide strikes are the first since 1965, when the Uniroyal chain was shut down for six days. The same firm was closed in 1959, along with Firestone and Goodrich.

Current strikes involve wages, vacations, holidays and working conditions. Agreements on pensions, health and welfare are up for renegotiation next August.

Gillen Gets Award For Guild Service

The Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild's Arthur Riordan Memorial Award has been presented to Pres. William A. Gillen of the Insurance Workers "for his service to the Guild and the trade union movement in the cause of providing a partnership for progress between labor and management."

The award is given annually to a person who has made a major contribution in the field of labor-management relations. It pays tribute to the memory of the late president of the Washington Guild, in 1956 and 1957, who also was president of the Philadelphia-Camden Guild from 1941 to 1946 and was publicity director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at the time of his death in 1959.

Oil Workers Establish Human Relations Unit

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers announced the establishment of a new human relations committee and invited any member who believes he has been discriminated against on the job to file a complaint with it.

Set up by the OCAW executive board, the committee held its first meeting here and proclaimed its intention of wiping out "any vestiges of discrimination" that may exist under the union's contracts.

OCAW Vice Pres. Anthony Sabatine, chairman of the new committee, said the group will not only deal with civil rights issues but also hopes to aid any member whose work is affected by educational handicaps or other problems.

At the first meeting, OCAW Counsel John Tadlock reported the negotiation of a satisfactory settlement on behalf of Negro members covered by a contract with Monsanto Chemical Co. at El Dorado, Ark. When members complained they were being denied promotion because of discrimination in job bidding charts in the plant contract, the parties rewrote the agreement to correct the complaint. Several Negro members obtained promotions and pay increases, and no court action was necessary, Tadlock said.

Most such provisions were dropped from OCAW contracts in the past but the committee will investigate any complaint of contract violation or discrimination, according to Sabatine.

He reported that all OCAW district councils have established human relations committees to promote equal treatment and opportunity among members. The international committee and the OCAW education department will help local committees circulate information about such programs and police union compliance with fair employment practice laws, he said.

Union Schools Sought

Legislative-Citizenship Dir. Anthony Mazzocchi has been assigned to investigate the availability of funds and assistance from the federal government for education, training and job upgrading programs. He will report his findings and the OCAW committee hopes to establish union-sponsored schools to upgrade the education and skills of members in need of such help, Sabatine announced.

Most OCAW members have had high school training but some need further schooling in reading, writing and arithmetic to qualify for better jobs, he said.

Apprenticeship Rolls Reach 18-Year High

The number of persons training in government-registered apprenticeship programs rose to an 18-year high in 1966.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz reported that 207,000 apprentices were receiving skilled training in programs registered with the Labor Dept. or with state apprenticeship agencies at the end of the year.

He said the 1966 figure was the highest "since the influx of veterans in the immediate post-World War II period replenished the war-starved ranks of apprentices."

The net increase of 23,700 apprentices between 1965 and 1966 was the largest since the 1945-46 period when the one-year gain was 74,200.

The Labor Dept. also cited these other statistics:

- The 85,000 new apprentices registered in 1966 was a 19-year high and 16,500 more than in 1965.
- Last year 26,400 trainees completed their apprenticeships, the largest number in five years and 6 percent more than in 1965.
- With a nationwide 11 percent net increase in the number of apprentices, the eight states with the biggest gains were: Illinois, up 31 percent; Indiana, 30 percent; Michigan, 27 percent; Ohio, 23 percent; Connecticut, 20 percent; Wisconsin, 18 percent; Texas, 17 percent, and Pennsylvania, 14 percent.

Wirtz cited "these solid and growing advances" as indicating "the vitality of labor and management in this training system."

The Labor Dept.'s role, he said, is to help unions and employers expand the apprenticeship system and assure equal opportunity in its functioning.

Seizure Called Fairer:

'Compulsion' Scored In Rail Dispute Plan

terest in the continued operation of the railroads, sufficient to override the rights and freedoms of the workers employed by these private corporations, then the railroads should be operated for the public interest and not for private profit."

The Federation considers legislation to seize the railroads pending a settlement as "the fairest and least oppressive alternative," Meany said.

"We are convinced," he added, "that the only thing now standing in the way of an early negotiated settlement is the belief of the railroad lobby that compulsory arbitration legislation will be forthcoming to relieve them of the obligation to bargain in good faith."

Kennedy Stand Cited

The President's message to Congress asserted that the dispute does not warrant seizure. He recalled that when Pres. Kennedy was "confronted with a similar situation" in 1963 he rejected seizure "as creating complex legal and financial problems for the government and as merely postponing the day of reckoning."

Johnson said seizure "would also be offensive to the equities involved in the present situation."

At a news conference the day before he submitted his no-strike proposal, the President sketched the broad outlines of the plan and said he did not plan to recommend either compulsory arbitration or seizure.

His message to Congress said a nationwide strike of 157,000 rail mechanics would result in "intolerable injury" and disruption to the economy.

The new legislation would restrict the right of the six railroad unions to strike for a wage increase they claim is long overdue. Strike deadlines of Apr. 13 and May 3 were authorized by vote of members of the unions—the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. But these were extended by Congress at the request of the President—the last time on Apr. 28, when Johnson signed a bill postponing the no-strike period to June 19.

The President's message urged the railroads and unions to "finish this job themselves." It is within their power, he said, to "close the gap in this case by heeding the call of their country to reason together."

What is needed now, the President continued, is a "procedure to complete collective bargaining, not to replace it—to bridge the remaining gap this bargaining has not closed."

Johnson asked Congress to pass a joint resolution authorizing him to appoint a five-member special board for a 90-day period.

"All will be public members," he wrote, but "I intend to appoint one member with a management background and one member with a labor background."

He gave this timetable:

● For the first 30 days, the board would engage in "intensive mediation" with the parties to "encourage and stimulate" a final settlement of the issues in dispute.

● Beginning on the 31st day, if no agreement has been reached, the board would hold hearings to determine whether the proposals made Apr. 21 by a special presidential panel are "in the public interest, are a fair and equitable extension" of collective bargaining, "protect the bargaining process and fulfill the purposes of the Railway Labor Act."

● By the 60th day, if there is still no agreement, the board would give the President and Congress its findings on the special panel proposals and whether any modifications were deemed necessary.

● If by the 91st day there is still no agreement, the special panel proposals plus any modifications believed necessary would take effect and remain in effect until the parties reach agreement or until Jan. 1, 1969, at the latest.

For the period after that, Johnson said, and until final agreement is reached or the time specified by the board expires, the board's determination would have the same effect, including the "preclusion of resort to strike or lockout," as though arrived at by agreement of the parties under the rail labor act.

The shopcraft unions served their first proposals on the railroads May 17, 1966. They asked for a 20 percent pay increase, an escalator clause tied to the cost of living, improved fringe benefits and an "inequity" increase to bring skilled craftsmen closer to the wage levels of skilled men in the aircraft and other industries.

Management offered the crafts the same 5 percent increase agreed upon with other unions, which it increased slightly after the dispute went through all stages of mediation and fact-finding by a three-member emergency board and a special panel. The Congress-ordered extensions and the President's legislative proposal followed rejection of the panel recommendations by both the carriers and the crafts.

Reviewing the history of the dispute, Johnson said, "It is . . . a record of collective bargaining almost doing its job—narrowly failing—but coming close enough to offer clear guidance for the completion of the task."

Remaining Issues

The remaining dispute, he said, is "principally about narrow differences regarding the amount of the general increase, about the amount—but not the principle—of an inequity adjustment covering journeymen and mechanics, and about the length of the contract period."

All Americans believe in the right of management to "healthy profits" and of workers to a "just and bountiful wage," Johnson said, but "there comes a time when the interest of management and the interest of labor must be the public interest."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, at a White House briefing following release of the President's message, denied that it called for compulsory arbitration. He described the proposal as "extended collective bargaining and mediation with finality," which he called "entirely different" from forced arbitration.

Wirtz called the parties the "keystone to settlement" but admitted that if they do not reach agreement the government, or a group of "outsiders," would set the final contract terms. Wirtz predicted, however, that agreement would be reached before the 90th day of the new mediation process.

Major Bargaining Gains Highlight Shoe Union Convention Report

Miami Beach, Fla.—The United Shoe Workers have scored the greatest victories in their embattled history during the last six months of bargaining, Pres. George O. Fecteau told the union's triennial convention here.

Fecteau cited as major advances wage increases of 18 to 20 cents an hour, three-week vacations after 10 to 12 years of service, improvement of pensions and other fringe benefits and the strengthening of contract clauses dealing with adjustment to automation.

One of the factors involved in the advances, Fecteau observed, is that management appeared "less resistant" to union demands than in past negotiations.

Fecteau reported that the union's membership has increased by 20 percent since 1964 and that merger talks with the Boot & Shoe Workers, instituted the same year, are continuing. Things are at a standstill, he reported, because of "a number of hard-core problems we have not succeeded in solving."

Fecteau warned, however, that rising imports threaten to wipe out the U.S. shoe industry unless Congress acts to boost tariffs.

Millions of Imports

"During 1966 this country imported 100 million pairs of shoes, excluding rubber shoes. That represented 16 percent of the total domestic production. It also represented an increase of 29.6 percent over the previous year."

The bulk of the imports came from Japan, Italy, Spain and France—some of it from the plants of American manufacturers who opened up abroad in order to take advantage of wages as low as 40 cents an hour in Japan and 78 cents in Italy, Fecteau observed. The U.S. average, he said, is $2.40.

"The saddest thing about it," he said, "is that the consumer is not getting the benefit of the cheap labor being used in Europe and the Orient. Consumers are paying just as much for imported shoes as they do for American-mades. The retailers are benefiting greatly because they are getting a much higher mark-up."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the convention that the United States is "on the threshold of great fulfillment" as a result of socially-oriented legislation enacted over the past few years.

Graduates of the Job Corps and the Neighborhood Youth Corps who once cost the taxpayers money are beginning to work and contribute to society, Schnitzler said; medicare is saving lives and averting hardship for the elderly; and these and other "great multipliers of good are beginning to spread a wealth of healthier, better educated, poverty-liberated Americans among us."

"We can be proud of the great programs that have been initiated with our help," he continued. "We can be pleased by the great good already flowing from these programs, but I must caution you that these programs are not above and beyond the swift blade of emasculation. . . . It is now up to us and all other Americans to see that these programs are fully carried out."

The convention was scheduled to act on some 40 resolutions that aside from those dealing with industry problems reflected support for the stands taken by the AFL-CIO Executive Board at its meeting in February.

Glass Union Cites Buying Power Lag

Philadelphia—The Glass Bottle Blowers will seek wage raises in negotiations "to offset past price increases that have washed out part of the buying power of our members' earnings," the union's executive board declared here.

Strikers Stand Firm, Push Kingsport Boycott

Kingsport, Tenn.—The strike against Kingsport Press is still on. So is labor's boycott of books produced by strikebreakers, the Allied Kingsport Press Unions announced here.

"We're still picketing," said Pres. Earl Derrick and Sec.-Treas. R. W. Ayres of the allied unions, who started their walkout against the nation's biggest hard-book printing plant on Mar. 11, 1963. They added:

"Nothing's changed. We still depend on the boycott to bring Kingsport Press management back to the bargaining table with a decent settlement offer. We are staying right on the picket line."

Over the strikers' protest, the National Labor Relations Board conducted an election Apr. 5. Most strikers were not permitted to vote, but when the vote count was announced three weeks later management issued a statement saying the strike had ended.

While the pickets continued to march, union attorneys asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to set aside the election and return the issue to the National Labor Relations Board.

"We charge we were denied due process," Atty. John S. McLellan said. "The unions won an NLRB election in 1964 and were certified again as the authorized bargaining agents. That authorization still stands unless the employer can demonstrate that he has a good faith doubt of their majority.

"He did not so demonstrate and, when we offered to prove his lack of a reasonable doubt or a change in the facts, the NLRB refused to hear arguments."

Even if the legal battle turns against the unions and they are ruled decertified, they have the right to carry on informational picketing and a don't-buy campaign, McLellan declared.

The strike involves more than 1,000 members of the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers & Electrotypers, Machinists and Typographers who struck the Kingsport firm after all attempts to gain an equitable contract failed and the employer refused arbitration.

The 1965 convention of the AFL-CIO pledged the labor movement's "continuing and added support" of the strikers and endorsed these steps to counter management's union-busting tactics:

● The boycott of books produced by strikebreakers.

● Efforts to prevent the use of public funds for textbooks and encyclopedias produced "under substandard and anti-social conditions" and paid for in large part from the tax dollars of workers.

● Appeals to publishers to stop doing business with Kingsport Press and the censuring of those who continue to do so.

Since then the unions and the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. have pressed the boycott campaign and encouraged all unions to support the strikers. School boards in several cities voted not to use Kingsport Press products if books of equal value were available.

EAGER INTEREST of participants reflects the success of the Citizen Apprenticeship Program that enabled Madison, Wis., high school juniors to learn about community social services and facilities. Some of the students who gave up eight Saturday mornings are questioning Sec.-Treas. William A. Moreth of Retail Clerks Local 1401, which co-sponsored the program with the Community Chest, following one of the lectures.

Local Gives Students Training in Citizenship

Madison, Wis.—Thirty-two members of junior classes in Madison high schools voluntarily gave up the right to sleep late on eight consecutive Saturdays to join in a Citizen Apprenticeship Program sponsored by Retail Clerks Local 1401.

The program aimed to make young men and women of high school better informed as to the social services and facilities available in the community and to stimulate a desire to play a part in community affairs.

The students met in headquarters of the United Community Chest, which co-sponsored the program with Local 1401. They heard about the area's health, welfare and recreational agencies from speakers directly connected with their day-to-day operations. After a talk of about an hour they took a short break, then returned for 20 minutes or so of discussion in small groups.

The morning ended with a half-hour question and answer session with the speaker.

In addition, field trips were scheduled.

High school juniors were picked for the program in the belief that they would have more time than seniors preparing for graduation and because they might still be considering careers in social work. It was first presented in social studies classes, and those accepted had to have the approval of their parents and their school officials.

The students were universally enthusiastic about the program. And the speakers were just as impressed by the youngsters' acuity and sharp questioning.

The program was developed with the aid of Jack Bretl, labor liaison with the Community Welfare Council, and Peter Voeller, national RCIA community relations director.

Those who completed the course were presented with certificates of recognition at a luncheon in the Labor Temple addressed by Voeller, Mayor Otto Festge, Pres. Charles F. Eikel, Jr., of the Community Chest and John D. Carney, AFL-CIO Community Services Activities liaison with the United Community Funds & Councils of America, New York.

Fair Housing Drive Seeks Acceptance

New York—Action to mobilize community campaigns for acceptance of fair housing was outlined at a regional conference of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing that drew some 450 activists from the Northeast.

Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, who is NCDH secretary, was chairman of a workshop on citizen action for desegregation in relation to government housing programs in which participants reviewed local experiences and explored practical approaches.

Two pioneers of the fair housing movement, former NCDH Pres. Charles Abrams of New York and Judge Loren Miller of Los Angeles, a regional vice president, were honored at a dinner at which Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), the principal speaker, said the Senate will pass the Fair Housing bill this year if its friends muster enough support.

Bundles Presented to Mills:

Petitions Spur Wide Support For Stronger Social Security

was being held, additional bundles of signed petitions were arriving at federation headquarters.

After being shown to Mills, the petitions were brought to the congressmen from the home districts of the signers. They will later be deposited with the Ways & Means Committee.

The legislation the petitioners were supporting would provide — in the words used by Pres. Johnson in his filmed address to the AFL-CIO rallies — these major benefits.

- "A 20 percent overall increase in social security payments.
- "An increase of 59 percent for the 2.5 million citizens now receiving minimum benefits.
- "An increase of at least 15 percent for the remaining 20.5 million beneficiaries.
- "A monthly payment of at least $150 for couples and $100 for individuals with 25 years of coverage.
- "A series of amendments to broaden and improve the protection of social security."

The higher benefits would be financed through gradual increases in the social security tax paid by employers and workers and an increase in the taxable wage base.

Meany told the Ways & Means Committee at earlier public hearings that the President's proposals represent "a long step toward the kind of social security system the American people should have." He said the 20 percent average increase would be "a substantial down payment" toward a needed 50 percent rise in benefits, which in the long run should be paid for in part out of general tax revenue.

Republicans on the Ways & Means Committee have proposed an 8 percent increase in benefits. Commenting on the GOP plan, Meany said: "Its inadequacy is appalling."

The group which took the petitions to Capitol Hill included Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman, and these central body representatives: Thomas E. Faul, Chicago; Sigmund Arywitz, Los Angeles; Joseph Clark, St. Louis; Harry Van Arsdale, Morris Iushewitz and Thomas Van Arsdale of New York; Sebastian Lupica and Louis Eiben, Cleveland; Lawrence C. Sullivan and Valentine Murphy, Boston; J. F. Friedrich, Milwaukee; A. P. Stoddard and C. J. Stephens, New Orleans, and Max B. Brydenthal, Indianapolis.

Mills met with each of the city delegations and in accepting the petitions from Meany said the AFL-CIO president has "never done or said anything that's not in the best interests of the working people."

The message of "back home" support for the social security bill was also brought to other members of Congress by the central body delegation at a reception in the AFL-CIO building.

Doctors Urged to Shun 'Marketplace' Approach

Kansas City, Mo.—Any physician who really thinks that anyone in the United States can get good medical care was challenged by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman to put himself into the shoes of the less affluent the next time he becomes ill.

"You might try going down to your nearest hospital out-patient clinic and evaluate for yourself the kind of care you will receive," Seidman told the State Officers Conference of the American Academy of General Practice.

"Hard benches, long waits, almost incredible indifference characterize the charity medicine you will find there. Any sense of continuity or management of the patient's problem is totally lacking in the great majority of our hospital out-patient clinics."

Seidman emphasized points of mutual interest "which, if we both recognize them, can lead to better understanding and better cooperation." But he also said he felt that the medical profession's dignity "has scarcely been enhanced" by the "uncritical" use of slogans such as "free choice of doctor," "the sanctity of the doctor-patient relationship" and "socialized medicine."

"We consumers are increasingly recognizing the empty meaning and even the deceptiveness of these slogans," he said.

Seidman cited the recent action of the Montgomery County (Md.) Medical Society, in the Washington, D. C., suburban area, in denying membership to any doctor who receives less than half his income from fees for service. This action, he said, denies both membership and hospital privileges to Group Health Association physicians practicing in the county.

"In other words," said Seidman, "the consumer who freely chooses to join a prepayment plan or a group of doctors who freely choose to participate in such a plan are ostracized by the medical society on other than professional grounds. Is this 'free choice,' or does it simply mean 'you do it our way or not at all?' "

Too Many Corners Cut

He expressed concern over the "apparent increase in the marketplace orientation" of many physicians charging flatly that "too many doctors are cutting too many professional corners in the interests of volume operation." The result, he said is that "the care they give their patients is suffering and sooner or later the patients find it out."

"Is there really a professional reason for opposing a system of prepayment by which the consumer pays the doctor so much money per month to keep him well in lieu of a fee-for-service payment when he becomes sick?" he asked.

The challenge facing organized labor in future bargaining on health benefits, Seidman said, is "to broaden our concern so that we have assurance that we are getting the right medical care and the best possible medical care and are receiving it as efficiently as feasible.

"For this security, we look to the medical profession," he said. "That is why I think you will find that more and more of our unions will be asking you for assurance that you have adopted procedures to enforce your own professional standards.

N.Y. Printers Score Breakthrough, Win 20% Hike in Daily News Pact alone, turned its attention next to the New York Times.

Other unions continued their own bargaining efforts in pursuit of a settlement acceptable to their members — 13,000 full-time and 4,000 part-time employes of the World Journal Tribune, Times, News, Long Island Press and Long Island Star-Journal, the latter two owned by one publisher — S. I. Newhouse.

The other unions are the Newspaper Guild, Deliverers, Mailers, Stereotypers, Photo Engravers, Paper Handlers, Printing Pressmen, Machinists and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Their contracts expired Mar. 30 but they stayed on the job in hopes of avoiding a strike.

Powers Hopeful

Local 6 Pres. Bertram A. Powers said after a meeting with Times negotiators: "It shouldn't take long to wrap up a settlement here."

The Daily News terms, he said, would provide 1,040 ITU members with the "biggest gains" won by any newspaper union since the "Little Steel formula" and the 20 percent pay hikes achieved at the end of World War II. He added: "It was the best contract that could be achieved without a strike."

The printers reported the details of the News offer at a meeting of the other unions here. Executive Sec. Charles A. McNally of the Allied Printing Trades Council said "they approved it but made it clear that it was in no way binding on the others."

Chairman Thomas J. Murphy of the Newspaper Trades Union Council predicted "it may take all summer before the final contract is signed" but, despite all obstacles, "I see an eventual settlement without a strike."

The other unions, Murphy said, have been "waiting in the wings" until the printers settled for:

- A three-year contract providing wage hikes of 8 percent the first year, plus 6 percent in each of the next two years. On the present day shift scale of $151.85 a week, the pay of News printers would rise to a new third-year scale of $184.27.
- A cost-of-living adjustment if the government's Consumer Price Index rises more than 4 percent at the end of the first and second years.
- A half-hour reduction of the workweek on the night shift, now 35 hours, and the lobster or overnight shift, now 33 and three quarter hours. In each case six minutes would be shaved off the daily work shift.
- Fringe benefits valued at $2 a week, including a day of sick leave for every 22 days worked, up to a maximum of five days leave; a boost in employer-paid life insurance from $1,000 to $5,000; increased employer contributions to the health and welfare fund amounting to 86 cents a week, and a vacation credit of one day for each 12 days worked by extra printers.

The tentative pact also provides an increase in severance pay from three weeks to eight in the event of a shutdown, a citywide fund to which publishers would contribute for using press association tape to set stock market tables, improvements in pensions including an increase of $6 a month in the contract plan with no deduction from the benefits under the separate company plan, and a "no deviation" clause that prohibits the union from offering more favorable terms to one publisher than another.

The latter clause was included in the proposed contract at the insistence of the News, according to Powers. He explained: "If we offer anything more favorable to one publisher, all the others are entitled to it automatically."

Fringes Separate

The cost of fringe increases will not be deducted from wage increases, Powers asserted.

The settlement was reached after almost daily and nightly negotiations over a six-week period with the help of a team of mediators including Theodore W. Kheel, representing Mayor John V. Lindsay (R), plus federal and state mediators.

Kheel said the News agreement will "undoubtedly speed up the other negotiations," but he cautioned that "we shouldn't assume that everything is set."

The News made two previous proposals which Local 6 bargainers turned down as "insufficient" and "mis-stated." In the final four weeks of negotiations News printers held chapel meetings during their scheduled shifts to hear reports from Powers and other officers.

Wage Gap Narrows In Agriculture Jobs

Farm wages have been rising at a faster rate than industrial wages since Congress halted the large-scale importation of foreign workers in 1964.

An article in the April issue of Monthly Labor Review, Bureau of Labor Statistics publication, cites the narrowing of the wage gap as one of the massive changes in the farm labor area during recent years.

Besides the switch away from imported labor on the big factory farms, there have been the first breakthroughs in union organization of farm workers, the stepped-up pace of mechanization of agriculture, and the continuing decline in the number of farms and the percentage of the workforce employed in agriculture.

The article, by Phyllis Groom, covers data and viewpoints expressed at a three-day Labor Dept. conference in San Francisco early this year, which was attended by union and employer representatives as well as government and university experts.

A key paragraph notes:

"With the agricultural work force declining about 4 percent a year and foreign worker competition for jobs eliminated, wages have risen 15 percent in the last two years—a period when industrial wages have increased 10 percent, reversing a longtime trend toward widening the gap."

This does not, of course, mean that farm workers have been receiving higher pay raises than industrial workers in dollar and cents terms, since a 10-cent raise is obviously a much bigger percentage increase on a $1-an-hour wage than on a $2.50 base.

In California, the state which was the largest user of imported "bracero" labor and which has been the focus of farm worker organizing efforts, farm pay rose only 3 cents an hour from 1963 to 1964, the last year braceros were used.

The increase the following year was an average of 9 cents an hour and last year's increase averaged 13 cents.

Since the expiration of the bracero program, foreign farm workers can be brought to the United States only through a provision in the immigration law that allows temporary entrance when the secretary of labor certifies the need and determines it would not have an "adverse effect" on U.S. workers.

Employers seeking to import farm workers are required to offer domestic workers wages not less than rates specified by the secretary of labor on a state-by-state basis.

The latest rate schedule, which took effect Apr. 1, ranges from $1.35 to $1.60 an hour.

Wage-Hour Coverage

This year, for the first time, a substantial group of workers employed on large farms will be covered by a $1-an-hour federal minimum wage, rising in two annual steps to $1.30.

A perhaps more significant breakthrough—although on a smaller scale—took place in New Jersey, where coverage under the state minimum wage was extended to farm workers. The New Jersey minimum this year is $1.25 an hour and will rise to $1.50 in 1969.

The Monthly Labor Review article stresses the growing mechanization of the farm. It quotes a newspaper description of mechanization already in use, as follows:

"Now, machines usually straddle a row and pick ripe fruit by dislodging it from its stem with an air or water stream, or by vacuum, or by fingers that jiggle the vine."

And it quotes an economist for a farm implement firm as predicting that a distinguishing feature of rural America in the year 2000 will be towers containing television scanners to keep an eye on robot tractors.

XimenesAppointed To Job Bias Unit

Vicente T. Ximenes of Albuquerque, N.M., deputy director of the Agency for Intl. Development mission in Panama, has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to one of two vacancies on the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Ximenes won the Distinguished Flying Cross while serving in the Army Air Force, was a research economist and instructor at the University of New Mexico, served on the Democratic National Committee staff and joined the AID in 1965.

Thompson Asks Congress To Redeem 1935 Pledge

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee considering legislation giving farm workers collective bargaining rights, opened the hearings with these comments:

The purpose of this bill is to grant to agricultural laborers the right to organize and bargain collectively under the National Labor Relations Act.

As originally conceived and written, the act would have applied to agricultural labor. When wide opposition to the bill as a whole arose, the bill managers deleted its applicability to agriculture to minimize the controversy. On the floor of the House, they argued that the exclusion was necessary for the survival of the bill but promised that once the bill was passed, Congress would return "to take care of the farm workers." That promise was never kept.

Today, after 32 years of waiting, the farm labor movement has taken matters into its own hand. Farm workers, by striking, picketing and boycotting, have attempted to gain for themselves what Congress denied them in 1935: the right to organize and bargain collectively through a certified union. Their efforts have met with some success recently, but the price has been high—for the growers, for the laborers, and for the public.

The legislation we are considering . . . would eliminate the present need to resort to strikes and work stoppages merely to get to the bargaining table. In short, it would replace chaos with law.

Union Rights Pressed For Farm Workers

"cry out for correction." But "not only are farm workers denied the help of all the other laws enacted to benefit workers; they are even denied the effective right to help themselves" through collective bargaining.

He urged Congress to look at the agricultural industry "the way it is today, not the way it was yesterday."

He suggested that the "pretty picture" of the family farmer with a hired hand who ate at the family table "was most influential in excluding farm workers from the legal protections that were being won by other workers."

If there still are any such farms, Meany said, they wouldn't be affected by the legislation anyway under NLRB standards. The facts are, he added, "half of all the farms in the United States employ no farm labor at all. A mere 2.7 percent pay half the farm wages; and 6 percent of the farms account for 76 percent of the wage bill."

The small farmer, Meany stressed, "is threatened, not by higher wages and better conditions for farm labor, but by the perpetuation of low wages and miserable conditions." He is competing, in his own labor, "with the exploited workers hired by the corporation farmers, the factories in the fields."

Meany noted that "the AFL-CIO has supported every major bill designed to help farmers — even when its opponents argued that farm subsidies were against our interest because they raised prices. We supported these farm bills because we have never looked for bargains at the expense of some other group, or against the national interest."

No Subsidy

The O'Hara bill, he pointed out, "offers no subsidies to farm workers. It carries with it no appropriation. It is not special legislation: on the contrary, it is a bill to do away with special legislation."

Meany warned that "continued denial" of labor law coverage to farm workers "will lead to more strikes by farm workers who have no other recourse. Its continuance will help to perpetuate the shocking poverty—even degradation—of the men and women, and shamefully the children, who harvest so much of the food and fiber upon which the nation depends."

Wirtz told the subcommittee that inclusion of farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act would affect only 3 percent of the nation's farms.

He said the mobility of farm labor is not a valid argument against coverage of farm workers, that it in fact increases the need for coverage. Construction workers also move from employer to employer, Wirtz noted, and the legislation would apply the same collective bargaining machinery used in the construction industry to agriculture.

Labor Groups Sponsor Youth Aid Projects

Approval of two labor-sponsored Neighborhood Youth Corps projects which will provide work experience for 160 young men and women has been announced by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

The West Virginia and Morgantown (W.Va.) AFL-CIO central bodies received approval for a grant of $249,450. The project will give 80 out-of-school boys and 20 girls 16 to 21 years old six hours of remedial education a week and experience as aides in 16 different work classifications.

The enrollees will be drawn from Magnolia and Preston Counties, an area that includes Morgantown.

A federal grant of $80,140 was cleared for another project, sponsored by the Dubuque, Ia., AFL-CIO, to provide summer work experience for 35 out-of-school young men and 25 girls.

Recruitment will be through the local U.S. Employment Service and local welfare and probation offices, in cooperation with the sponsor. The services of other agencies will be utilized if needed.

Training will be given as aides in six work classifications—hospital, maintenance, library, clerical, mechanic and teacher.

AFL-CIO Cites Urgency Of Air Pollution Curb

"The problem of air pollution is not being solved. It is growing worse," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller warned at Senate hearings.

Biemiller stressed the urgency of the stepped-up pollution control program sought by Pres. Johnson, including federal standards for industries that are major sources of pollution, regional air quality commissions, and expanded research funds.

At a separate House hearing on the progress of the federal water pollution control program, Biemiller urged a streamlining of the procedure for federal grants to help cities and towns improve sewage facilities.

He reported complaints of "glacial slowness" in processing applications and "bureaucratic bottlenecks" at the Washington level.

He strongly urged that Congress appropriate the full $450 million authorized for water pollution control, rather than the $200 million sought in the Administration budget. He termed the $450 million figure "a rock bottom minimum" which would still fall short of the need.

On both the air and water pollution programs, Biemiller expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to any special tax benefits to industries that install pollution control equipment. Such business expenses, he noted, are already generously covered by federal tax treatment of business investment and depreciation and should not be further subsidized by the taxpayers.

The air pollution bill before the Senate subcommittee would provide for federal industry standards on pollution in cases where states did not have equal or more stringent standards of their own.

It would authorize the secretary of health, education and welfare to set up regional air quality commissions—either at the request of states involved or, in the absence of state action, wherever necessary to protect the public health or welfare.

Biemiller stressed that in the years ahead "more people will be driving more cars, consuming more electric power, buying more manufactured products, creating more wastes to be disposed of."

Present air pollution problems, he warned, will inevitably become "even greater and more complex."

On water pollution, he noted that federal agencies sometimes are as great offenders as private industry and urged that the government "clean up its own house."

He said the American people want their rivers, lakes and streams cleaned up. "The water pollution program, which raised such hopes when enacted last year, must not be allowed to be stalled by lack of funds, inadequate trained manpower, slack or cumbersome enforcement, overlapping responsibilities, and bureaucratic inefficiency."

Tax Lures to Industry Called Self-Defeating

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations warned state and local governments that special tax concessions to new industries can boomerang.

The bipartisan commission, established by Congress, includes governors, mayors, county officials, state and federal legislators and public members.

It warned that special tax concessions—often used to lure new industry—can result in "a self-defeating cycle of competitive tax undercutting and irrational discriminations among business firms."

An earlier report by the commission, in a related area, had expressed concern over the use of industrial development bonds to offer "public tax-exempt financing for the benefit of firms well able to finance their expansion." It said the bad features of such bonds outweigh the possible assets, and said safeguards against abuse "are absolutely essential."

Stamping Out the Chiselers

COMPLAINTS of employer violations of the wage-hour law have nearly doubled in the months since the law has been broadened to cover millions more workers and increase the minimum wage.

A large number of these new complaints stem directly from the AFL-CIO's nationwide campaign to secure full and fair enforcement of the law.

When the new amendments to the wage-hour act took effect Feb. 1, 1967, the AFL-CIO alerted its state and local central bodies to the critical need to protect all workers covered by the act — union or non-union — from exploitation by chiseling employers.

Committees have been set up by AFL-CIO bodies across the land to help police the act, receive complaints and help assure prosecution of violators. The sharp rise in complaints filed in February and March 1967 over the same period a year ago is testimony to the initial effectiveness of the campaign.

But the task of policing the law, particularly as it affects nine million newly covered workers, is basically a job for the Labor Dept. Organized labor's role is to help search out and report violations, to put employers on notice that there is a force in the community concerned with and committed to the goal of securing for the lowest paid workers the wages they are entitled to by law.

If the union effort is backed by an expanded force of wage-hour law inspectors, the chiselers can be brought to heel. At present the inspection staff is spread thinly over the tens of thousands of places of employment where 41 million covered workers earn their living.

The immediate and pressing need is for enlargement of that inspection force with enough manpower provided to follow down every complaint, to check on every lead of a violation of the law.

A large staff of wage-hour inspectors coupled with the watch-dog role of the AFL-CIO committees can help make a reality of the wage-hour law for millions of workers who eke out a minimal existence at between $1 and $1.40 an hour.

A Myth Dispelled

THE MYTH of the "welfare loafers" has been brilliantly exploded by White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., in a recent speech demonstrating the application of systematic analysis and identification to major social problems.

Of the 7.3 million persons receiving federal welfare benefits, Califano said, only 50,000, or one out of every 145, is able to work or capable of receiving training for gainful employment. The rest are either over 65, children, mothers of small children, blind or otherwise disabled.

The concise and crisp identification of the welfare problem will help mightily to shift the discussion from the phony issue of "loafers and chiselers" to how to put the 50,000 capable of working on payrolls. The discussion must turn also to the need of bringing into the job market many of the mothers, possibly by providing day-care centers for their children.

Beyond the immediate problem of caring for those in need, however, the basic problem is to devise programs to prevent the future growth of welfare rolls. The identification of the problem and the dispelling of ancient myths is a necessary first step.

State AFL-CIO Leader Declares:

Backward Industrial Policies Retard Mississippi's Growth

The following is excerpted from an address by Claude Ramsay, president of the Mississippi AFL-CIO, at a conference at Jefferson Davis Junior College, Gulfport, Miss., entitled "Job Opportunities in Mississippi."

FEW STATES IN THE NATION have the natural resources of Mississippi. We have an abundance of water, timber, gas, oil and other minerals, and a climate conducive to plan production 365 days a year. Why, with all of the ingredients to become an industrial empire, do we find ourselves with the lowest per capita income of any state in the nation?

I would like to list those things I consider contributing factors. There is first of all the lack of educational opportunity. Another has been our preoccupation with the "race issue." This issue has transcended all aspects of our affairs and must be solved if we are to take our proper place in the nation.

The political history of our state has had much to do with our slow rate of industrial development. For many years the agrarian interests held tight political control and did everything possible to discourage industrial development. When the agrarian control was broken, the pendulum then swung to another extreme and that extreme exists today. Last, but not least, is our state's willingness to discourage the collective bargaining process.

The Research & Development Commission intends to raise the per capita income up to or above the national average by the year 2,000. It will be interesting to see how the commission proposes to do this job, if the state's current program to attract industry is allowed to stand. This program is formulated on wrong concepts and has a base of quicksand. If allowed to continue, it will further retard the state as time goes by.

Briefly, let us examine that program:

The risk of capital investment is relegated to local communities by an arrangement to float bond issues for plant construction and in some cases to equip those plants.

Industrial prospects are assured our people will work for substandard wages. This assurance is backed up by restrictive legislation such a "right-to-work" law.

Tax exemptions for ten years. These exemptions are usually extended through some kind of a ruse when the ten year period is up.

Low premiums on workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance are assured by restrictive legislation which limits benefits to the injured or unemployed worker.

In other words, the working people of this state are subsidizing a great deal of the industry located within our state's boundaries. This applies also to school teachers and many other public employes who are working for substandard wages and salaries.

THE TRAGEDY of our situation is that Mississippi's program to attract industry is attracting the wrong kind of industry. The gimmicks just described attract only low wage industry and, as a rule, an industry that is running away from an organized work force. Many communities throughout the state are now stagnated with an overload of this type of industry. Once these low wage industries locate in a community, they proceed to do everything possible to keep a high wage industry from locating in the area. They do not want competition in the labor market. Blue chip industries are not attracted by this program. They would prefer to invest their own capital and to pay their fair share of the tax burden.

It may take some time for the business community to discover the simple economic fact that the economy of this state is dependent to a large degree upon the purchasing power of the state's work force. An industrial program designed to attract low wage industry is just not going to get the job done.

The business community will eventually learn that one of our greatest needs is stable, high wage industry. This type of industry means unions and the collective bargaining process. It therefore follows that our state's attitude toward collective bargaining must be changed. Collective bargaining with organized labor must be encouraged and not discouraged as is currently being done in many areas of the state.

Providing job opportunities is just not enough. Those jobs must provide good wages, job security and decent working conditions. These are the objectives of organized labor and can be secured only as a result of collective bargaining and a sense of responsibility on the part of labor and management. The development of a skilled work force is essential if our state is to move forward. Such a work force can only be developed through a cooperative effort on the part of labor, management and our school systems.

Morgan Says:

Misguided Republican Scheme Threatens Federal School Aid

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

TWO YEARS AGO, for the first time in the nation's history, Congress began to provide federal aid to grade schools and high schools.

It was a massive belated blood transfusion against the educational anemia that has afflicted especially America's poor like an endemic disease for generations. This was no miracle drug and there were some mistakes in its application. But its needle was aimed at the right target: the vicious circle of ignorance in which the nation's needy are trapped. To improve themselves they need jobs. But to get and hold jobs they need training. In the past educational opportunities open to them have been strikingly limited, shockingly inferior and for the most part they have not been able to afford the extra training necessary to develop more than manual labor skills demanded by an increasingly specialized and mechanized economy.

Morgan

But this national help to the grass roots was a bright beginning to combat the blight. The bogeyman raised in the frightened, prejudiced minds of some of a big government brainwashing the population by dictating school curricula turned out to be a limp scarecrow.

Admittedly there has been some bureaucratic imperiousness and more red tape than necessary. Give an official the opportunity to circulate a form and he all too often is inclined to attach more importance to the form than the substance. This, of course, proves Parkinson's Law, that the more blanks there are to fill out, the emptier the efficiency.

The ingeniousness of the school aid legislation, however, lay in its ability to clear two bigger obstacles: the antagonisms of race and religion. It was a must, of course, that the federal law provide equality of educational benefits to Negro children. The constitutional separation of church and state foreclosed the possibility of earmarking tax dollars for parochial schools, as such. Some state constitutions forbid outright public aid to church-supported schools. No federal money now goes directly to private or parochial schools.

The compromise came through by-passing the category of the school, in effect, and considering the category of need of the principal objective of the whole exercise, the child. The result has been a new-found cooperation between government officials and public and private school officials at a local level to provide children who have never had them before such things as remedial reading, a guidance counselor or a hot breakfast.

But now this whole intricate apparatus is in danger of being swept away through a sinister combination of misguided Republican ingenuity and the vindictiveness of some die-hard segregationists smarting under federal compulsion — 13 years after the Supreme Court decision — to integrate public schools.

Without committee hearings, GOP Rep. Albert Quie (Minn.) has introduced — and changed it hastily several times — an amendment to the elementary and secondary education act which would substitute block grants to states for aid now going to local communities. On the surface this seems a reasonable projection of the "creative federalism" the Johnson Administration has talked so much about.

Beneath the surface, however, the Quie amendment is a booby-trap. Mobilizing support from conservatives by its philosophy of tax-sharing to counterbalance "too much federal control," its formula would allocate funds to states on the basis of the relative number of school-age children and the relative income per child in each state.

THE IRONIC FLAW in this arithmetic is that it would hurt both the poorest and the richest states. All the southern and border states — except Maryland — would get less money and these are states which already are among the lowest in per-pupil expenditure for education. But New York, California, Illinois, New Jersey and Texas would be injured too. With big populations they have some of the largest numbers of educationally-deprived children in school who need more financial help.

That's not all. Funds for that political orphan, the District of Columbia, would be cut almost in half. (Tests just released show that students in four out of five District schools are poor readers and below the national average.)

The Quie amendment also would jeopardize if not wipe out school aid to migrant workers' children, American Indians, and dependents of government workers overseas. It would further weaken the fledgling Teacher Corps as well as deprive handicapped and/or delinquent children whom federal school funds now help.

The Leadership Conference, an influential civil rights lobby, opposes the amendment, fearing that in a spite-the-face mood, the South will prefer to cut off the nose of present federal funds and accept less under the Quie formula in order to continue the blind fight for "states' rights."

A mixture of misunderstanding, prejudice and complacency could allow the Quie amendment to reverse the progress in primary and secondary education. In a recent speech, one of the nation's most valuable public servants, Health, Education and Welfare Sec. John Gardner, said:

"I understand the love of complacency. But down that path lies the decay and ruin of this great nation."

Needs Held Acute:

All-Out National Effort Urged To Fill Public Facilities Gap

A MASSIVE NATIONAL effort was urged by a labor official to cut the mounting backlog of needed public facilities to serve the nation's fast-growing population.

Marvin Friedman, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, declared that the existing gap is the result of a failure to build schools, highways, water systems and other public facilities in pace with the nation's population boom and rapid urbanization.

"We simply haven't addressed ourselves sufficiently to the problem," Friedman said, "and it is growing even more acute with the "urban crush and suburban sprawl." His statements came during the weekly network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Tuesday at 7:35 (EDT), on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Friedman said that while the exact size of the public facilities gap is hard to pinpoint, one measure of its magnitude is the recent estimate of the Congressional Joint Economic Committee that a $328 billion outlay is needed over the next 10 years just to catch up.

DESPITE conservative misgivings, "increasing expenditures for these types of activities does not necessarily and inevitably mean raising taxes," Friedman observed. He pointed out that every $1 billion spent for public facilities creates as many as 200,000 new jobs in an expanding economy.

"Revenues of government—the income of government—will increase as the economy grows and gets healthier," he declared.

Reporters questioning him on the AFL-CIO public affairs program were Lee Cohn of the Washington Evening Star and Michael L. Posner of United Press Intl.

The CONSTITUTION of the United States is a document that has been held in reverence by both liberals and conservatives—the solid legal foundation upon which rests our sacred liberties.

Conservatives, particularly, have had an almost fetishistic attitude to the Constitution. Yet, ironically, a substantial number of conservatives have embarked upon a course that many knowledgeable authorities believe could trip this vital document to shreds.

They are seeking a constitutional convention, the first since the Constitution itself was drafted, as their only hope of undermining the one-man, one-vote ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The legal basis of such action is Article V of the Constitution which reads: "The Congress . . . on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states shall call a convention for proposing amendments."

To date, 32 state legislatures have joined the call for the convention. If two additional state legislatures take similar action they will contend that 34 valid petitions have been received and that Congress must immediately call a convention.

Never before in our history has a convention been called to amend the Constitution. Every amendment, including the Bill of Rights, has been first approved by Congress before being proposed to the states for ratification.

Congress did, in fact, consider the issue for many months and rejected proposals to undermine one-man, one-vote.

"The Congress," said Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) recently, "saw quite clearly certain forces which, behind the scenes, were among the most ardent advocate for malapportionment—the far right wing, anti-civil rights and special big business groups which have for years controlled the 'rotten borough legislatures' for their own profits and the public's loss."

TYDINGS and many constitutional authorities question whether the actions of most of the 32 state legislatures in calling for a convention are valid, since they were malapportioned at the time they took the action. They point to these factors:

- Only 29 of the legislatures clearly petitioned for a convention to propose a constitutional amendment to authorize apportionment on "factors other than population."
- 23 were unconstitutionally apportioned at the time the petition was approved. A total of 19 of these legislatures are now apportioned according to population but the action of the old bodies is given priority.
- 13 of the 23 legislatures were under court orders to reapportion at the time they voted for a convention, and litigation was pending in the other ten.
- 24 of the 29 petitions were passed in the same year, 1965, in great haste following the high court's one-man, one-vote decision.

Even if you assume that the action of all 32 legislatures is valid other important legal questions are raised.

As noted above, 29 legislatures called for a convention to propose a specific amendment—detailed in the petitions—to permit one house of the state legislature to be apportioned on the basis of "factors other than population." Three of the petitions call for another fundamentally different amendment, one which would deprive the federal courts of any jurisdiction regarding apportionment of state legislatures.

What is more important is the question whether Congress could place any limitation on the powers of a constitutional convention, particularly if two different kinds of calls for conventions were issued.

Even Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R. Ill.), who has led the fight against the Supreme Court decision, acknowledges this problem.

"There is strong legal opinion," he said, "that once the states have mandated a convention, neither the courts nor the executive can control it, guide it or establish the matter with which it deals. A constitutional convention, many sincere people believe, would, once unlocked, spread in every direction."

A MASSIVE EFFORT is required to cut the backlog of needed public facilities throughout the nation, Marvin Friedman (center), economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, declared on Labor News Conference. Reporters Lee Cohn (left) of the Washington Evening Star and Michael L. Posner of United Press Intl. questioned Friedman on the weekly public affairs interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

How To Buy:

Easier Credit, Watered Juice Pose Problems for Consumers

By Sidney Margolius

MAY IS A GOOD SHOPPING month. Food prices are still relatively moderate just before the usual summer leap. Important sales this month include the white sales on sheets and towels; the annual cut-price sales of tires, handbags, lingerie soaps and toiletries, and reductions on this year's models of TV sets.

One warning is in order. More lending money is becoming available. Thus, families seeking to buy homes or refinance mortgages will find mortgages a little easier to get. At the same time, it is important to avoid paying the high rates some lenders still are asking, so you don't get saddled with them just before they may decline. At least try to get as favorable a prepayment-privilege clause as you can.

You also ought to know that easier credit means more high-pressure selling with you as the target. One of the current lures of installment furniture stores is air conditioners. Compare total price (not merely "how much a month") among speciality appliance dealers, discount stores and department stores, all of which tend to compete on price. Then when you find the lowest cash price on the model you want, arrange the financing yourself through a credit union or bank. You not only will save money but may avoid sharply inflated prices hidden by long installment terms.

Frozen and canned orange juice concentrate and other genuine fruit juices are priced very low this year due to a record-breaking orange crop.

If consumers stopped to read the legally-required list of ingredients, they would see that water and sugar are in the lead. Unfortunately they cannot tell how much. The labels are not required to tell even the approximate percentages of water, sugar and genuine fruit juices.

Some effort has been made by both the Food and Drug Administration and the Association of Food and Drug Officials to establish at least some basic standards for these products.

The cost of some of the prepared diluted "drinks" often runs 30 percent higher than that of buying fruit concentrates and adding water. Even when vitamin C is added the cost of the vitamin C is sometimes twice as much as that of the equivalent vitamin C in real juices, a comparison by the New York Cooperative Extension Service indicates.

Another concern is the imitation "breakfast drinks" such as Tang and Awake.

"BOTH PRODUCE drinks that are basically sugar-water, flavored, colored, with two or three vitamins added . . . advertised and sold as substitutes for orange juice or other breakfast juices or fruits," Mrs. Betsy Wood, Berkeley, Calif., Co-op home economist, has reported.

"The picture on one ad gives the impression that Awake and frozen orange juice are equivalent to each other," although the text does say that "a nine-ounce can of Awake makes as much beverage as two regular six-ounce cans of frozen concentrated orange juice."

The ads emphasize "more vitamin C than orange juice" but do not say that the equivalent of sugar and a pill would cost a fraction of the price of the breakfast drinks, and that a real food like orange juice provides additional nutrients.

Now a new "instant breakfast drink"—Start—is being widely promoted "for people who grew up on orange juice." We suggest that both they and people who didn't read the list of ingredients on the label. Sugar is the leading one, followed by various thickeners, even hydrogenated vegetable oil, and orange flavoring, added vitamins C and A, and artificial coloring.

From Soup to Nonsense:

For a Washing Machine, Grief; But a Goldfish, Good Riddance!

By Jane Goodsell

LAST WEEK we had a double tragedy. Molly's goldfish died and so did our washing machine. Of the two, the washing machine was by far the greater loss, and not for the reason you think. Money has nothing to do with it.

Well, maybe it has, but I'd grieve for my old washer even if I could replace it for 25 cents, whereas that goldfish's passing would leave me dry-eyed if I'd bought it on the installment plan and still had 11 payments to go.

The point is, I had a warm, personal relationship with my washing machine, but I never established any rapport with that goldfish. That fish and I didn't relate to each other, and I don't think the fault was mine because nobody else in the family felt close to it either. That fish simply had nothing.

The morning Molly came down to breakfast to announce, "Guess what my goldfish did? It died," was the first time anyone had even mentioned that fish in years. It didn't even have a name. We just called it Goldfish. Molly always intended to name it, and she made a couple of half-hearted attempts to call it first Ignatz and then Josephine, but nothing ever stuck. The thing was, that fish was too phlegmatic and unresponsive to name.

So it was flushed away to its eternal reward, with nary a tear.

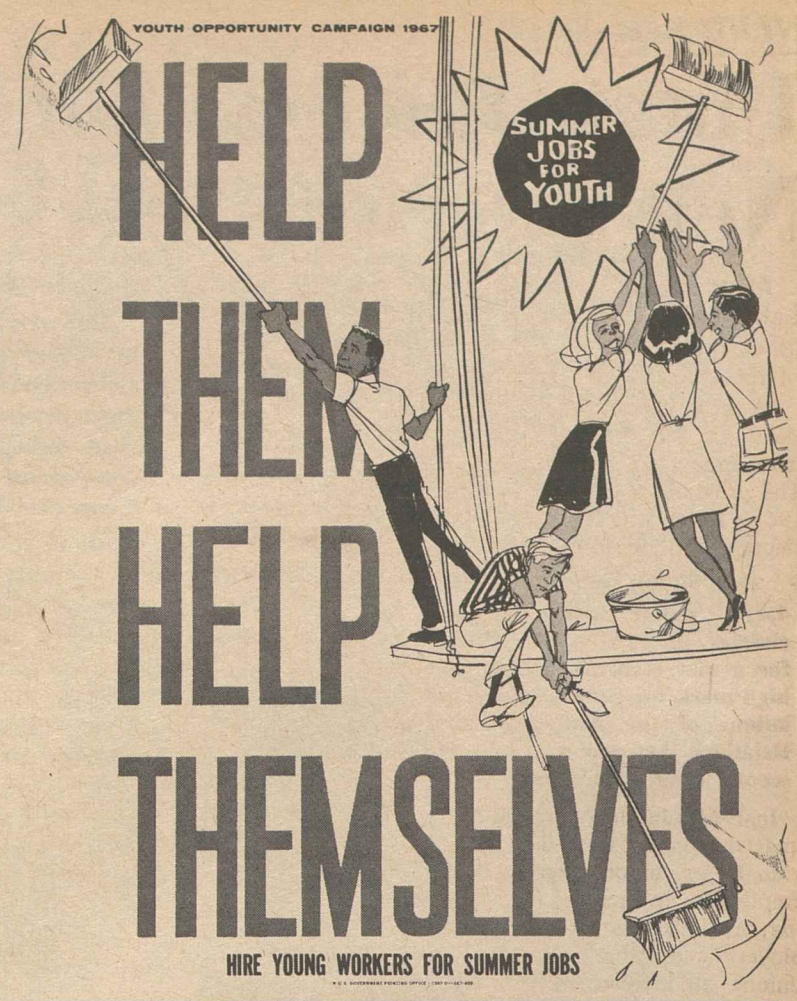
Not so the washing machine. Now there was a colorful, quixotic personality. It was capricious, eccentric and completely unpredictable. Sometimes it went about its job quietly and efficiently, clicking its gears smartly as it progressed with military precision from Wash to Rinse to Spin-dry. Other times, in a smart-alecky mood, it cut loose from its moorings and danced a jig, sloshing water mischievously all over the floor. Then it had its sulky spells when it refused to work and just sat there, glowering. In short, it acted like one of us, and that is how I thought of it. Naturally, it had a name. We called it Roto-Verso III, naming it after its grandmother—my first washing machine.

IT LIVED with us for a long time. Naturally, I feel rather shy with it at first, and things are somewhat trying, as they are in the initial stages of any relationship—with a new husband, a new baby, a new boss or a new friend. One feels obligated to keep a rulebook handy, and to do everything exactly right. But in time the rulebook is tossed aside, and responses become intuitive.

As it aged, it got more crochety and it began to develop ailments which home nursing couldn't cure. The repairman became a frequent visitor, and his mien became increasingly grave. I realized that Roto-Verso was in serious condition, and I knew that he was trying to prepare me for the worst, but I refused to give up hope. By now I had developed an Old Dog Tray feeling about that washing machine and, forgetting its contrariness, I thought of it as a loyal and faithful friend.

But finally the day came when the repairman told me gently that there was nothing more he could do. And now Roto-Verso III is gone. I have a new washing machine and, in time, when the strangeness wears off, it will doubtless replace Roto-Verso III in my heart. But I still choke up when I think of the poor old thing.

As for that goldfish, good riddance.



For Young Americans:

Summer Jobs Sought In Record Numbers

MORE YOUNG Americans will be searching for work this summer than have ever searched for it before.

It's expected that 400,000 more 16 to 21 year-olds will enter the job market than did last year, pushing the total in this age group seeking work to 12,714,000. About 2 million of these, or 16 percent, will fail to find jobs unless there is a program.

For some, not finding a job will mean not returning to school. For others, unemployment may mean the beginning of a long, frustrating effort to become self-sufficient.

In 1965 and 1966, Youth Opportunity Campaigns were successful in finding needed extra jobs for young people because of the whole-hearted support and cooperation of business, government, industry, labor and religious and civic organizations in this national effort.

In 1966 alone, despite a 16 percent increase in the number of 16 to 21 year-olds seeking work, the number unemployed was cut 6.3 percent from the previous year.

But, all youth did not share equally in the chance for a summer job.

- Nonwhite boys had three times the unemployment rate that white boys had.
- For nonwhite girls, it was almost as bad; their unemployment rate was 2.5 times that of white girls.
- Overall, nonwhite young men and women suffered a 23 percent unemployment rate last summer; for white youth, it was 9 percent.

If the campaign this year does as well as in 1966 total youth unemployment—white and non-white—will be 10.5 percent, a drop of two-tenths of 1 percent. Among the white youth, 8.7 percent will be unemployed, a drop from 9 percent last year. But for nonwhite youth, 22.8 percent will be jobless.

THE CHALLENGE is to do better, particularly for those young people who in the past have fared the worst.

By a little extra effort, by a few more jobs among the many, by a determination that this generation will not turn its back on prejudice, on disadvantage, on ignorance and on poverty, summer jobs can be provided for this future American generation in numbers equal to the numbers who seek them.

1967 is the year to help them help themselves.

NLRB Report:

Unfair Charges Set New Quarterly Mark

More unfair labor practice charges were filed with the National Labor Relations Board in the first three months of 1967 than in any other quarter in NLRB history, the board reported. Two-thirds of the charges were against employers, a third against unions.

A new quarterly record was set also in requests for employe elections, with 3,733 petitions filed from January through March 1967. The previous high mark was set in 1966's first quarter, with 3,421 election petitions filed.

The NLRB said it received 4,416 unfair labor practice charges in 1967's first quarter for a new record. The previous high mark for cases alleging violations of the National Labor Relations Act was 4,317 in the second quarter of 1966.

In 1967's January-through-March quarter, charges were filed by individuals or unions against 2,968 employers, an increase of 577 over the previous quarter, and by employers and others against 1,448 unions, an increase of 190.

Employer unfair practices since 1958 persisted at such a high rate that the NLRB, reacting to labor objections to "slap on the wrist" penalties, has moved increasingly to protect its election processes from abuse and to make repeated unfair practices more burdensome.

New Remedies

In several leading decisions the board has ordered employers to give unions the names and addresses of all employes in advance of a representation election; to give unions access to plant bulletin boards and meetings on company time and premises; and to bargain with unions of whose majority it had no good-faith doubt. Awaiting NLRB rulings are recommendations by two trial examiners that workers be compensated by employers for benefits lost because of management "stalling" tactics.

The same report showed that the NLRB general counsel issued 446 formal complaints alleging violations of the labor act; trial examiners conducted 278 hearings on unfair practice charges, and the five-member board issued 183 formal decisions in cases brought to it for review.

In elections held during the quarter, employes voted for union representation 60 percent of the time, a gain over the 57 percent of the prior quarter. AFL-CIO unions won 617 of 1,119 elections during the same quarter, the report stated.

Thirty petitions for injunctions against unions were filed during the first quarter under the mandatory provisions of the law's Section 10(1) and three injunction petitions against employers under the discretionary provisions of Section 10(j).

At the end of March, 664 cases awaited a decision by board members, compared with 647 cases pending Jan. 1 and 566 pending Mar. 31, 1966. Of the current pending cases, unfair labor practices are involved in 470 and election petitions in 174.

The report showed that 10,698 cases of all types awaited disposition at various NLRB procedural levels as of Mar. 31, 1967, compared with 9,596 at the end of the preceding quarter and 9,265 a year earlier. Unfair labor practice charges accounted for 7,304 of the cases pending at the end of March 1967, according to the report.

LABOR, THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION honored Pres. David Sullivan (second from right) at a dinner following his investiture as a Knight Commander in the papal Order of St. Gregory the Great by Francis Cardinal Spellman (right) at a private ceremony in the Chapel of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. Proceeds of the dinner went to Fu-Jen Catholic University in Taiwan, whose rector, Archbishop Paul Yu-Pin (left), and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller joined in the tribute to Sullivan, first U.S. labor leader to receive such a high papal honor.

Social Security Called Three-Way Protection

Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen called social security "a triple-decker package of protection" for American workers that provides not only old-age retirement but a monthly life insurance policy and disability insurance benefits as well.

He described these protections in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC national network (Sunday, 12 noon, EDT).

The widow and orphan of a wage earner covered by social security may get back "many, many times what he paid in," Cohen pointed out. "He may have paid in only five years and his widow and children may draw out $30,000 or $40,000 worth in insurance."

He said that this part of social security protection can enable children of a deceased breadwinner to get an education they might otherwise have been denied. This feature of the program and the fact that social security is a form of social insurance should be especially realized by young persons, he stressed.

"It is hard to persuade persons of 20 or 25 that they are ever going to get old," Cohen observed. "They have to be convinced that they should start thinking now about the kind of protection needed against these three risks. We don't have such a problem when a person gets to be 50, 55 or 60, but then it may be too late."

Cohen said that the Administration proposal to improve social security benefits "would take about 1.4 million aged people out of poverty. That is an important step, but it would still leave in the neighborhood of maybe 4 million aged people still in poverty."

He said that if Congress approves Pres. Johnson's recommendations "a long step forward would be made. I think we need to constantly reexamine social security and, as our gross national product and productivity increase, we ought to take another look to see that the aged, the disabled, the widows and orphans benefit in the improved economic situation of our country."

The under secretary also expressed concern about elderly persons, mostly women, who live isolated and alone, without relatives and friends. He said that efforts should be made to "do more about organizing community resources" for such persons.

Garment Union Repels Teamsters

Portland, Ore. — An attempted Teamster raid on United Garment Workers Local 228 was defeated here when employes of White Stag Mfg. Co. voted against the expelled union in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was 152-66, with two no-union ballots.

The Teamsters intervened, UGW said, when a White Stag employe filed a decertification petition. He charged that such intervention is standard practice in this area for the Teamsters, expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt leadership.

CLC Presses Fight to Keep National Pacts

Ottawa, Ont. — More than 200 members of unions affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress spent two days here visiting members of Parliament to impress upon them the importance of retaining national bargaining patterns.

The lobbying venture, organized by the CLC, was prompted by efforts of the Quebec-based Confederation of National Trade Unions to substitute sectional bargaining for national bargaining.

The CLC stand was described as "a matter of principle" by Pres. Claude Jodoin at a welcoming meeting. CLC Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald outlined the background of raids against affiliates and of attacks on existing labor legislation and the Canadian Labor Relations Board.

Pres. Louis Laberge of the Quebec CLC pointed out that the CNTU had opposed the breaking up of bargaining units in Quebec but sought it nationally.

Other speakers at the briefing session included CLC Executive Vice Presidents Joseph Morris, who presided, and William Dodge, and the heads of several unions.

Johnson Cites Duty To Senior Citizens

The duty the nation owes to elders "whose lives have contributed to the development of the society we enjoy" was stressed by Pres. Johnson in a proclamation naming May as Senior Citizens Month.

"There must be a general awareness," the President said, "that it is within the power of us all to discharge that duty—to bring light to the lives of those who are lonely or in despair, better care to those who are ill or disabled, greater benefits to those who are impoverished."

Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens urged members to take advantage of the month to get signatures on petitions asking Congress to enact the President's proposed social security improvements.

Sullivan Cites Poverty As Major Challenge

New York—Organized labor, the church and the world of education together face a continuing challenge to help advance the cause of freedom and put an end to poverty, Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes declared here.

Sullivan, an AFL-CIO vice president, expressed this viewpoint at a dinner marking his investiture as a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, an honor conferred on him by Pope Paul VI. Proceeds of the dinner will go to aid Fu-Jen Catholic University in Taiwan, a non-sectarian institution established under the leadership of Pope John XXIII.

At the dinner, which drew leaders of business, labor, government and education, Sullivan called it both "appropriate and significant" that the forces of the church, the labor movement and education were united in an effort to raise funds for an educational venture that serves the cause of peace and freedom in the Far East.

He called Fu-Jen University one example of the church's educational activities aimed at assisting young men and women of all faiths.

Parallel Noted

"I personally believe that the principles of Christianity are carried out through the activities of labor movements like those that exist in the United States and Canada," Sullivan said. "These movements do not concern themselves only with the immediate reward of labor and with getting a just wage for working people. They also concern themselves with all the broad spiritual, cultural and social needs of working men and women."

Sullivan is the first American labor leader to be accorded such a high Papal honor. He was invested with the Order of St. Gregory by Francis Cardinal Spellman at a private ceremony preceding the dinner held in the chapel of St. Patrick's Cathedral. The order was established in 1831 initially to honor subjects of the Papal States by Pope Gregory XVI, one of the outstanding figures in church history who was later canonized as a saint. Its emblem is an eight-pointed red cross bearing a medallion engraved with a picture of the saint.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany were co-chairmen of the dinner.

Guests included Cardinal Spellman, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, Archbishop Paul Yu-Pin, president and rector of Fu-Jen, and numerous members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Thomas R. Donahue, assistant secretary of labor and formerly an aide to Sullivan was toastmaster. Arthur L. Harckham, president of New York Building Service Employes Council No. 11 was dinner chairman.

LBJ Message

A message from President Johnson congratulated Sullivan on his designation for the Papal honor.

Wirtz characterized Sullivan's investiture as "a momentous occasion not only for you but for American trade unions, which are playing an increasingly important role in world affairs."

Meany praised Sullivan for his leadership of the Building Service Employes and for his "outstanding contribution to the AFL-CIO."

ULLICO Reports Record Growth

Baltimore—The Union Labor Life Insurance Co. reported its biggest growth in 40 years of operation at the annual shareholders' meeting here.

ULLICO Pres. Edmund P. Tobin, who has been with the labor-owned insurance firm for 39 of these years, said benefits paid to policyholders and beneficiaries in 1966 totaled $104.9 million.

During the year, assets rose to more than $69 million and the volume of insurance in force increased to $1.94 billion. Income from all sources totaled $116.9 million, a one-year gain of 16 percent, Tobin said.

S. Frank Raftery, president of the Painters, was elected to ULLICO's 30-member board of directors.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told a luncheon which followed the business meeting that ULLICO has held consistently to its goal of providing low-cost insurance for wage-earners and their families. The company reports that it is the largest single underwriter of negotiated health and welfare insurance contracts in the United States.

Evans Named To HUD Post As Labor Aide

John E. Evans, secretary-treasurer of the Arizona AFL-CIO for the past four years, has been named by Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Housing & Urban Development Dept. as assistant to the secretary for labor relations.

Evans, who had served also as chairman of the Arizona Employment Security Commission, is a member of the Broadcast Engineers & Technicians. Appointment of a successor to Evans as state central body officer was on the agenda at the annual Arizona AFL-CIO meeting in Flagstaff May 4-6.

Evans has a degree from the University of Arizona and did graduate work also at the Sorbonne in Paris and at Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland. Before his appointment to the state labor post in 1963 he had worked in advertising, film production, public relations and educational television.

After serving as a Navy pilot from 1941-1945, he was an English instructor at the University of Missouri, later served as an educational counselor for the Army in the Canal Zone, and did research and public relations work for the Illinois state government at Springfield.

Evans' career included six years as owner and general manager of Arizona companies producing films and visual aids, and four years with the D'Arcy Advertising Co. and with KETC-TV educational station in St. Louis. From 1961 to 1963 he was director of the Arizona Building Trades Committee in Phoenix.

IN RECOGNITION of his service as chairman of the executive committee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman (right) of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was presented with a silver bowl by Chairman Harold Russell during the committee's annual meeting in Washington.

Seniors Ask Congress To Bar Welfare Cuts

Legislation to prevent the states from cutting welfare payments to the elderly poor when social security benefits are increased was urged by spokesmen for the National Council of Senior Citizens in Senate testimony.

Action by the states kept nearly 1 million needy seniors from the 7 per cent hike in social security benefits enacted in 1965, Pres. John W. Edelman and Executive Dir. William R. Hutton of the council told the Subcommittee on Employment & Retirement.

Many states cut welfare aid in the amount of the social security increases even though Congress gave them authority to allow elderly relief clients to have the benefit of the increase, Edelman noted.

Most states, he charged, made their elderly poor victims "of a cruel bureaucratic mixup because many had spent their retroactive social security increase, thinking it was their money—only to have the amount of this increase deducted from their public assistance payments afterward."

The 1965 social security amendments gave the states the option of disregarding up to $5 a month of relief payments collected by social security recipients. The social security rise was enacted in August and was made retroactive to Jan. 1, 1965.

Hutton said California, Colorado, Illinois, Kansas and Nebraska cut relief payments by the full amount of the social security increase, including the lump-sum retroactivity payment. Thirty other states reduced welfare payments by the amount of the monthly social security increase, and only 15 gave the "unfortunate elderly" the benefit of the rise, he said. These were:

Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nevada, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Vermont and Wyoming.

Florida and Vermont later reversed themselves and now withhold the full amount of the increase, Hutton reported. Some of the states that offset the social security increase tried to justify their action by claiming that to do otherwise would be unfair to relief clients who do not get social security.

"This is a bureaucratic dodge to justify the fact that these states economize at the expense of their poorest citizens," he charged.

"We have learned a lesson from this experience—a bitter experience for a great many older people—but all is not lost if this lesson serves to guide Congress to the enactment of provisions that will be truly effective in placing additional income in the hands of our most needy older people."

Hutton termed "a national disgrace" the past record of the states when social security is increased, and urged Congress to do "all it can" to avoid a repetition of the 1965 story when it votes another hike in benefits.

Major Jobless Aid Gains Scored in New Jersey

Trenton, N.J.—Major improvements in New Jersey's unemployment compensation law were voted by the state legislature and State AFL-CIO leaders credited one man, one vote apportionment for bringing it about.

The new legislation, signed by Gov. Richard J. Hughes (D), includes these four major labor-backed provisions:

- The ceiling on weekly unemployment compensation will rise next year from the present $50 a week to two-thirds of lost wages up to a top of 50 percent of the average state wage in covered employment. In dollar terms, this will boost the maximum to $62 a week, based on present wage levels. As the average state wage increases, the maximum benefits will rise further.

- For the first time, strikers will be entitled to unemployment benefits after a waiting period—something that only New York and Rhode Island now provide. After six weeks on strike, plus the customary one week waiting period, strikers will be entitled to regular unemployment benefits if the state labor commissioner certifies that their union has bargained in good faith.

- More seasonal workers will be entitled to jobless benefits through a modification of the present requirement of 17 weeks of employment during the base period. A worker will qualify for benefits if he earned $1,350 during the period, even if he worked less than 17 weeks.

- Starting in 1969, a year later than other provisions of the bill, unemployment insurance coverage will be extended to establishments where there is only a single employe. Present coverage applies only where there are four or more employes.

A court-ordered reapportionment of the legislature in 1965 ended 52 years of Republican control of the state Senate and paved the way for enactment of the legislation.

Voting for the bill in the Senate were 19 Democrats and 1 Republican; opposed were 6 Republicans. In the Assembly, 32 Democrats supported the bill; 16 Republicans and 5 Democrats voted against it.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Vincent J. Murphy hailed the passage as "an historic day for labor in New Jersey. It is a day which underlines the significance of the one man, one vote principle . . . a day for which we have waited for generations — when the elected representatives of New Jersey truly represent the people of the state."

Gov. Hughes, who signed the bill into law just half-an-hour after its passage, said the legislation was "morally right." He said it would provide a "more healthy economic climate."

Construction Pay Up 4.2% in Year

Union building trades workers had an average hourly wage scale of $4.95 an hour last July—an increase of 18 cents, or 4.2 percent, from the previous year, the annual survey by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics showed.

An average of 39 cents an hour per worker went for health and welfare insurance and into vacation and pension funds.

President's Group Meets:

Labor Role Cited In Aid to Disabled

Helping the physically handicapped and the disabled to help themselves is no different than helping "the poverty-stricken, the under-educated, the elderly and minority groups overcome their social and economic handicaps."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler stressed this belief as he addressed a luncheon honoring state winners of the "Ability Counts" high school essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

"We pity the frightened few among us who reject their fellowmen," Schnitzler said. We embrace our fellow "Americans, of whom few are free of handicaps and none can stand alone."

State winners of the essay contest, which was co-sponsored by the Governors' Committees on Employment of the Handicapped, were brought to Washington by the AFL-CIO central bodies in their states and were feted at the luncheon, held during the annual meeting of the President's committee, by the national AFL-CIO.

Schnitzler told the luncheon that organized labor wants no part of the philosophy of those whose "fears, mistrusts, rejections and hatreds have driven them into the right wing groups that offer simple solutions to complex problems."

"The American labor movement rejects in total these concepts and attitudes," he reiterated. "We reject them because they are selfish.

"In the AFL-CIO we accept our obligation to one another and jointly we seek to achieve our goals, whether they be collective bargaining aims at the negotiating table or by legislative action in Congress.

Schnitzler asserted that trade unionism is not "collective selfishness" with union members concerned only about their own gains. Instead, he maintained, it seeks "the advancement of the entire nation."

In proof he offered the seven years of effort and the tens of thousands of man-hours the AFL-CIO put into the winning fight for medicare, "yet from it we will not sign a single dues-payer or receive a single dollar in dues."

The essay contest winners, who divided $2,500 in prizes put up by the Disabled American Veterans, were:

First, Louis E. Bathen, Baton Rouge, La., $1,000; second, Wendell Brooks Phillips III, Reno, Nev., $600; third, Lew Cramer, Mesa, Ariz., $400; fourth, Lorraine Liston, Stamford, Conn., $300, and fifth, Janie Lessenberry, Humbolt, Tenn., $200.

The prize winners were guests at meetings of the President's committee and saw the presentation of a silver bowl by Chairman Harold Russell to Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers for his service as chairman of the committee's executive committee.

Freeman, vice chairman of the President's Committee, recently stepped out of the executive committee post and became chairman of the Labor Committee. That office was held previously by the retired president of the Machinists, A. J. Hayes.

Desegregation Of Schools Hit As Too Slow

School desegregation has been too slow, not too fast, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights told the government.

A delegation from the conference, which is a coalition of more than 100 civil rights, labor, religious and civic organizations, met with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner and U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe III.

Roy Wilkins, chairman of the leadership conference and executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said the nation has been misled by southern congressmen and school officials into thinking that desegregation guidelines are too stringent.

Actually, he said, Negro parents and students have been intimidated, harassed and even beaten to keep them from entering previously all-white schools. In the North, he charged, "subtle methods" such as school site selection and school districting have been used to block meaningful desegregation.

Wilkins said the delegation also expressed its strong opposition to the "Quie amendment" to the federal school aid bill. The amendment proposed by Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.) would give school aid money to the states to use largely as they wish. The result, Wilkins warned, would be to shortchange children of the poor and minority groups.

PRESIDENT'S TROPHY for the Handicapped American of the Year was presented to Art Edgerton, musical director and newsman for Station WTOL-TV, Toledo, O., and a member of Musicians Local 286, by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey. The presentation took place in Washington during the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Mrs. Edgerton is at the left.

Keyed to Chronically Jobless:

Manpower Message Asks New Approach

Pres. Johnson has proposed to Congress an ambitious manpower program designed to reach about 2 million chronically unemployed workers "who can be helped and are willing to help themselves."

The President's proposals for "new directions in manpower policy" were contained in his annual Manpower Report to the Congress. It included a 193-page Labor Dept. analysis of the nation's manpower resources which focused on the problem of "unused manpower."

In describing the estimated 2 million potential workers who can be reached through special services, Johnson said:

"These are the dropouts—young men and women who have left school with inadequate education and without skills. Lacking experience, they cannot find work; lacking work, they can never get experience.

"They are older workers whose obsolete skills are useless in today's job market.

"They are Negroes, Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans and others barred from jobs by other people's prejudice.

Migrants, Rejects

"They are the illiterate, the migrants, the mentally and physically handicapped, the young men rejected as unfit for military service."

The President opened his report by detailing the achievements of the Manpower Development & Training Act programs.

He said that by the end of 1966 about 600,000 unemployed and underemployed workers had been enrolled in training, three out of four trainees who stayed the course went on to regular jobs, and thousands of minority group members received training.

The President then turned to the unsolved problems: the 12 percent jobless rate among the 16-19 year olds, the Negro jobless rate which is double the national rate, the 10-percent jobless rate in slums and depressed rural areas.

At the end of 1966, Johnson continued, there were 2.9 million persons unemployed. About 10.5 million workers had suffered some unemployment during the year.

While hardship can be minimized for most people through various improvements, the manpower programs should do more and try to reach those unemployed for long periods and who are frequently out of work, the President said.

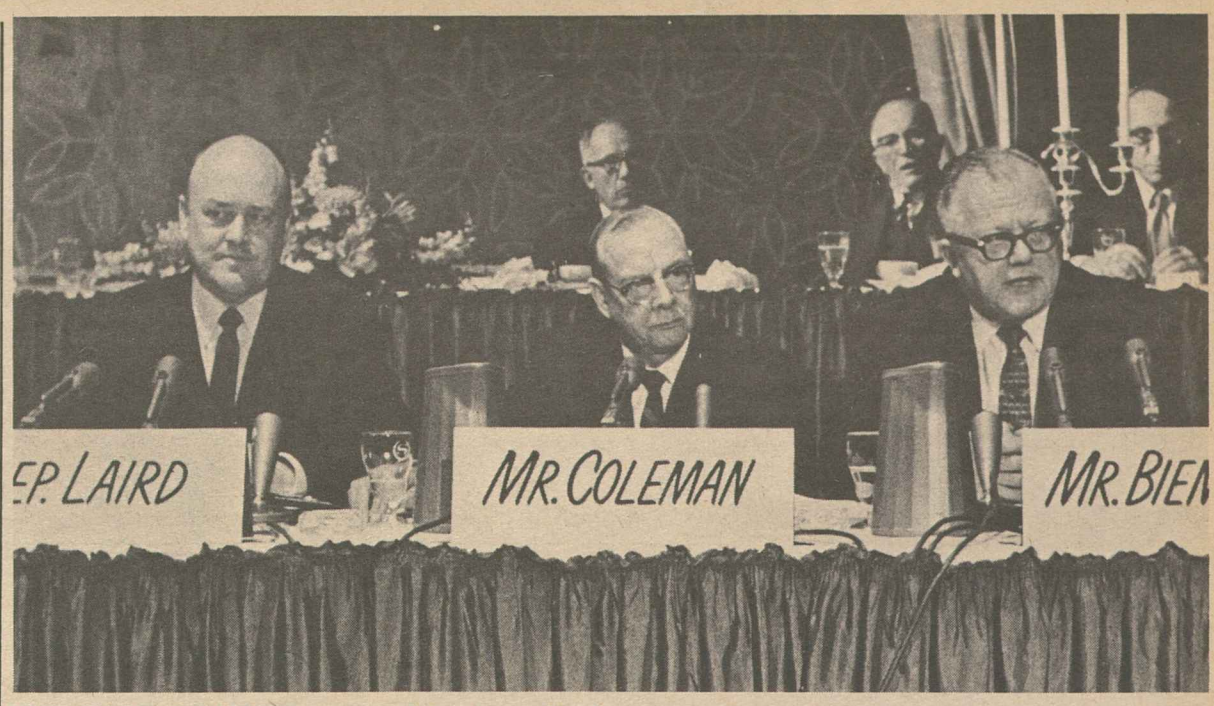
In 1966, about 2.5 million were jobless for 15 weeks or longer. Of this group, about 700,000 were jobless more than half the year. Another 500,00 to 1 million potential workers had given up looking for work and were not even counted as unemployed, the President noted.

Still another 500,000 unemployed were probably missed by the labor force survey. Others worked part-time when they needed full-time work.

The President proposed these five new directions in manpower policy:

- "Bridge the gap between education and work" through closer links between schools and manpower programs.
- "Concentrate our efforts" on high unemployment areas such as city slums, backed by $135 million in requested funds for fiscal 1968 under the anti-poverty program.
- "Make our overall manpower effort more efficient" by centralizing, consolidating and streamlining federal manpower programs and putting emphasis on on-the-job training conducted by private employers.
- "Make military service a path to productive careers" in civilian life through specialized training and education.
- "Work toward a more comprehensive manpower program" by strengthening the federal-state employment service, by modernizing the jobless pay system, by improving social security and public assistance.

The President also asked Congress for $20 million for a special census of 3 million households to learn more about the unemployed.



THE CASE AGAINST turning federal tax funds over to the states with no control over how they are spent was made by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller at debate before U.S. Chamber of Commerce audience with Rep. Melvin R. Laird (R-Wis.). Moderator was Henry C. Coleman, treasurer of the organization.

Arthritis Month Gets Labor Support

Support of the 1967 Arthritis Foundation campaign was urged on all AFL-CIO affiliates and members by Pres. George Meany.

The campaign is being held in May, which is the foundation's "Victory Over Arthritis Month." Meany in a letter to Dr. William S. Clark, president of the foundation, noted that many of the country's 13 million sufferers from the disease are workers who share in an annual wage and salary loss estimated at $1.5 billion.

"We feel that our country will gain much from support of the network of research, training and treatment centers across the country made possible by the work of the Arthritis Foundation," he said.

Labor Backs State Aid, Bars No-Strings Rebates

Federal tax revenues are needed to help states meet national problems, but a "no strings" program of tax rebates isn't the way to do it, an AFL-CIO spokesman told the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller debated with the chairman of the House Republican Conference, Rep. Melvin R. Laird (Wis.), on the issue of giving states a portion of federal tax revenues instead of grants-in-aid for specific purposes. The occasion was a luncheon session of the Chamber's 55th annual meeting.

Laird argued that revenue-sharing would be more efficient because states know better than Congress or federal officials where available funds are most needed and should be spent.

"National problems demand national solutions," Biemiller retorted. The people of one state are affected by the action or inaction of another state—in pollution, education, transportation and other matters.

Rejecting what he termed "Congressman Laird's appeal to let the states have the money to spend on whatever projects they choose, at the pace they choose, and in the order of priority they choose," Biemiller asked:

"Would you really trust the state of Alabama to operate a desegregated school system, or Ronald Reagan to save the redwoods?"

In one area, Laird and Biemiller approached agreement — but with significant differences.

Both saw benefits in a credit against federal income tax payments for taxes paid to the states.

Two Approaches

Laird said a portion of all state or local taxes should be credited against federal tax bills.

Biemiller said the only tax credit should be on a portion of "a graduated state income tax"—a move which also would encourage states to adopt progressive tax policies based on ability to pay.

He said there is a need to consolidate many of the related grants-in-aid programs. But he warned that tax sharing without federal controls "is a form of anarchy which no national corporation would tolerate, and one which strikes at the very principle of federalism."

Biemiller noted that states could use unconditional grants "to lure industry from other states" or "to reduce their own taxes, thus destroying the whole purpose of the plan."

A greater portion of federal tax revenue could be allocated to the states "in normal times," Biemiller said, when military needs are not as great. But the grants-in-aid approach should be expanded, not scrapped, he urged, because the United States "is indeed one nation indivisible," rather than "a conglomeration of 50 states, joined in an uneasy alliance."

Union Urges Federal Action On Fire Safety

Chicago—Broad support for federal legislation to help urban areas improve their fire protection and prevention programs was urged by Pres. William D. Buck of the Fire Fighters in a speech before the Metropolitan Committee of the Intl. Association of Fire Chiefs.

Both the union and the association have endorsed the Administration-backed Fire Research & Safety bill of 1967, sponsored by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), and a proposed amendment authorizing a national commission of 20 citizens to study all aspects of the national fire problem.

"We believe that a constructive program for federal action to help build up the fire services can and will win public support," Buck said. "What federal assistance has done in the field of education and to professionalize the police can likewise be done for the firefighters."

He warned that "far too few cities" have adequate training programs and declared that "we can wait no longer for the cities to establish such programs."

Drivers 16-18 Opposed For School Bus Jobs

A proposed relaxation of hazardous occupation standards that would permit 16-to-18-year-olds to drive school buses was denounced as dangerous to both drivers and passengers in a protest registered by the AFL-CIO.

There is "no clear need" for the change, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger said in a letter to Dir. Nelson Bortz of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards, which sets up safety regulations under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Rather, Goldfinger continued, the shift "would undercut existing standards" in the 34 states where no one under 18 is allowed to drive a school bus. The District of Columbia and Puerto Rico have similar regulations.

"Only five states allow minors under 18 to secure a chauffeur's license needed for the transportation of goods or people," he continued. "Therefore even in the states allowing minors to act as school bus drivers, the hazard of this type of employment is basically recognized."

He cited accident statistics to support his contention that "16 and 17 year old minors" are not as good drivers as proponents of the changed regulation try to make out, and that school buses are involved in more than their share of accidents.

"We believe the hard, cold facts are that the real reason for wholesale use of young drivers is an economic one," he declared. "Until just recently South Carolina paid these kids $30 a month. North Carolina pays $50."

Not only are school buses involved in relatively more accidents than other vehicles, Goldfinger pointed out on the basis of statistics, but driving generally is "particularly hazardous" in the 16 states allowing minors to operate them.

"School children riding in buses driven by other children below 18 are also endangered," he wrote. "The National Safety Council reports that 3,700 children were injured in school bus accidents last year. . .

"Aside from any considerations of hazard, we are of the opinion that you have another obligation and that is not to place the responsibility for the lives of 30 or 40 children on the shoulders of a 16 or 17-year-old.

"The minor child driving a school bus does not have the maturity with which to deal with the problems raised by a bus load of children."

Bargaining Tie-in Urged On Local Aid

A civil service merit system is no substitute for collective bargaining, Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes told a Senate Government Operations subcommittee.

Wurf called for amendment of a bill that would require state and municipal governments receiving federal grants-in-aid to institute merit systems.

"We are not opposed to merit systems as such," Wurf said, "but the imposition of such systems should carry with it a corollary right and duty to enter into collective bargaining relationships."

He pointed out in a statement to the subcommittee that public employes generally consider civil service commissions to be "arms of the employers" and not "a third impartial party."

Salary schedules, he said, should be established through negotiations rather than unilateral determination by civil service agencies.

Wurf urged amendments spelling out collective bargaining obligations to enable his union "to give support to what is basically a good piece of legislation."

Central Body Leader Heads United Fund

Springfield, Mass. — The United Fund here has elected a labor man as president for the first time in its history.

Community leaders chose Herman Greenberg, president of the Pioneer Valley AFL-CIO for 25 years and a long-time United Fund volunteer worker.

Greenberg is a veteran business agent for the Clothing Workers. He is former president of the Greater Springfield AFL-CIO and the Western Massachusetts CIO Council, predecessors of the present central body.

JAMES P. HAMILTON

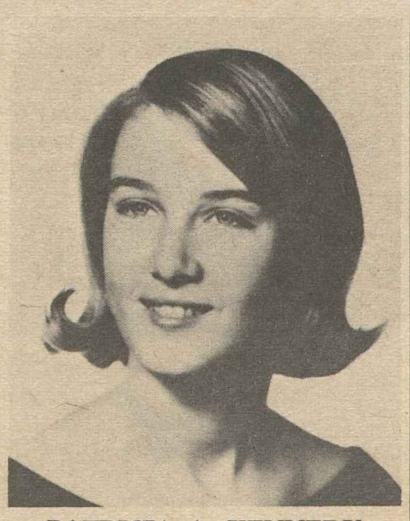
ROSS J. CAMERON



PATRICIA A. KENNEDY

Meany Stresses Need For More U. S. Aid

Four-year scholarships under the AFL-CIO College Merit Scholarships Program have been awarded to four boys and two girls, Pres. George Meany announced.

The awards, made for the ninth consecutive year, raise to 54 the number of outstanding high school graduates to receive scholarships under the AFL-CIO program. Each award is worth up to $6,000 in financial assistance as it may be needed during the four college years.

The winners, notified of their selection by Meany, are:

James Blaine Hudson, Louisville, Ky.; Ross J. Cameron, Mt. Vernon, Mo.; Leo F. Calderella, New York City; James Patrick Hamilton, Marion, Ind.; Patricia A. Kennedy, Harahan, La., and Rita Diane Jensen, Rosemead, Calif.

"Since its inception, the AFL-CIO has supported the establishment and improvement of our compulsory free education system," Meany said in his notification.

"Today we feel that the multiple challenges of the complicated society we are living in require the extension of the concepts of federally-financed education into the realm of higher education. The AFL-CIO looks forward to the day when all young people will have the opportunity to develop a full measure of their capabilities regardless of their financial status.

Interim Period

"In this interim period, when so many young people are deprived of this opportunity, the AFL-CIO is happy to demonstrate its interest in furthering educational opportunities through our scholarship awards."

The winners are selected each year on the basis of three factors—the results of competitive tests given by the non-profit National Merit Scholarship Corp., their high school records, and an evaluation of their qualifications by their high school teachers.

Two winners are chosen in each of three zones the country is divided into for administrative purposes. At least three of the scholarships must be awarded students with one parent a member of an AFL-CIO union.

The awards are good in any accredited college or university and for study in any subject. The actual amount of each grant is based on college year costs and the amount the winner or his family can provide.

Brief sketches of the winners follow:

Hudson, 17, will be graduated from Louisville's Male High School and expects to major in mathematics at Michigan State University. His mother, Mrs. Lillian W. Hudson, is manager of a municipal housing project. He is an amateur astronomer, enjoys music and literature, and has done volunteer work with the Urban League tutoring children in the war on poverty.

Cameron, 18, attends Mt. Vernon High School and plans to enter the engineering school at the University of Missouri at Rolla. His father, Wilburn T. Cameron, is dead; the youth has assumed the duties of a father to two younger children and has worked since he was 8 in greenhouses, as a clerk and as an accountant for the city of Mt. Vernon. He was Student Council president for three years and won letters in basketball and baseball.

Calderella, 17, will be graduated first in a class of 690 students at Cardinal Spellman High School, the Bronx, and will study English and creative writing at Columbia University. He was the first non-college student to spend a summer studying journalism at Georgetown University, edits the high school paper and is interested in research in social topics. His father, Pasquale Calderella, is a member of Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers Local 1.

Hamilton, 18, will be graduated from Marion High School and will study Slavic languages at the University of Indiana. He has already completed a four-year high school course in Russian, which he can read and write with competence, and has mastered the reading of Sanskrit, Arabic and classical Greek and Hebrew. He has worked part-time as an order clerk for a book store and spends weekends as a volunteer in a hospital emergency room as part of a Boy Scout project.

Miss Kennedy, 17, is the daughter of Irvin Francis Kennedy, a member of Postal Clerks Local 124-T, and attends St. Mary's Dominican High School. Looking to a career as a research biologist, she expects to major in biological sciences at Rice University. She belongs to the National Honorary Math Club, edits the school yearbook, has worked parttime as a saleslady and a babysitter, and makes practically all her own clothing.

Miss Jensen, 17, will be graduated first in a class of 454 at Rosemead High School and will major in art at Humboldt State College with a view to teaching art and fashion design. Her father, Ralph C. Jensen, has been a member of Southern California Cooks Association Local 468, a unit of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes. Her greatest interest lies in art, but she also plays the guitar, sings, belongs to a modern dance club and does creative writing.

President Lashes Republican Move To 'Meat-Axe' School Aid Measure

Pres. Johnson lashed out at a Republican attempt to scrap the school aid bill when it reaches the House floor and replace it with handouts of federal money to the states.

The President told a news conference this would be "disastrous for the school children" and "take us back a decade" by reviving conflict between church and public schools and between poor and wealthy states.

A strong Republican-Dixiecrat coalition is lining up behind a substitute bill by Rep. Albert H. Quie (R.-Minn.) which would abolish federal grants for specific educational purposes and let states decide — with few restrictions — how and where to spend federal school aid funds.

Earlier, at the dedication of a Maryland vocational high school, Johnson had termed the Quie proposal a "meat-axe approach" that would undo the substantial accomplishments of the government programs to help elementary and secondary schools — and students.

As both sides counted votes in preparation for the House showdown, the Senate continued to struggle with the dual issues of investment tax credit for business and tax financing of presidential election campaigns.

The chief issue in the monthlong controversy is still whether the House-passed investment tax bill is to be used as a vehicle to repeal the campaign financing law adopted last year.

A repeal proviso is currently tacked on to the tax bill as an unrelated rider, permitted under Senate rules.

Sen. Russell B. Long (D.-La.), who sponsored the original campaign financing law, moved to delete the repealer.

Long's motion was beaten, 52 to 46. All 46 votes against repeal were cast by Democrats, but 17 Democrats joined 35 Republicans in voting to keep the repealer in the bill.

Long did not give up, however, and held the floor in a parliamentary maneuver to prevent the door being shut on reconsideration of the vote.

The debate switched — at least temporarily—to consideration of an amendment to the almost forgotten tax bill. If the Senate remains bogged down on the bill, an effort may be launched to limit debate through a cloture petition.

Long, meanwhile, told newsmen he has drafted a new formula for public financing of presidential campaigns, allowing each holder of a social security card to allocate $1 of tax funds to the candidate of his choice.

Whatever the Senate does would have to be accepted by House conferees, since the House-passed bill dealt only with restoration of the investment tax credit.

In other action, the House passed a compromise bill setting standards for equalizing the population of congressional districts.

Until the 1970 census, the bill would allow considerable departure from one man, one vote standards by permitting the state's most populous district to represent up to 30 percent more people than the least populous district. Starting in 1972, however, the population spread could not exceed 10 percent.

The bill would bar statewide at-large elections in states with more than one congressman, although Hawaii and New Mexico could continue to elect their two congressmen at-large until the 1972 election.

A somewhat similar bill passed the House two years ago, but died in the Senate. Meanwhile courts have compelled several states to redistrict congressional seats to meet one man, one vote standards.

The once-controversial Appalachian regional development program won a strong vote of confidence from the Senate.

Program Expanded

A labor and Administration-supported bill to provide $448.6 million more for the 13 Appalachian states and $12.5 million to help start five new regional planning commissions passed 68-13. It now goes to the House, with committee hearings scheduled to start May 9.

The new regional commissions authorized in the bill to plan coordinated economic development would cover the Ozarks, New England, the Great Lakes, the South Central states and the four corners region of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah and Arizona.

The House formally received New York's certification of election of Adam C. Powell to the congressional seat which had been declared vacant when Powell was excluded at the start of the session.

Speaker John W. McCormack said the House leadership doesn't plan any action on the matter until Powell appears to claim the seat. Powell has challenged in federal courts the constitutionality of the House action in refusing to seat him. He lost the first round of his court case, but is appealing.

Meany Urges Funds For Summer Jobs

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Congress to support Pres. Johnson's request for $75 million in additional funds for the Office of Economic Opportunity to finance jobs for needy youngsters during the summer vacation.

Meany wired Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.), chairman of a Senate Appropriations subcommittee handling the request that the money is urgently needed to avoid "serious problems in our cities this summer."

Edward Cogen Named To OEO Regional Post

Edward S. Cogen, regional counsel of the Office of Economic Opportunity's Region II, with headquarters in Washington, has been appointed deputy regional director by OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver.

Cogen, 32, is a graduate of Cornell University and of Cornell Law School, and practiced law in Washington prior to joining the OEO.

Betty Furness Takes Consumer Office

Betty Furness spoke up for the truth-in-lending bill on her first day on the job as Pres. Johnson's special assistant for consumer affairs.

Shortly after being sworn in at a White House ceremony, she told a group of farmers' wives that the legislation is needed because deciphering credit charges is "like walking through thick mud."

Johnson announced at the swearing-in ceremony that he is upgrading the President's Committee on Consumer Interests by adding to it Cabinet members and heads of other top agencies. He said he will soon reconstitute a consumer advisory council representing the public.

Joblessness Edges Up To 3.7%

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate inched up to 3.7 percent in April as the recent softening of conditions in manufacturing began to turn into job cuts, the Labor Dept. reported.

In overall job terms, however, non-farm payrolls moved to a record 65.6 million as gains in the retail trade, services and government areas more than offset factory losses and the slow pace of construction activity.

Stable Pattern

The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate has been stable in recent months after rising from 3.5 percent last November to 3.7 percent in December. It held at that level in January and February, declined to 3.6 percent in March and is now back to 3.7 percent, the same as in April a year ago.

The Labor Dept. report said unemployment totaled 2.7 million in April, a decline of 300,000 from March—about the expected seasonal drop.

The downturn in the manufacturing sector saw a loss of 177,000 jobs, seasonally adjusted, almost all of them production workers. The losses totaled 100,000 among production workers in durable goods industries, mainly steel, auto and electrical equipment.

The report said manufacturing employment was down about 225,000 from the January peak but still was up 300,000 over the year.

It described the process by which "softening" conditions can finally lead to job losses:

"Manufacturing employment, which increased very sharply throughout 1965 and most of 1966, began to slow down last December.

THE EDUCATIONAL GAINS achieved by the 89th Congress are in serious jeopardy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the Executive Council in introducing HEW Sec. John W. Gardner (right) and Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, who gave a detailed analysis of the Republican-led move to scuttle the aid to education programs in the House. (Story, Page 4.)

Extended Hearings Set:

Congress Studies Alternatives on Rails

The Administration bill to prohibit a railroad strike came under close congressional scrutiny as committee hearings got under way—with the door open for alternative solutions.

The AFL-CIO and rail unions have branded the Administration's "mediation to finality" plan as "compulsory arbitration," and a number of members of both the House Commerce Committee and a Senate Labor subcommittee indicated at hearings that they agreed with the definition and would prefer some other means of settling the dispute.

Labor's opposition to a dictated settlement of the dispute was reiterated by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which voted a unanimous endorsement of Federation Pres. George Meany's statement of vigorous opposition to the legislation.

It declared that if "a paramount public interest" requires continued operation of the railroads, "then the railroads should be operated for the public interest and not for private profit. We would therefore regard seizure legislation, pending the negotiation of a settlement, as the fairest and least oppressive alternative."

Meany told a news conference following the council meeting that the "real trouble" in reaching a settlement of the shopcrafts dispute has been management's "absolute belief" that Congress wouldn't let the workers strike and therefore there was no need for the railroads "to give or to negotiate in the true sense."

He said the possibility of a strike or some action that would penalize railroads might bring about "some real collective bargaining."

Testifying at the Senate hearings, Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. charged that the Administration bill "is a long step toward a police state—with the government using the threat of prison to make the railroad shopmen labor for less pay than they themselves could win by their economic strength."

The effect of the legislation, he

Monopoly Threat Hit In Shale Oil Proposal

Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall was accused by the AFL-CIO of inviting "serious monopoly dangers" and of "wrongly disregarding" the jurisdiction of a Senate subcommittee in pushing his program for development of shale oil deposits on federal land.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed organized labor's strong opposition to Udall's proposals, which he charged would "lead to commercial leasing of shale oil lands before major problems of public interest protection and monopoly prevention are solved."

Biemiller said Udall was "moving too fast" and that the AFL-CIO would insist on controls to prevent "monopolistic exploitation which benefits a few giant oil companies."

In a strongly-worded letter to Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Antitrust subcommittee, Biemiller said Udall had deliberately bypassed the subcommittee hearings now in progress to publish his program in the Federal Register. The action gives

Asks U.S. Oppose Junta in Greece

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO Executive Council reaffirmed the trade union movement's strong opposition to any form of compulsory arbitration of labor disputes and rallied labor's forces to preserve the pioneering federal aid to education program adopted by the 89th Congress.

At its two-day spring meeting in Washington the council gave major emphasis to Administration proposals to settle the rail shopcraft dispute by legislation involving terms to be finally dictated by a mediation board and to the Republican-led attack on the program of aid to secondary and elementary school education.

In the international field it noted developments in Latin America and Greece, praising the recent Punta del Este declaration on establishing a Latin-American common market and calling on the U.S. government to express firm opposition to the "reactionary junta" that has seized control of Greece.

The council made it clear also that the federation would continue to aid wherever possible programs to build free trade unions overseas, voting $27,900 to the American Newspaper Guild for interim financing of its international programs of aiding and building unions of newspaper workers.

On federation affairs the council elected a new member—Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of George Burdon (Story, Page 3). It received a series of reports on public relations, pension plans, the Sears Roebuck boycott and voted funds for a number of organizations.

At a press conference during the sessions, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in reply to a series of questions, emphatically reaffirmed that "as far as I know the AFL and the AFL-CIO has never received CIA money for any activity, either directly or indirectly."

He asserted that "not one penny of CIA money" has ever come into the AFL or the AFL-CIO in the past 20 years and "I would have known about it if it had." Meany was president of the AFL from 1952 until the merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955 when he became president of the new organization.

The federation president's statements came in reply to questions about publication in the Saturday Evening Post of an article by Thomas W. Braden, a former CIA official, who said that a number of American labor leaders received funds from the intelligence agency.

Meany said he would not in any way modify his February statement that the AFL-CIO had never taken any CIA money, and reaffirmed it in even stronger terms. He reaffirmed also earlier statements that Jay Lovestone, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, had nothing to do with the CIA.

He detailed for reporters the activities of both the AFL and CIO before merger in the years immediately following World War II, before the CIA was established, in helping build strong, non-Communist unions in France, Italy and other countries. (Excerpts, Page 2.)

He spoke of the work of the Free Trade Union Committee, supported by the AFL and many of its affiliates, and how it helped organize Force Ouvriere in France as a free union to counter the Communist CGT and how the committee had sent CARE packages

AFL-CIO Backs Wirtz On Radiation Standards

Organized labor gave its "strongest endorsement" to action of Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz in setting safety and health standards covering uranium miners exposed to radioactive gases that may cause cancer.

"This is a long-needed and long-delayed step by the federal government to extend the protections against radiation already provided for other workers in this field to uranium miners," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote Wirtz.

Wirtz acted after 17 years of discussion, debate, study and re-study had ended in another stalemate in the inter-agency Federal Radiation Council which 24 hours earlier had again failed to agree on a standard. He used his authority under the Walsh-Healy Act to set health and safety standards for federal supply contractors.

The trouble in the mines is caused by the radioactive gas radon, which quickly breaks down into what are called radon daughters. These in turn attach themselves to dust particles that may be inhaled, retained in the lungs and lead to cancer.

The unit of measurement of radon daughters is the Working Level, or WL. Wirtz in his determination set the WL at the equivalent of a concentration of

THE ACTIVITIES of the American labor movement in helping build free trade unions in Europe after World War II are detailed at a press conference by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The federation president emphatically reaffirmed that "not one penny in CIA money" has ever come into the AFL or the AFL-CIO.

U.S. Urged to Oppose Greek Junta, Consider Suspension of Aid Funds

The United States should consider suspension of aid to Greece "until normal parliamentary democracy has been re-established," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement expressing "deep concern" at the "grave turn" of developments in that country.

The council also called on the U.S. to express "firm opposition" to the "reactionary junta" that has seized power in Greece.

The statement declared that this country, the source of the Truman Doctrine that helped promote human well-being and freedom in Greece and Europe, "should mobilize its influence and good offices for hastening a return to representative government, the restoration of parliamentary institutions, political liberties and free trade unions . . . and the release of political prisoners."

The council charged that "the ancient cradle of democracy is now the victim of a military coup d'etat by a handful of extremely reactionary colonels" and declared the "self-appointed junta has resorted to naked armed force."

The Greek constitution and Parliament have been suspended, the council noted; political parties have been dissolved, civil rights abolished, union headquarters have been seized, martial law and censorship proclaimed, and thousands of trade unionists, democrats, conservatives and monarchists have been jailed.

"The new government installed by the junta rules by decree, intimidation and terror," the statement declared.

'Brutal' Dictatorship

"The colonels are seeking to hide the true nature and aims of their brutal dictatorship by conjuring up the danger of a Communist take-over. Actually, their criminal assault against democracy will only serve the Communists who are also mortal enemies of freedom."

The council attributed aggravated political instability and weakened democratic institutions in Greece to the "political ineptness of the king, the machinations of former Prime Minister George Papandreaou, the pro-Communist activities of his son Andreas [and] the failures of the conservative government."

"The military dictatorship is no answer to political instability or the threat of communism," the council continued. "On the contrary, such tyrannical rule only sows the seeds of civil war and provides the Communists with a pretext of posing as defenders of constitutional rights.

"Communism cannot be defeated by abolishing democracy. The Communists can be defeated by removing the economic and social grievances which they hypocritically seek to exploit."

The statement recalled that it was the free labor forces that prevented the Communist take-over of Greek trade unions and government in the World War II period, and that U.S. labor was a vital factor in helping to safeguard Greek democracy at the time.

It appealed to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions "to mobilize free world labor in support of the bona fide free trade unions and all other democratic organizations in Greece."

The council in addition observed that political disorder in Greece, "a cornerstone of NATO," endangers the Western alliance defense system in the Mediterranean and imperils Graeco-Turkish cooperation, particularly in view of continuing difficulties over Corfu.

Punta del Este Pact Seen Spur to Progress

The Punta del Este agreement on the establishment of a common market for Latin America drew the praise of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which also hailed the conference's emphasis on self-help aspects of national and international development programs.

The opportunities for industrial expansion and increased world trade offered by the creation of a common market for Latin America will speed improved living standards, economic progress and the growth of stable democratic institutions, the council declared in a statement.

But it warned that "no economically sound common market can be developed and the people of Latin America will not be able to enjoy any benefits thereof unless there is a simultaneous expansion of the national domestic markets."

This, it continued, requires that each nation subscribing to the Latin American Common Market make "a genuine effort . . . to have the benefits of increased productivity return, in a fair measure, to the workers and farmers," to correct "the traditional inequitable subsistence. level of income" in most countries, and achieve higher mass purchasing power.

The statement urged that national revenues be used for "constructive" economic development projects and "not dissipated" in unnecessary spending such as the support of large military machines. It also called on government to "press more vigorously" for the educational, agrarian, tax, health and other reforms called for by the Alliance for Progress.

"The democratic organized labor movement of Latin America, through its appropriate inter-American and national organizations, should be given the opportunity for active participation in order to insure the success of the emerging common market," the statement maintained.

Labor has a vital interest, it continued, in such matters as the location of new industries, adequate wages, training and retraining programs, inter-American labor mobility and standardization of social and labor legislation.

"Failure to solicit and secure labor's participation in these matters," the council added, "would seriously weaken the development of the Latin American Common Market as an instrument for advancing the working standards and living conditions of the vast majority of the people in the participating countries."

Birthday Greetings Sent to Truman

Former Pres. Harry S. Truman was sent greetings by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on his 83rd birthday, with the "earnest hope that you will have many, many more."

"American workers have never had a better friend in the White House than you were," the council said in a wire to the ex-President. "We remember clearly the innumerable times when we fought side by side with you in the interests of domestic progress and peace with freedom around the world.

"All of us on the AFL-CIO Executive Council, speaking on behalf of every wage-earner, wish you happiest returns on your 83rd birthday."

At News Conference:

Meany Cites Record Of Labor in Europe

The following is excerpted from remarks by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a press conference in Washington May 8, 1967, in connection with the spring meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The AFL and the CIO were both very active in Europe trying to help reestablish free trade unions after the second world war. They were very active before there was any such organization as the CIA. AFL money—American Federation of Labor money—was used to help these unions. It was used in Italy, it was used in France, it was used in other places. It was used in Germany beginning back in 1945. We were active in Germany long before there was any such organization as the CIA and long before there was any such thing as the Marshall Plan.

The Free Trade Union Committee was supported very generously by the American Federation of Labor. I was on that committee along with George Harrison, Dave Dubinsky, Matt Woll, and others. We collected money for the Free Trade Union Committee from the internationals of the AFL and that is all in the record.

It is also in the record that we loaned Force Ouvriere the money to start that organization after a visit by George Harrison and Dave Dubinsky to Europe back in 1948 that indicated the need to create this organization because the Communists had captured the CGT of France.

You know the story of the CGT in France. Leon Jouhaux was the head of that organization. He spent the war under house arrest. He refused to cooperate with the Nazis. He refused to join the Vichy government. He was offered every inducement and refused. So he was under house arrest in the south of France. The Communists, of course, were in the liberation movement—the underground of France, along with many other patriotic Frenchmen. The minute the liberation came they walked right in and Louis Saillant and Jacques Duclos phvsically captured the CGT. So when Jouhaux came back to Paris his organization was gone.

Aid Given Before Marshall Plan

They provided a secretary job for him and they created three other secretary jobs which they filled with Communists, and Jouhaux had to make a decision before long whether he would go along with that sort of an organization or whether he would take the non-Communist forces away from them, which he did. I wrote a check for $25,000 and sent it to Jouhaux and I wrote another check for something approximating $10,000 which I sent to the army stores in France and provided typewriters, filing cabinets, duplicating machines and all the desks and everything else that they needed for their offices in Paris when they set up Force Ouvriere. This is long before there was any such thing as a Marshall Plan.

With the DGB in the late summer of 1945, we put 1,700 individuals on a list and sent them CARE packages every two weeks for the next couple of years. We did that to help the individuals who had been in concentration camps, who had been exiled; Max Brauer was in this country. He worked for the AFL during the war. He was afterwards mayor of Hamburg. We went to work. We sent Joe Keenan to Germany in 1945. We sent Henry Rutz over there. We sent Harry Goldberg to Italy. We carried on all this work in order to try to rebuild these unions.

We got Monsignor Higgins to make a tour of Germany in order to discourage the reformation of the German unions along the so-called religious and socialist lines, and we got them together. Finally in 1948 the DGB was formed and we helped in every possible way in the formation of that organization. But, after it was formed, after it got together, we didn't send any finances over there because they didn't need any finances. But this is the reason you have today one great organization of labor in Germany and do not have any Communists or religious split-offs. I take the greatest pride in that sort of work and I take a great deal of pride in the fact that we played a part in reestablishing the German trade union movement.

We played a part in keeping the entire French movement from going Communist and likewise the Italian movement. The Intl. Ladies Garment Workers played a very, very strong part in the Italian movement. They even went to the point of using their influence on the political parties to see to it that CISL was composed of all non-Communist elements in Italy. And they were successful at that time.

I would like to point out that in these fights we were fighting the Soviet Union. We were fighting well-financed organizations. If you have seen the headquarters of the CGT in Rome and seen the equipment that they have there—that never came from dues money of Italian workers. It had to come from somewhere else. They have motorcycle squads, they have great big carry-all trucks, they can put on a riot at almost an hour's notice any place in Italy.

These are the people that we are fighting, financed completely by the Soviet Union and its allies. So I take a great deal of pride in the work we have done overseas and I resent the fact that the CIA is trying to horn in and say that they have done some of it.

Council Hits 'Compulsion' in Rail Plan

Backs Fight to Keep School Aid Program

to German labor leaders found in concentration camps or returning from exile.

"I take great pride," Meany declared, in the work of helping build the DGB in Germany, the FO in France and CISL in Italy. This was all done, he stressed, with trade union funds in the years before the CIA and the Marshall Plan.

The Newspaper Guild, Meany told newsmen in reporting the council action, had asked for help in its overseas programs in connection with the Intl. Federation of Journalists and the Inter-American Federation of Working Newspapermen's Organizations. The Guild had financed these programs with the aid of foundation grants which came under attack as originating with the CIA.

The ANG told the council it had severed relations with the foundations when they refused to disclose the source of the grants, but that the international programs were very important and should be carried on. The council voted money to tide the ANG over until Aug. 1, 1967, so that the Guild could seek new financing.

These were the council's actions in summary:

● Adopted as its own a statement issued by Meany when the proposed rail legislation was made public—the statement pledging vigorous opposition to the Administration's proposal, which it termed compulsory arbitration, and urging seizure of the roads as an alternative. (Story, Page 1.)

● Called on the House to reject a Republican proposal to hand over control of federal aid to education funds to the states with little control on how it is spent. The proposal, the council declared, is "playing politics with the education of America's youth." (Story, Page 4.)

● Urged all affiliates to "make every effort to hire and induce employers to hire" young workers for summer jobs. (Story, Page 4.)

● Praised the declaration announced at the recent Punta del Este conference to establish a Latin American common market and called on the Latin countries to give full opportunity to inter-American and national labor organizations for active participation in formulating plans for the enterprise. (Story, Page 2.)

● Called on the U.S. government "to express firm opposition to the reactionary junta" that has seized control of Greece and to "consider the suspension of aid to Greece until normal parliamentary democracy has been re-established." (Story, Page 2.)

● Voted the 1968 Murray-Green award to Wilbur J. Cohen, undersecretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, for his outstanding contributions to the "health and welfare of the American people." The presentation will be made next April in Washington. (Story, this page.)

● Received and approved a report from the Retail Clerks on the termination of the union's boycott of Sears, Roebuck & Co. supported by the AFL-CIO. The RCIA is mounting a new organizing drive on a store-by-store basis of the nationwide chain organization. (Story, Page 4.)

● Approved a progress report from the council committee on public relations on the departure of Edward P. Morgan, sponsored by the AFL-CIO since merger, to join a new program of National Educational Television. The committee recommended that the program be terminated for the time being while study continues on a future program in terms of the long-range public relations needs of the AFL-CIO. (Story, this page.)

● Set up a special subcommittee to study proposed legislation and federal regulations of pension and welfare funds. The subcommittee will ask all affiliates for suggestions and information and frame an AFL-CIO policy for presentation to Congress.

● Received a report from a special subcommittee that met with Pres. Johnson on the need for an executive order to bar government contracts to firms in continual violation of the National Labor Relations Act. The committee reported that the President had instructed the attorney general to survey and study the situation and that a guide to possible government action is expected shortly.

● Received a final report on funds raised by the AFL-CIO for the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation and the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library. The foundation received $2,072,000; the library $1,187,000 for a total of $3,260,000.

● Voted $24,000 for the A. Philip Randolph Institute; $10,000 for the Institute on American Democracy; $5,000 for the Clergy Economic Foundation; $5,000 to aid the Teachers in winding up the union's dispute with St. John's University.

● Approved a change in the title of the Railway Clerks union to include the word "airline."

● Set the next Executive Council meeting for Sept. 11 in New York City.

Meany told reporters that an investigation he had made of charges of violations of ethical practices in the Painters Union turned up no evidence of such violations and that the union has operated under the federation's Ethical Practices Codes.

He reported also that he had received a letter from Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther on the actions of the recent special convention of the union, for his information and study.

Murray-Green Prize To Wilbur Cohen

The AFL-CIO's 1968 Murray-Green Award will be presented to Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen, the Executive Council announced. The presentation will be made at the annual Murray-Green dinner concluding the federation's National Conference on Community Services, to be held in Washington next April.

Cohen will be the 13th recipient of the award named for the late Philip Murray, who was president of the former Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the late William Green, who was president of the former American Federation of Labor.

His selection was based on his contributions to the health and welfare of the American people dating from the earliest days of the development of social security legislation.

DISCUSSION ON RAIL LEGISLATION was major item on Executive Council agenda with strong opposition expressed to any form of compulsory arbitration. The council endorsed the recent statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urging seizure of the railroads as an alternative to the Administration's proposal.

Morgan Shifting to Education TV, Meany Hails Long Relationship

The 12-year sponsorship of radio newscaster Edward P. Morgan by the AFL-CIO will come to an end next month when Morgan becomes chief correspondent for a newly-created news and investigative reporting program on educational television.

Morgan will join the Public Broadcast Laboratory of National Educational Television, where he will undertake a weekly series of two to three hour programs over 100 non-commercial stations, financed by a $10 million Ford Foundation grant.

In announcing Morgan's acceptance of the new position, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said "relations with Morgan over the many years he has been with us have been of the very finest."

He said that Morgan had rendered a "very fine public service" in his broadcasts, which were carried out under a verbal agreement made at the inception of the sponsorship whereby there was no censorship or "suggestions" from the AFL-CIO. "He was completely free to present the news and comment as he saw fit, and that is exactly what he has done," Meany stated.

Morgan's 15-minute radio show is currently heard five times weekly on 219 stations of the American Broadcasting Co. When the program ends on June 16 the AFL-CIO will drop the show "for the time being at least," Meany stated.

He said a committee of the Executive Council, which has been studying public relations policies of the federation, recommended that we "not press forward with the program" nor attempt to arrange a substitute for Morgan. The committee will consider "the whole question of a future program in connection with our over-all public relations study," he said.

On Leave From ABC

Morgan, who has worked for ABC since January 1955, the same year his association began with the then AFL, will take a two-year leave of absence from the network. His new duties will include being a reporter as well as being "involved in investigative reports, incisive commentary, interviews and in the development of the innovative and experimental techniques of bringing relevant information to the public," according to a statement from NET.

He began his career in 1932 as a sports writer for the now-defunct Seattle Star. For nine years he was foreign correspondent for United Press and began radio broadcasting during World War II. Later he broadcast for CBS and was an editor and producer in Edward R. Murrow's "This I Believe" series.

The format of his program during the period that he was under AFL-CIO sponsorship—which set a record for longevity in the industry—was a brief introductory note of AFL-CIO sponsorship, 7.5 minutes of "hard" news, a 45-second "commercial" by the AFL-CIO and a return to Morgan for five minutes of comment before the sign-off.

The recipient of virtually every award for outstanding radio broadcasting, Morgan was cited in 1966 by the Overseas Press Club for his "outstanding radio reports" in 1965 from Communist capitals, the first time that a U.S. radio program had emanated nightly from behind the Iron Curtain.

Morgan's other honors include the coveted Peabody Award, the Sidney Hillman Award, the duPont Award, the Headliner Award, the Journalistic Excellence Award of the Capital Press Club of Washington, D.C., and the outstanding news program of the year by the National Association for Better Radio & Television.

Max Greenberg Elected To Executive Council

Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Employes since 1954, has been elected an AFL-CIO vice president.

He succeeds George Burdon, former president of the Rubber Workers, who resigned from the council after accepting a post with the Labor Dept.

Until his election as international president, Greenberg had been president of Local 108, Retail Union of New Jersey, for 18 years. A native of New York, he will be 60 in August.

He is a vice president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., a member of the AFL-CIO General Board, of the COPE Administrative Committee, and of the board of governors of the Intl. Union of Food & Allied Workers Associations.

He was a labor member of the New York Regional War Labor Board from 1942 to 1946 and of the New Jersey Board of Mediation from 1949 to 1954. In 1964 he was named to the Labor Advisory Council of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, and the following year to the Labor Advisory Council of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

He and Mrs. Greenberg are the parents of a son, Martin Lewis Greenberg, a lawyer, and a daughter, Marsha Lee Rein, a teacher. They have five grandchildren.

Pay Rises 3.3% In Printing Trades

Union printing trades workers boosted their average hourly wage scales by 12 cents, or 3.3 percent, to $3.85 during the year that ended last July 1, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Both newspaper employes and workers in job and book plants showed average gains of 12 cents. In newspapers, the average rose to $4.07—$3.96 for day work, $4.17 nights— and in job and book shops to $3.69, the report showed.

Congress Studies Alternatives To Compulsory Rail Settlement

said, would be "to increase the profits" of the railroads.

Fox said rail unions "have had more than a taste already of government by injunction." He reminded the senators that "it was an infamous federal injunction which broke the great railroad shopmen's strike of 1922. That was the last time the shopcrafts struck the nation's railroads—45 years ago."

At the opening of House hearings, Commerce Committee Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.) said he saw both seizure and "do nothing" as alternatives to a compulsory settlement.

Staggers and other committee members sharply challenged Transportation Sec. Alan S. Boyd on his claim that a railroad strike would be "disastrous" and on the government's refusal to take up at this point a union offer to work out a plan to keep moving "all rail shipments essential to the nation's military effort and the public health" in the event of a strike.

The offer was made in a joint telegram from Fox and Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives Association.

Rep. John E. Moss (D-Calif.) asked whether the government was taking steps to implement the union offer.

"No, sir," Boyd replied.

Under further questioning, he conceded that it would be "a very worthy thing" to look into the union proposal.

The next day, Wirtz told the committee the Defense Dept. is now willing to meet with the unions to plan movement of military goods.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in House and Senate testimony, said collective bargaining has "come close" to settling the dispute and any formula imposed by the contemplated special mediation board would merely close the remaining gap. He expressed hope that a voluntary agreement would be reached before that stage.

Wirtz rejected as "blackmail" a suggestion by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that the government seize the railroads for 60 days and impound profits, subject to congressional determination on what should be done with the money.

Rail management, meanwhile, continued to press for compulsory arbitration. J. E. Wolfe, the chief railroad negotiator, and Gregory S. Prince, executive vice president of the Association of American Railroads, said in a statement that "the only real remedy" for rail labor disputes "is substitution of final and binding government adjudication for the right to strike."

At issue in the dispute is the move by six rail shopcraft unions to raise wages that have fallen far behind pay scales for similar skills in other industries. Recommendations by a presidential emergency board and a special mediation panel are inadequate to close the gap, the unions say.

The unions directly involved are the Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers, Railway Carmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Firemen & Oilers.

Divinity School Names Cruikshank

Nelson Cruikshank, who retired last year as director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, has been elected to the board of visitors of the Duke University Divinity School, Durham, N. C.

Cruikshank received a bachelor of divinity degree from Union Theological Seminary in 1929 and in the early 1930s served as director of the Social Service Dept. of the Brooklyn Federation of Churches. He has been associated for many years with the Dept. of the Church & Economic Life of the National Council of Churches of Christ in America.

Unions Urged to Promote Summer Jobs for Youth

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, noting the high unemployment rate for young men and women, urged all affiliates to "make every effort to hire, and induce employers to hire," young workers for summer jobs.

Such action, the council pointed out in a statement adopted at its spring meeting, is in keeping with the objectives of Pres. Johnson's "Summer Jobs for Youth" campaign and "is in the highest interests of the nation's future."

"The AFL-CIO shares Pres. Johnson's concern over the need for summer job opportunities for young people," the Executive Council declared. "The unemployment rate for workers under 21 is already three times the national rate; the addition of other millions who will leave school in June and hope to return in September poses a challenge that must be met.

"It is estimated that some 2 million of these young people need income from summer jobs in order to continue their education. The jobs will not be available without a national effort to create them."

Pact Deadline Approaches at General Tire

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers, with 50,000 members on strike for better contracts with major tire manufacturers, face another contract deadline—at General Tire & Rubber Co.

The URW contract covering 3,300 General employes here and in Waco, Tex., expires at 12:01 a.m. May 16. Union members at the Akron plant voted by an "overwhelming" margin to authorize a strike, if one is deemed necessary.

Union negotiators still hope for an agreement with one or all of the Big 4 and General, they said. Pres. Peter Bommarito reiterated his belief that the URW's bargaining program is "realistic, logical and attainable" and said the union will keep fighting to achieve it.

Strikes started Apr. 21 at 39 plants of three Big 4 firms—Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal, formerly the U.S. Rubber Co. Employes of Goodyear Tire—fourth Big 4 firm—stayed at work without a contract on a day-to-day basis.

GOP Plan Condemned:

Council Scores Move To Scrap School Aid

House Republican leaders are "playing politics with the education of America's youth" by supporting a move to scrap the two-year-old program of federal aid to elementary and secondary education, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council called on congressmen of both parties to vote for the school aid bill endorsed by the House Education & Labor Committee and reject the substitute proposed by Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.). The Quie bill would hand over money to the states, with little control over how it is spent.

The statement accused the GOP leadership, which is backing the Quie substitute, of "a national disservice" in dragging "the education of our youth . . . into the partisan political arena."

The "block grant approach" of the Quie bill "threatens to rekindle the flames of controversy over the state-church issue that frustrated enactment of federal aid to education for over 20 years," the AFL-CIO warned.

It would also intensify conflicts between large cities and their state governments, the council said. "Programs developed at the state level can provide no federal guarantee that funds will go where they are most needed—to help the children of the slums and the rural depressed areas."

The Executive Council statement warning that the aid to education program is in "serious jeopardy" came after a meeting with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner, Under Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen, and Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, a key Administration legislative strategist.

Labor "is determined that the great educational gains achieved by the 89th Congress shall not be destroyed," the council said.

Half the states would receive less federal money for education under the Quie bill, the statement noted. "These are the states most in need: those with low per pupil expenditures and those with the largest number of youths living in poverty."

While Quie has modified his block grant approach "in an effort to gain new support," the latest version of his bill requires only that at least 50 percent of the funds be used for the educationally disadvantaged—as compared with 80 percent under the Administration bill. The statement added:

"The Quie substitute also prohibits the use of such funds for general classroom construction and improved teacher salaries, while—at the same time—eliminating provisions for such successful operating programs as the Teacher Corps, aid for the children of migrant workers, foster children, and many others."

In "direct contrast," the Executive Council said, the committee bill "continues the popular programs born in 1965 that have earned wide public and congressional support." It "creates no new areas of controversy" and "strengthens" elementary and secondary school education, instead of "destroying" the federal aid program.

It has the backing of "every major educational organization, the vast majority of state school superintendents, local school districts, and the non-public school organizations," the council noted.

Clerks Suspend Boycott, Push Sears Organizing

The Retail Clerks have discontinued their consumer boycott against Sears, Roebuck & Co. and are launching a store-by-store organizing campaign.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the union's action at a news conference during the May meeting of the federation Executive Council in Washington. The council, which had endorsed the 6-year-old "don't buy" campaign, received and approved an RCIA report on its decision.

In discontinuing the general boycott against Sears, the RCIA said it will now proceed to "methodically aid Sears employes throughout the United States in the unionization of the stores in which they work." The statement expressed confidence that in this effort the RCIA would continue to receive support from the rest of the labor movement "which has already been tested and prove so valuable."

The union, relating the factors underlying the decision of its executive board, expressed its thanks for past backing by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, the labor press, the Federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept., the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, and all individual union members who espoused the RCIA's fight.

"Whatever progress has been made on behalf of store workers throughout this period has been made with the help of all of organized labor," the statement said. The support, given by all segments of labor under the leadership of the AFL-CIO Executive Council has "helped many thousands of Sears employes courageously to hold their ground and maintain their loyalty to, and membership in, the union despite the company's anti-union policies," it concluded.

Employes in many Sears stores are now "actively seeking the help of the RCIA in organizing," the union reported, and while the company has announced no general change in its labor policy, the RCIA executive board decided to meet employe needs by proceeding with a store-by-store organizing program.

Began in 1960

The consumer boycott began July 23, 1960, as the result of a dispute that started two months earlier, when several hundred RCIA members returned to work in two San Francisco stores after respecting a Machinists' picket line. The RCIA explained:

"The union agreement under which retail store employes were working permitted them to respect authorized picket lines. Despite this, management . . . discharged more than half of these employes and subjected the remaining employes to provocative discrimination."
